The Christian Century's GREAT NEW YEAR

LIKE the motif of a symphony, one theme will run through the wide range of discussion in The Christian Century during 1921. This theme will be a consideration of the basic question:

DO THE IDEALS OF JESUS FIT TODAY'S LIFE?

A vital question it is—the most searching question that anyone can ask, and it is the question which everybody is asking. Some are asking it in strident and cynical voices; others wistfully and with baffled minds; others hopefully; and still others ask, unconscious that they are asking. But all men and women are raising the question as to the place we can rationally give to Jesus of Galilee in the society of the Twentieth Century.

Our discussion of this crucial question will be conducted in the most thorough-going fashion. Many types of writers will participate, ranging all the way from enlightened orthodoxy to constructive radicalism. The theme itself is conceived so as to cover all aspects of modern life—industry, politics, art, business, philosophy, science, theology, international relations, the church, etc., etc.

We offer our readers not so much a series of articles as a serial discussion in which minds of outstanding authority will lead, and all of us—readers, contributors and editors—will have a part. This unique conception is characteristic of the type of journalistic intimacy and unity which The Christian Century has succeeded in creating between itself and its great body of readers and contributors. The discussion will last

and will begin about February 1.

Some Typical Names From Our WHO'S WHO

MORE than two score of the nation's most influential thinkers chosen both from within the church and from without will declare their convictions on various aspects of the great theme. We are able at this date to set down a partial list of the names of those who have accepted a place in the discussion.

MR. ROGER BABSON, famous statistician, the nation's leading interpreter of industrial and economic conditions, will write on "Jesus and the Competitive System."

PROFESSOR HARRY F. WARD, Professor of Social Ethics in Union Theological Seminary, radical in his views and passionately Christian in his temper, will also write on "Jesus and the Competitive System."

PROFESSOR CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, sociologist of the University of Missouri, will write on "Is Civilization Christian?"

DR. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, preacher and author of many vital books, and BISHOP FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, Methodism's valiant champion of progress, will both write on "Is the Christian Church Christian?"

DEAN SHAILER MATHEWS, of the University of Chicago, editor, teacher, publicist, will write on "Is Modern Theology Christian?"

DR. JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, a favorite with all Christian Century readers, will write on "Is Modern Literature Christless?"

DR. WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN, of Union Theological Seminary, himself author of a book on our discussion subject, has chosen a theme which will probably open the whole series. He will consider "What Must a Religion Be to Be Practicable?"

DR. JOHN M. COULTER, world-famous botanist, will write on some phase of the relation of scientific evolution to Christianity.

DR. LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, author and preacher, will write on "Can Science Be Christian?"

DR. ROBERT E. SPEER, probably the most influential spiritual leader in the American church, will write on "Can Our Social Customs Be Christianized?"

DR. ALBERT PARKER FITCH, of Amherst, author of "Can the Church Survive?" will write on "Do the Churches Really Believe in Jesus?"

Other writers have been asked to participate, among them such leaders as:

DR. JOHN KELMAN	MR. JOHN SPARGO
MR. ROBERT HUNTER	PROF. WALTER WILLIAMS
DR. RICHARD L. SWAIN	MISS JANE ADDAMS
MRS. MARTHA FOOTE CROW	MR. HERBERT CROLY
DEAN CHARLES R. BROWN	DR. HARRY E. FOSDICK

And many others.

All aspects of the great question will be treated with authority. This discussion will be the

MOST SIGNIFICANT OFFERING

in the religious journalism of our times.

We Desire The Names Of 25,000 THINKING PERSONS

who are interested in religious progress and discussion, and who will be particularly interested in the great series of articles during 1921 on the subject:

DO THE IDEALS OF JESUS FIT TODAY'S LIFE?

OUR present readers are the folks to get these names for us. And we desire to reciprocate their kindness by a cash credit on their own subscription whenever their renewals fall due. This arrangement is an act of trust in our subscribers' absolute good faith in choosing names for their lists. The offer is made to our subscribers only, and will not be honored otherwise. Let every reader now put on his thinking cap. That thoughtful layman or lay woman in yonder pew; that liberal minded minister across the way, or in some other city, of your own or another denomination; that intelligent Sunday school superintendent or teacher; that judge, that high school principal, that physician, that missionary minded woman, that social minded business man whose conversation recently impressed you for its intelligent interest in things religious and ethical—speak or write to them about The Christian Century and send us their names if you think our prospect of winning them is hopeful. Here is the great opportunity of the season to draw together the more generous minded leaders of religious activities in all the churches into a compact body of understanding. Manifestly the hour has struck in the American church for a mighty expansion of the influence of those ideals which make The Christian Century an inspiration to its present reading constituency. We do not ask you to get the subscriptions. We only ask you to prepare the way for us to get them.

PUT ON YOUR THINKING CAP

AND LET THE NAMES COME ROLLING IN!

One Dollar FOR FIVE NAMES

THE cooperation we ask of our subscribers during the present month of January is of a sort that cannot be paid for. Your influence, your time, your friendship we cannot compensate with pay. We could not hope for your aid except as we know the quality of your loyalty to Christian Century Ideals. Nevertheless we wish to demonstrate our appreciation in a certain way. So, for the five names you send in we will enter a credit of $1.00 to apply on your own subscription renewal. The credit will be acknowledged by the symbol (Cr.) in the address on the wrapper and when bill for renewal is sent one dollar will be deducted from regular subscription price. No credit will be given for less than five names. More than five names may be sent if the subscriber will undertake to communicate as below with each one, but we cannot give more than one dollar in credit. All lists of names must reach us before the end of January.

(Please use this form in sending names, and please write very plainly).

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY,
1408 So. Wabash Ave.
Chicago.

Dear Sirs:

As a friendly reader, I would like to have you send several copies of The Christian Century to the five names listed below. They are thoughtful persons, interested in religious progress and discussion, and I feel sure would relish the untrammelled and constructive treatment of vital issues, that characteristic of The Christian Century which your readers greatly prize. I have personally either spoken or written to each of these persons commending The Christian Century, and particularly calling attention to the forthcoming series on "The Ideals of Jesus in Today's Life." I think I have opened the way for a favorable consideration of whatever communication you may send. It is my belief that the right approach by your circulation department will win their subscriptions.

THINGS TO REMEMBER

Remember that the third Sunday in January is Education Day

Remember to observe the day with appropriate exercises and discourses.

Remember to set forth the fundamental need for our colleges.

Remember that the needs of our colleges were never so pressing as now.

Remember to see that Education has a proper place in the annual budget.

Remember that unless you use the budget plan this is the day for a large offering.

Remember that there are those who wish to give specially even though you have the budget.

Remember that offerings given through the board receive credit in the Year Book.

Remember that the headquarters of the Board of Education is Indianapolis, Indiana.

Remember that offerings for Education should be sent to it at 222 Downey Avenue

Remember that offerings are distributed to the colleges as per territorial assignment or your designation.

Remember to make January 16, 1921, a great day in your church.

A Prayer for a Heart Of Compassion

GIVE us, O Father, a heart of pity for all who are in the distress of hunger and want. Thou whose name is Love, may we possess Thy nature. Forgive us that we center our thoughts and plans so much upon ourselves and upon those who are part of our lives, and thereby shut out the bitter cry of multitudes of Thy suffering children. Enlarge our sympathies. Open the fountains of feeling within us, that we may not slip into that base mood of complacent satisfaction with our more fortunate lot while others starve and die. Bind us to our fellows with a living tether. Make us sharers of all good things Thou givest us, that therein we may find the true worth of Thy gifts.

Is there want and constriction of life in our neighborhood? May we be swift to learn and eager to help. Grant that we may never grow callous and insensitive to the misery that stalks in our streets. Save us from cynical judgments upon our hapless fellows. Though oft deceived by those who prey upon the tender impulses of mankind, defend us against the easy falsehood that all men are liars. Flash in upon our imagination some quick undertsanding of the circumstances under which our fellows have come to their misfortune, and may we live and walk in that humility of heart which discerns that but for Thy grace we, too, might be struggling at the foot of the ladder against want or shame or sin.

Touch our hearts, too, with a vivid sense of suffering that we do not see. Shall we not hear the cry of the children in war-stricken Europe, of the famished in China and India, of the unmeasured anguish in all lands where the good news of Thy fatherly love has not yet come? O Lord, may we take the world into our heart. Create in us the sense of being debtor to all men—those of our own kind and of all kinds. And may our love be no mere indulgence of emotion, but a practical loyalty, expressed not in tears and words alone, but in blessed deeds. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Unseen Companion

THOSE who have eyes with which to discern the larger realities of spiritual experience, know that there are moments when the presence of God seems very clear and comforting. These deeper soundings of the depths of divine help come usually in hours of inexpressible need, or of calm and quiet study of the eternal mysteries. Nor are they mere emotional reveries. They are as truly scientific in their character as are the more prosaic experiences of daily life. But they come only at the price of urgent need or of complete commitment to the will of God in human service or holy work. No one will accuse Sir Ernest Shackleton, the great explorer of the southern seas, of emotionalism. Yet in the completion of his memorable chapter on the terrible and almost tragic land journey with his two companions across the Antarctic island of South Georgia, after the wreck of his ship, the "Endurance," he writes: "When I look back at those days, I have no doubt that Providence guided us, not only across those snow fields, but across the storm-white sea that separated our island of rescue from our landing place on South Georgia. I know that during that long and racking march over the unnamed mountains and glaciers it seemed to me often that we were four and not three. I said nothing to my companions on the point, but afterwards Worsley said to me, 'Boss, I had a curious feeling on the march that there was another person with us.' One feels the dearth of human words in trying to describe things intangible, but a record of our journey would be incomplete without a reference to a subject very near to our hearts."

Heresies at Funerals

ORIGINALLY the Christian funeral was a service reserved for the faith. The Roman Catholic priest will do nothing for the heretic or for the excommunicate. A Catholic funeral for the unbaptized is unknown. Episcopalian practice provides Christian burial for the baptized, even though they be of other communions. Among immersionist bodies there are ministers who are able to conceive the possibility of unimmersed people being lost. The dogma of immersion-baptism is so preached that the only margin of doubt about the ultimate fate of a Presbyterian or Methodist is provided by the trumped-up doctrine of "the uncovenanted mercies of God." Yet these strict constructionist ministers respond to calls for funerals in the circles of pederbaptist people. When the neighbors gather in there is no hint that they are in the presence of a tragedy beyond the comprehension of the human mind, the passing of a soul whose fate is left in ambiguity for lack of immersion. Indeed the minister uses the service to help welcome into heaven a certain class of souls whom he denies membership in the church on earth. All of the good deeds of the pious rebel who has stubbornly refused the "divine plan of salvation" are set forth, but there is no hint that in spite of a life of prayer and good works, he may after all be lost. Roman Catholic practice is better because it is more frank and consistent. The bodies of their heretic dead are laid away in other than consecrated ground. Not only on the day of the funeral but for all time there is witness of the displeasure of the church. Its conviction that the soul of that man is lost is faithfully declared in the face of public disfavor. The minister who conceives religion vitally rather than legalistically knows that salvation and damnation are not determined by canons of logic, or by external conformity, for they lie in the province of spiritual life where only One greater than man can judge.

Let the Friend of the Church Speak

EVERY true friend of the church will rejoice that Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin has responded to a fresh outburst of criticism against the church which was printed recently in Harper's. It is inevitable that we should pass all of our institutions under the microscope of criticism at times, but the person who sees only the flaws has only half the story to tell. While some are saying the church is dying, and that if it is to live it must be made over, others are saying that as compared with the past, the church was never more powerful or more useful. Let the truth be told about the church. Dr. Coffin replies to the charge of schism. He insists that modern schism is more apparent than real. If the church has less unity than it ought to have, it has much more than most folks think it has. There are many cities and many rural districts in America today where the wildcat planting of churches is now verboten, and no one does it. Dr. Coffin asks what other institution in the community provides ethical and religious convictions as does the church. To talk about losing an organization so fundamental to the community good, or to discuss allowing it to lapse into innocuous senility, is absurd. The church is doing a work that no other institution does, and at present there is no institution that seems able to do it. The philanthropic movements of the time depend upon the church. Who ever heard of any significant sum of money being raised without church cooperation? Some people may think there is a big generous public outside the church busy in works of philanthropy. Ask the ex-leaders of the Interchurch and they will tell you some interesting things about this public. The church must take its criticism. But there can be no honest and constructive treatment of church problems without a generous acknowledgment of the good which that venerable institution is doing just as it is now conducted.

Is the Church a Monarchy or a Democracy?

THE doctrine of the church will prove in the long run the most difficult problem in the road of the reunion of Christendom. Is the church of Jesus Christ a democracy or a monarchy? The latter view is the one that is characteristic of the high church position. It is well stated in Bishop Palmer's recent book, in which he says: "The church is not, and cannot be, democratic in essence, for it has for its head a king whose position is absolute and unconditional—Jesus Christ. To him and to him alone the bishops, his assistant shepherds, are responsible." Lyman Abbott defines the position of the non-episcopal churches as follows: "That Jesus Christ organized no church, ritual or creed, and compounded no sacraments; that he was a life-giver not a lawgiver, and left his disciples, guided by his recorded words and inspired by his perpetual presence, to formulate their own creeds, frame their own rituals, develop their own working and worshipping organizations as their developing life, varying temperaments and changing circumstances might suggest to them." The chasm between these two contrasted doctrines of the church might seem at first too wide to bridge. It is not inconceivable that on pragmatic grounds of expediency the church might some time accept the episcopal system. It is hardly likely that it will ever accept the theory of episcopal oversight which is held by Bishop Palmer and many others. Rev. A. C. Headlam in a recent book frankly admits that we cannot claim apostolic authority for the episcopacy. His argument in behalf of episcopal government is that of a survival of the fittest. After long ages of trial and experiment, he contends, the episcopacy has made its way with the majority of Christians. This argument from success is the one urged by the more moderate churchmen. Even this argument is challenged, however. Is the episcopal mode of governing the church going or coming?

Newspapers as Teachers of Religion

THE secular newspaper has usually held for itself the ideal of a triple function. It tells the story of the world's life, it interprets the news and it affords a measure of entertainment for its readers. Some papers add to these three functions a fourth, the ideal of helping shape the life of the community. Although there is no one fact in the community life more prominent than the fact of religion, this vital interest has had but scant attention in the past. In recent years a few aggressive papers have taken on religious editors who were allowed a small amount of space to interpret the religious life of the community. Recently there have appeared evidences of a more aggressive attitude in religion than that of the mere reporting of surface events. The Boston Transcript prints a Saturday religious supplement which provides the religious news of New England, and in addition to this a good sermon well displayed and selected to fit the interests of the readers. Probably this sermon is read by twice as many people as attend the Boston churches on any given Sunday. The attitude of the Chicago Evening Post is even more aggressive. The editorial pages are used on Saturday for editorials dealing with the religious life of the community. Just as some papers choose to be republican or democratic, this paper chooses to be Christian. There is no apology for an outspoken attitude on the subject of religion. The editor of the Post believes that our nation is in peril through the decline of the religious spirit. In this judgment he is supported by some leading writers of the day. Herbert Croly said in the New Republic recently: "If the divorce of knowledge and religion continues it will ultimately wreck civilization. The integrity of the City of God can only be restored by their reunion."

The Forum and Americanism

THE Forum idea is thoroughly American. It is developing in most unexpected places the principle and habit of free discussion. The "vox populi" department of the secular newspaper is one of the most interesting departments in the paper. Even a religious paper is now and then willing to print virulent criticisms of itself on the part of its subscribers. Churches all over the land are patterning their methods after the celebrated Ford Hall meetings which are presided over by the Baptist layman, George W. Coleman. Current Events classes have been carried on in many Sunday schools on the basis of the forum plan. Only infrequently has vigorous discussion developed heat that lasted beyond the hour. The coming of a "conscientious objector" to speak before such a class was deeply resented by the local corps of the American Legion, and was the occasion of some unpleasantness. But even this flurry passed into better feeling. Under older social systems public policy was determined by strong leaders. These imposed their will upon the mass of the people. Even in a republic this has usually been the case. The nearest approach to the spirit of pure democracy is the forum where every one has the right to voice his opinion and where the only authority is the authority of truth and right. It is evident that the church has a great open door to enter in many communities by opening up the forum. Meanwhile the forum tends to become a national institution. Lecturers of recognized ability are being sent all over the country, and their opinions are becoming the topic of ardent discussion wherever they go. It would seem as though the forum might supersede the old-time revival and the lyceum and chautauqua. In the church the forum is often the center of deep religious interest as in a revival, but it has the intellectual quality of the platform movements of the previous generation.

The Reading Habits of Children

CHILDREN of this generation are more fortunate than those of older times in the accessibility of books. They will discover these books, however, only through the interest of their elders. A public spirited agency in a middle-west city furnished a model house. The boy's room had in it a home-made book-case such as a boy might make for himself, and the books that are dear to a boy. It is said that this book-case and its list of books attracted more attention than anything that was in the house. The children will never tire of the old favorites. Robinson Crusoe is a reading experience that every boy needs. Many a boy has learned through this book to take an intelligent interest in nature for the first time. The books that answer to the imaginative period of the child life make up somewhat for the lack of romance and imagination which is to be found in so many American homes. Many cities have excellent public libraries and while this is an opportunity, it is also a peril. Every child needs to own books, not merely to borrow them. The home that has two automobiles waiting in the garage but no library indicates by that fact that it is hopelessly bourgeois. It would be better for most children if they went to the movies less and read more. The morals of carefully selected books can be known in advance. The moral influence of the show cannot be gauged beforehand. Through proper books the life of a child may be given a bent that guarantees a developed manhood or womanhood in the citizen and churchman of tomorrow.

General Movement in the Church

NO more important action was taken by the Federal Council of Churches in the past quadrennium than taken recently looking toward the limitation of sporadic religious movements. Certain New York gentlemen got the habit of getting up "movements." After the movement was launched and mass meetings were announced in fifty leading cities of the land, it was bad form to criticize. The rest of us were expected to fall in line, in spite of the fact that neither we nor those who officially represented us had ever been consulted about the advisability of the new movement. We have had the Laymen's Evangelistic Movement and the Laymen's Missionary Movement, managed chiefly by ministers or employed officers of certain Christian organizations. There was the Men and Religion Movement and the Interchurch World Movement. It is hard to put the finger upon tangible results at all commensurate with the money expended. Laymen who know something about efficient management and cost-finding processes have been disgusted, but out of respect for the cloth, silent. The debacle of the Interchurch World Movement has given occasion for some plain speaking. We have had one too many such irresponsible movements. The process of ushering in the Kingdom of God is infinitely more difficult. Henceforth a nation-wide movement in religion must arise within the church, and not be imposed from the outside. The denominations now have properly elected officials, chosen in most cases democratically. Interdenominationally we have the Federal Council. These must speak for us. If our New York brethren are seized again with wanderlust, they should be invited to present their plans to the Federal Council.

What Shall We Do With Sunday?

FORMULATION of a tentative Sunday observance bill for introduction in the present Congress by the Lord's Day Alliance has started a discussion that is stirring both secular and religious minds from coast to coast. No religious question has engaged so much journalistic space during the past several months as the question "What shall we do with Sunday?" The strategy of the Lord's Day Alliance is shrewd. The proposal for national regulation of Sunday activities has hitherto carried with it the assumption that a constitutional amendment would be required to give Congress power to deal with the issue. But the Alliance has found a way to strike at present Sunday customs through already existing congressional powers without waiting on the tedious and dubious process through which the prohibition amendment had to pass. The Federal government now has legislative power over its own employes, the postal system, and interstate commerce. Here, then, are channels through which legislation against certain Sunday activities can be made sufficiently effective to radically transform present habits. Hence the bill proposes to make unlawful all Sunday work by government employes, all Sunday interstate railroad traffic, both freight and passenger, and all Sunday operation of the postal system—the carrying of mail by trains or by local carrier, the opening of postoffices and the reception as mail of any newspaper published or purporting to be published on Sunday.

The indirect effects of such restriction of Sunday operations within the channels now controlled by Federal law would, it is apparent, profoundly affect the habits of the general public in fields not under the direct jurisdiction of Federal control. Through its branch organizations in the several states the Lord's Day Alliance hopes to supplement Federal action with laws restricting ordinary business and amusements until "the recovery of the American Sabbath," as the Alliance phrases it, is complete. What this "American Sabbath" is conceived to be, is intimated by the bill itself which avows its purpose to express "the national determination to honor the Sabbath Day and keep it holy, as God commands." "Our program," says Dr. Harry L. Bowlby, General Secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance, "is a return to a more sensible and sane observance of our American Christian Sabbath and secure one day's rest in seven for every honest toiler, this day to be the same wherever possible. Above all things we think that the church, the Sunday school and the home should have the right of way on Sunday." Prominently associated with the Alliance are such men as Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts of the International Reform Bureau at Washington, and Dr. E. C. Dinwiddie, well known for his Washington leadership of the campaign for the eighteenth amendment.

This proposal compels a fresh study of the Sunday question in the light of history, and particularly in the light of modern social conditions. Not all peoples have had a seven day week. Some have had a four day week or a five day week. The seven day week seems to have originated in the practices of the Babylonian religion and was doubtless suggested by the various phases of the moon. Hebrew religion took over large elements of the old Babylonian practice, giving the old practices new meanings. The keeping of the Sabbath was urged as a memorial of the exodus from the bondage of Egypt and later it became the symbol of the divine rest following six days of creative labor.

The ancient Hebrew was at first a herdsman. During that early period it is unlikely that his customs provided for complete cessation from labor. But when he became an agriculturist and later a merchant, it was possible to insist upon the most rigid standards in the keeping of the Sabbath as a rest day. It is a relatively late document which represents Moses as calling for the death of a man who had gathered sticks upon the Sabbath day. Though the prophet Isaiah and certain other prophets seem to speak slightly of their "new moons and Sabbaths," there is a steady progress in the development of the Sabbath rest day.

When the synagogue arose and the Sabbath day was no longer wasted, but devoted to the study of the law and the cultivation of the higher life, there was an enormous increase in the severity of the Sabbath regulations. In Jesus' day the rules about the keeping of the Sabbath had so increased that the complete recital of them would in itself be a lengthy story. It is a curious fact that Jesus was numbered among the Sabbath-breakers by his critics. Not only did his disciples pluck grain and eat it on the Sabbath day, violating three of the rabbinical rules, but he repeatedly healed on the Sabbath, even though many of the cases were of a character that could have waited another day. He observed the day as a day of worship, going into the synagogues and sometimes standing up to teach, but nowhere does he enumerate the Sabbath law among the important commandments. His fundamental attitude was expressed in the aphorism, "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." Perhaps he would have said a similar thing about every other religious custom. The test is human welfare interpreted in the largest way, and not some abstract notion of what might be for the divine glory.

It seems clear that Paul was opposed to binding the Sabbath upon Gentile churches, though as a Jew he continued to keep the law through his whole life. The freedom of the Gentile Christian from Jewish law and custom was the major contention of his apostolic career. The book of Galatians deals with little else. One needs only to quote such passages as Rom. 14:5, Gal. 4:10 and Col. 2:16 to make clear Paul's attitude. The Sabbath was the seventh day. In the first century Christians began meeting on the first day, either in early morning or late in the evening for the breaking of bread and prayers. At first there was some tendency to keep two days holy, the seventh and the first, as the Ebionites persisted in doing. Later as the chasm between Jews and Christians widened, Sabbath-keeping became odious in the church, and was called "Judaizing."

None of the church fathers insist upon abstinence from labor on the Lordsday. The social conditions under which the Christians lived would hardly have permitted. The membership of the church was too largely a slave membership. But it is evident that the bishops early hoped for such a goal. One of the first things that the Christian emperor, Constantine, did was to establish the Lordsday as a day of rest. Regulations were made that discriminated between necessary and unnecessary labor in a manner not so essentially different from that of today.

The question of recreation on the holy day does not seem to have arisen in New Testament times. There is insistence on worship, but no word with regard to recreation. Constantine prohibited the opening of the playhouses, doubtless because they were considered a business. On the other hand we find the church in the middle-ages not only permitting but commanding the people to assemble after church for archery and certain other forms of recreation. Even in Scotland as late as 1457 archery was ordered as a form of community recreation following church.

The British mode of keeping Sunday arose following the Reformation. Protestantism laid a great stress upon the Bible as an authoritative book, and the Old Testament was the inspired word of God in the same sense as the New. The rigid Sabbath laws of the Levitical code made a deep impression upon the British mind. The so-called Puritan Sunday came into vogue in large part under the sanction of a mistaken biblical interpretation. That it has nevertheless resulted most beneficially in the health, morals, family life and religious spirit of the British peoples must be admitted. The Puritan unfriendliness to recreation on any day of the week would of course put an end to community recreation on Sunday. The so-called continental Sunday is largely a continuance of the mediaeval Sunday. If the Puritan Sunday has been basely maligned and misrepresented by hostile writers, so has also the continental Sunday. "Blue laws" have never been as blue as some think, nor has Sunday on the Continent been as godless. In some Roman Catholic countries of Europe there are laws compelling the observance of Sunday which go almost as far as the British laws of the present time.

Turning to the denominational churches of the United States for guidance as to the right use of the day of rest, we hear only discordant voices, as is so often the case. The Lutheran, an official publication, in answering the query whether after the eighteenth amendment we shall have some more "puritanism" humorously remarks that one piece of mince pie is enough but two would be too many. The hostility of the Roman Catholic to Mr. Bowlby's proposals is voiced thus: "The representatives of vicious righteousness are active again, this time on a sumptuary law that will make the old Puritan 'Sabbath' appear as a picnic-day in comparison with the amended Sunday that will emerge from the conference room of the Lordsday Alliance. Saturday evening at dusk Jew and Gentile, saint and sinner, will be summoned to their sackcloth and ashes; curtains will be drawn, psalms chanted; the undertaker will be summoned to add a touch of solemnity to the scene, and religion will go to perdition." If this statement grossly misrepresents Mr. Bowlby, it sufficiently sets forth Roman Catholic hostility to the new proposals. Unitarian opinion is probably well reflected in the editorial statement of Unity: "Whether the world can be saved by making the world a desert waste of dullness on Sunday, we do not know. But this we feel we do know—that empty churches cannot be filled by any such method. Close every theatre, stop every sport and pastime, ban every newspaper, stall every automobile—and there will be no more people in the churches than there are today!" The United Presbyterian church would take the extreme Sabbatarian position. Disciples would be historically committed by Alexander Campbell's Sermon on the Law to a position less rigid. Episcopalian opinion would probably go farther toward license than that of any other communion.

In studying the Sunday question from a social viewpoint, four great life interests are to be taken into account. These are industry, recreation, the family life and organized religion. It would seem that only the steel trust believes in making men work seven days a week. The labor unions have a zeal quite equal to that of the church in enforcing laws against Sunday labor, and in many communities have shown much more activity. Their feeling is humanitarian rather than religious, if such a distinction may be allowed, but if one undertakes to break down the laws against Sunday labor he will have not only the church but union labor to fight. Probably we are all agreed that everything but essential industries should close down on Sunday. Just where the line shall be drawn between the evidently necessary task of keeping eating places open on Sunday and the disputable practice of selling gasoline, will have to be worked out in every community.

Probably the focal point of the modern Sunday question is in the field of recreation. A revolutionary change has come in our thought about recreation in the past generation. When Dr. Cabot writes his book on "What Men Live By," he includes play as one of five great life interests, and we all agree. Like all new movements, the recreational revival tends to faddism. Does a boy pick pockets, or a girl lose her virtue, we all solemnly agree that the poor things never had play enough. In the next generation we shall be saying they had no religious education, but that time has not come yet save for a few.

Recreation has completely absorbed Sunday in the lives of thousands of people in America. The tired business man assures us he could not carry on without playing golf the entire day. The automobile might have filled all the churches. Instead, it has emptied them in many communities, for it lends itself to the passion for recreation. The theaters are open in certain sections of the country and closed in others. Wherever they are open, church work is harder. Not only are amateur games permitted on Sunday, but professional games, forbidden in the east, are openly encouraged in the west. So conservative a community as Evanston, Ill., the Methodist mecca of the middle west, is now seriously considering the erection of a community stadium where the young people can roller-skate all Sunday afternoon. All over the country the churches have been compelled to relax former standards. While the older members purse their lips, the young people have Sunday evening teas at the church, sometimes with games, and this may be followed by the conventional prayer meeting, the latter taking the curse off the former.

The recreation-faddist evidently hopes to capture Sunday entirely for his interest. The intelligent religionist will oppose his plans, not by being opposed to recreation, but by insisting that recreation shall take its own rightful place among other life interests. Already vast sections of the country have a half holiday on Saturday. The forty-four hour a week industries might just as well have all day Saturday. The Henneberry Printing Company and other firms in Chicago have found that they can get more work out of their employees by a slight lengthening of the day five days a week and closing up on Saturday and Sunday entirely. With Saturday as the day for play, and Sunday the day for the family and the higher life, we should do very well.

Unquestionably the family is being crushed more by our modern life than is the church. There is no national organization of the family to voice its claim. On the ordinary work-day the family in the average city home has little fellowship. The various members of the family have different hours. They do not eat breakfast or luncheon together. Dinner may assemble the various members for a hasty meal, but they scatter again for the evening. Unless the father and mother insist upon their rights in the life program of their children, parenthood will be but an empty mockery. Sunday seems to be the only day left for the family life. A traveling man sometimes goes a thousand miles to be with his family on Sunday. He is a wise man. Only thus may he mould his son after his own ideals and shape the character of his daughter. The love of his wife is deepened and quickened by his consideration.

The interests of organized religion must be asserted in no doubtful terms. Intelligent students of history know that religion is no private affair which concerns only a few individuals. In America we have a vast variety in our religious life. The sum total of all our organizations represents one of the most important facts in the national life. The man who would flippantly hinder these organizations in their work of giving children religious education, young people lofty ambitions and adults ethical principle and spiritual support in time of trouble, is no true friend of the people. The interest of a commercialized form of recreation, for instance, is always to be sacrificed in behalf of the institutions which furnish society with its motive power. No man need be ashamed to claim at the bar of public opinion a favorable judgment on the work of the churches, nor need he apologize for insisting upon their prior claim to the use of the great rest-day which they themselves have created.

In dealing with the Sunday question, there is the legal phase and there is the moral phase. The Christian will always demand of himself more than he will demand of the community by law. It is in failing to make this distinction that the Lord's Day Alliance has fallen into trouble. Unless a man be an anarchist, he will believe in some laws regulating Sunday. Without law, stores and factories would in many instance open on Sunday, and by being open would compel others to open. We could never abolish all of our Sunday laws without going back to outright paganism.

On the other hand, a Christian father might treat his own son strictly on Sunday without demanding that his neighbor should do the same. In the right kind of Christian home the children are happy to be with father and mother, to read and sing and visit together. These children never think of hunting up a baseball game. But the next door neighbor allows his boy to join in a baseball game on a vacant lot. Shall the Christian father impose his conscience on his neighbor by process of law? Many devout men believe this is neither right nor expedient. The finer things of the spirit can never come by law, but only by teaching, by example and by the work of God's Holy Spirit.

The church has no deeper need today than to define an ideal for Sunday toward which to work. At present we are drifting, and a puff of wind out of the camp of secularists or a tidal wave of commercialism can carry us far out of the course.

The Lordsday arose as a tribute to Jesus Christ. It is the day for remembering him and his principles. Upon this day Christians may well be busy in carrying out much of the practical work of his kingdom, visiting the sick and those in trouble. Above all it is a day of worship. Not by law but by spiritual influences, the church should lead the masses back to the altar. No Christian can afford to lose sight of the infinite possibilities of a day devoted entirely to the higher life. Meanwhile let our underlying method be no false legalism, either in theology or statecraft, but an appeal to heart and conscience. Human welfare, the coming of a better civilization, are wrapped up in the application of Jesus' principle, "the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

"Getting Even" With Labor

IN determining the permanent relations between capital and labor, the present hour, at the turn of the year, is of immense importance. The past four years have been in many regards a golden harvest time for certain classes of workers. Prices have been very high in most of the trades, and the government set the pace in offering almost fabulous rewards to all who were ready to engage in the industries of essential war production. Labor leaders of all kinds, the wise and the unwise alike, saw in this situation an opportunity to strengthen the organizations with which they were connected, and to intrench themselves against any coming day of inter-class conflict.

It really came to be a struggle between the conservatives and the radicals in labor ranks as to which of the two sorts of policy should prevail. And for the time it looked as if the radicals were getting the right of way. Nor must it be forgotten that during this time of world travail and suffering some great questions in the area of industrial reconstruction were also finding permanent adjustment. The eight hour day came in to stay; not as a hard and fast time limit for wage earners or their employers, but as a principle to be recognized in the interest of the individuality and the home life of the worker. The principle of collective bargaining replaced the older despotism of the "hiring and firing" practice of capital. Here again it is not an adamant rule, but the recognition of fundamental rights.

These and other elements of economic progress are not mere temporary concessions, the unreasonable demands of labor, but are steps in industrial adjustment which are not likely to be retraced. The danger lies at this point. There are many leaders of the employer class who have become so embittered by the demands of labor that they have lost sight of the human factors which enter into the long process of industrial progress, and are ready to seize every opportunity to strike back at the entire labor group. And the inevitable turn of the tide puts things very much into their hands. The high prices for labor are disappearing. Queues are forming at the gates of the manufacturing plants, indicating that it is going to be increasingly difficult to find steady and profitable employment. The army of the unengaged is growing, and before spring it will be multiplied many times. This is unfortunate. It will soon be tragic.

The worst of it is that many of the class that may be called capitalistic, or at least sympathetic with capital, take a grim and cynical satisfaction in this situation. There is a retaliatory sentiment all along the lines of employment that is saying in plain words or implied meanings, "These workers have brought this all on themselves by their overbearing attitude in their days of prosperity. Now let them take their medicine when the shoe is on the other foot." This is the spirit of an editorial in the Wall Street Journal, whose astonishing harshness is expressed in terms of equally astonishing candor. Under date of December 1, that journal says:

When the real adjustment comes the unskilled worker finishes where he belongs—at the bottom of the list. He will be able to live on $2 a day when he is lucky enough to get that amount regularly. Wages which in the spring before the panic of 1873 were $8 a day fell to $2 in the autumn of that year, with employment hard to find. The cost of living will adjust itself. The Labor Bureau will give up publishing nonsense about $2,600 a year minimum for a fancied "family of five." The unskilled worker will thank goodness that he has no family of five or indeed anybody but himself to support; nor will any employer pay him on the basis of any such fatherhood, as the bankrupt and discredited Inter-church World Movement absurdly proposed in its gratuitous inquiry into the steel strike.

So far as immigration is concerned, we want more labor, as we shall rapidly discover when people are reallocated to their proper jobs. This is particularly true of domestic service. Not all the munition workers have gone back to washing dishes. Not for long will the housekeeper pay the green hand $60 a month with board and lodging for learning her elementary business. This country can run best on the basis of plentiful domestic service at $20 a month with respectful and competent maids receiving $25 a month and glad to get it.

Not in many a day have we seen from a responsible source so naive an expression of contempt for the human elements involved in the economic problems. Of course it will be confessed that the facts which form the indictment of labor for many of the hardships of the past few months, especially in labor centers like Chicago, are a great host. Yet it must not be forgotten that a moment like this is a time not for revengeful policies, but for constructive conference and future understanding. Nothing is to be gained, save the cultivation of a vindictive spirit on the part of the most dangerous elements in the community, by a policy of reprisal and hatred, now that the tide has turned. We all have to live in the same world, and even in the same wards and precincts. The war of the two contending industrial classes can only be waged at the expense of the community, which is the real sufferer. More than the community, it is the church that suffers. For it represents the community, and it assumes a moral leadership which ought to have effect with the men who are the leaders of the capitalistic class, most of whom are in its membership.

It is no time for revenge. It is a time for understanding and careful planning for the future. The church has made ready for this by the very careful and balanced studies it has projected into the industrial situation. Such reports as those of the Interchurch Steel Strike situation, the Federal Council's inquiry into the milk conditions at Lawrence, Mass., and the Street Car Strike in Denver, are the sort of investigations which prove that the church regards the industrial troubles of the present period as rightfully the subjects of solicitude and information on its part, and its conclusions on these matters are entitled to the serious regard of all men of good will, no matter to what group they may belong.

If the retributive policies of certain capitalistic leaders now summoning conferences with the express purpose of waging campaigns against organized labor as such, are to prove effective, we shall probably see very serious conditions before spring. If, however, the church, with its message of moderation and conciliation can secure a hearing, in the pulpit and through the religious press, a better understanding may come to pass, and the foundations of an era of comprehension and good will may be laid. It is the moment of opportunity. There is no time to be lost.

Forlorn Hopes

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me a man, who saluted me and sat down. And he was of a sorrowful countenance.

And he said, O Safed, thou great and wise man, live forever.

And I said, Eliminate that Stuff, and say what it is that devoureth thee: for I behold that thou art in trouble.

And he said, Thy servant is a Public Spirited Citizen in the town where he doth reside, and is chairman of many Committees for the doing of what all men agree ought to be done and no man desireth to do. And behold, there is a great undertaking which hath been begun, and all interest in it hath slumped and our Great Cause is now a Forlorn Hope. And only a Miracle can save it.

And I said, Then let there be a Miracle.

And he said, Thou speaketh as if Miracles were Dead Easy.

And I answered, They are not easy, but they are sometimes necessary. And the most miraculous of Miracles is the resurrection of Forlorn Hopes; but Most Successful Achievements are of that sort.

And I said, Hast thou heard of the Pilgrim Fathers?

And he said, I have known of them all my life.

And I said, Six weeks before the Pilgrims left Holland their adventure was a Forlorn Hope. In the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and twenty, and on the sixth month and the fourteenth day of the month, John Robinson, that man of God, wrote that there was not a man among the Pilgrim Fathers who would then put money into the Enterprise if he had back what already he had put in.

And he said, I never knew that. I supposed that all those Old Saints were sustained throughout by their Faith in God, and their visions of the glorious future.

And I said, It is the habit of God to get men committed to tasks greater than they can achieve and see whether they be cowards or brave men. For no man ever prayeth save when he faceth something bigger than he can do alone. But when a man doth realize that he and God must see it through together, or else give up and quit, then do men pray mightily and go forward, and the sea doth open, or Jordan divide, or mountains remove and become an Highway.

And I said, The statue erected some time ago to the memory of Lot's wife, standeth in comparative isolation; but if every man who had faltered and thought his cause a Forlorn Hope had given it up, then were there no Salt left in the Dead Sea.

And he said, I think I understand.

And I said, Go thou home, and seek the blessing of God anew, and add one more to the long list of Forlorn Hopes that became Glorious Achievements.

The "Long Prayer"

HYMN, creed, and anthem, all at last are done,
And now the preacher, with uplifted hand,
Says, "Let us pray." On guard the ushers stand
To stay late comers. The "long prayer" has begun,

With sounding appellations of our God,
And phrases rich to laud and magnify,
To fill our souls with aspirations high,
Lifting our feet above the earthly clod;

Follow the note of thanks, gracious in length,
And supplication broad and universal,
Of all our needs full and complete rehearsal,
And plea for pardon, wisdom, grace and strength.

The climax of petition now is won,
And with a prayer for potentates we feel
The end draws near—and all our voices steal
Into "Our Father"—the "long prayer" is done.

For A Birthday

WH Y should we reckon up an age by years,
As if to make the way to death the Goal?
We know that life is an eternal thing—
That after Winter's silence comes the Spring.
Then rather count by joys and hopes and fears,
And deeds and thoughts that mark a growing soul.

ELIZABETH ZULAUF.

The Key

WHAT if the door shut-to Leave darkness there within?
How shall I hope to win
The light of life anew?
Thou art the prison-door, and faith in Thee
My candle and my key!

Is The World Growing Better?

By Joseph Fort Newton

TEN years ago the question as to whether the world is growing better or not would have been answered in the affirmative, hot off the bat. But today we are not so sure, so many things having happened betimes to lower the temperature of our optimism. In any case it is not easy to answer the question disinterestedly and without bias, as a recent symposium of English opinion of the subject shows. Tories held that the world is hanging on the ragged edge of ruin, while the Liberals were sure that it is slowly spinning into an orbit of light. Temperament tells. Besides, a sense of humor, to say nothing of humility, may well make us hesitate before deciding too glibly that we are better than our fathers, or that we follow our higher standards more faithfully than they followed the best light they had.

Few realize how entirely modern is the notion of progress and how well the world got along without it. None of the great Greeks thought of themselves as living in a progressive age. For them the golden age was in the past. In the time of Homer the race had degenerated until two men could not lift the stone that Ajax threw; when Virgil wrote it took eight. As in prowess so in intellect; Virgil envied Homer, and Dante envied Virgil; while artists of the Renaissance took their inferiority to the ancients for granted. Yet no more buoyant and helpful work was ever done than by those men who thought of themselves as puny pigmies as compared with the heroes of old. Even now only a small part of the race has any faith in progress as a fact or a possibility. The millions of the East still hold to the dogma of the Eternal Recurrence, the idea that life is a wheel going round and round in endless repetition with no forward movement.

THE IDEA OF PROGRESS

Nor is the idea of progress necessarily bound up with the Christian view of the world. For ages the present world appeared to the Christian mind as primarily a school for the discipline of character, in prospect of the world to come. Until a very recent time most Christian thinkers agreed with Plato when he taught that "our life on earth is like a school, through which men pass and in which they may learn and grow; but the school itself does not go on growing." In the Bible, at any rate, there is always thunder on the horizon, as well as dawn. If it speaks of gradual development, it speaks also of climax and catastrophe. Its outlook includes both evolution and apocalypse, a cycle of prosperity followed by a cycle of disaster. In our day we have had new experience of the Law of Disaster, and it may serve to remind us of the half-forgotten truth that we are pilgrims and strangers upon the earth, as our fathers were before.

Turning to a recent history of "The Idea of Progress," by J. B. Bury, we learn that a French historian, Jean Bodin, about 1560, reviewing the history of the world, was the first man definitely to deny the degeneration of mankind. About the same time Ramus a mathematician, observed that man had made greater advance in one century in works of learning than had been made during the whole course of fourteen centuries. But these men were voices crying in a wilderness. Not until our own age, within the memory of men now living, has our world-view changed from a declining to an advancing race. Looking back into the past, science has traced man up a long, slow, tragic ascent, from a hunter of animals hardly less wild than himself to a user of tools, a maker of arts, a contriver of philosophies, a builder of nations. Not unnaturally such a vision has altered our whole outlook and expectation with regard to our race and its destiny. Having climbed out of such a depth, we can see no limit to its advance in the ages that lie ahead.

EVOLUTION NOT AUTOMATIC

Other ages sought perpetuity; we seek progress. Too often, alas, we imagine that progress will come whether we seek it or not, and that though things are wrong they somehow right themselves; as if evolution were automatic. But that is not so. Progress is not a universal law for all times and all societies, as history has shown us many times. Devolution is as much a law as evolution, and even as to our own time the facts are not all on one side. Angles and distances make all the difference to the eagles and falcons who survey history, but a sentence like this from Mommsen makes one pause and ponder: "If an angel of the Lord were to strike the balance whether the domain ruled by Severus Antoninus was governed with the greater intelligence and the greater humanity then or now, whether civilization and general prosperity have since then advanced or retrograded, it is very doubtful whether the decision would favor the present."

Of twenty-seven men of supreme genius in human history, a recent writer finds ten of them in ancient Athens, implying that if intellect be the test of progress, we have hardly advanced since the fall of Greece. Yet surely the true criterion of progress is not so much the genius of a few as the higher average of intelligence among the many. It is easy to idealize the past. History, like a mirage, leaves the nether side of life in the shadow. It is not fair to set virtues of a distant time, glamored by poetry, over against the vices of today. No, a truer insight is that of Charles de Vas in his "Key to the World's Progress," where he points out that any civilization may advance in one way and retrograde in another. He takes as an example the Renaissance which, as its name implies, was an unparalleled awakening of the human intellect—an age of giants in art, letters, and science—yet probably there has never been an age of more extreme depravity in other ways. Not all the intellectual activity and splendor of that period prevented men from behaving like devils to one another.

THE ROMANCE OF PROGRESS

So, instead of trying to adjudicate between the pessimist with his aches and pains and the optimist with his liniments and lotions, it is in order to ask in what ways our age is moving forward, and in what ways, if any, it is going back. Of the advance of the race on the material plane there is no manner of doubt, and it reads like a romance. We know more of nature and have more power over its energies than any age before us. Humanity has spread out over the globe until there hardly remains a region to be explored. The race is healthier than it has ever been—the plagues of olden times lie like dead snakes beside the road—life is longer, and vigor and endurance have waxed, not waned. Never were there so many avenues for the diffusion of intelligence. They ramify everywhither, so that an idea once uttered strikes a sounding-board and echoes to the ends of the earth. There is more sympathy, more mutual understanding, more knowledge among peoples than ever before, and hence a growing sense of the world as one which is as novel as it is prophetic.

With this facility of information there goes, inevitably, a certain superficiality of thought. Men read more widely and think less deeply than in former times. Modern thought is tolerant, inclusive, wide-ranging, and brilliant, but it lacks thoroughness and depth. Despite much fruitful philosophic insight in our times, we have no commanding theory of life to give unity and coherence to the vast mass of facts accumulated. Herbert Spencer was the last man to attempt a sympathetic philosophy, and no sooner had he set it afloat than it was sunk by a heavy fire of criticism. It was riddled fore and aft by hostile shot, though more of it may yet survive than is seen at present above water. What we need is a new Descartes to keep up the task of unifying our thought, but it may be too great a task for any single man. As the old cathedrals were erected not by individual architects, but by fraternities of builders, so our new House of Doctrine, needed for the habitation and comfort of the intellect, may require the labor of many minds of fellowship.

MORAL ADVANCE

In respect of morals there has been a distinct advance, but it may be doubted whether it has kept pace with achievements in other fields. Yet men now living have seen the downfall of slavery, the victory of temperance over wide areas, the rights of childhood recognized, a new mercy to dumb brutes, and a different attitude toward the criminal, as well as an amazing development of philanthropy; and he must be a hardened pessimist who can face such facts and despair. Perhaps our greatest moral advance is that we now see that wrong is none the less wrong when done by a king, a state, or a church. Huge evils which the past accepted as a part of the order of things now rise up before us in horror, and must be abolished. In his wise little book, "Comments of Bagshot," Spencer tells us that an age must be judged, morally, not by its utterances, but by its tolerances, by what it takes for granted. His words are worth remembering:

When any one tells me that history affords no proof of the moral progress of mankind, I know that, though he may have read history books, he has not read literature to any purpose. It is nothing to the point that there were moral heroes in ancient times; there were happily scores of them. It is the general opinion of mankind, judged by the things it took for granted, which is the test of contemporary morals, and for this we must read literature with a vigilant eye. . . . There is not a Roman or a Greek, a schoolman or a pietist of mediæval times, a Catholic or a Protestant of the Age of the Reformation, a jurist, a historian, or a poet of the Renaissance, who does not complacently accept moral assumptions which are repulsive to the modern mind. . . . Outbreaks of savagery and even persecution are possible in modern times, but the world does not consent.

Judged by this test, a vast gulf separates us from the classical world, in spite of the noble utterances of Plato, Cicero, and Aurelius. We have had savagery in the last seven years, as God wots, but more intense than the hatreds left by the war is the hatred of war itself; and with it has come a conviction, if not a determination, new upon the earth, to make an end of it. On October 13th, 1805, Hegel sat in his room finishing his study of the Absolute. Outside, the armies of Napoleon were girding the city, and the battle of Jena was beginning. Yet even that noble and refined thinker could speak of war as "an indispensable means of maintaining the moral health of nations"—which shows how far and how fast we have journeyed since Jena. War is an old gray evil, having left trails of skeletons in its path since ever time began, but today it is faced by a faith that there is a spirit moving in man, greater than man himself, able to fight and fit to overcome this ancient enemy.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE

Indeed, to go no further back than Meredith, down to the forward-looking thinkers of our time—Wells, Bergson, James, and the rest—one may trace a growing conviction that if the world is to be made acceptable to the conscience of man, it will be through the effort of man himself struggling toward his own ideal. At one time the idea of progress seemed to take the place of faith in Providence; but we now see that to Divine Providence must and can be added a sagacious, practical Human Providence: that the evils which afflict us—spawn of ignorance—need not and must not continue. This is the real faith and hope of our age, as James expressed it when he said that "life is a real fight, as if there were something really wild in the universe which we, with our idealities and faithfulnesses, are needed to redeem; and first of all to redeem our own hearts from atheisms and fears." No longer will men fatalistically submit to evils, however venerable, as eternal or necessary; they gird their swords and make battle. As Carlyle said, man hitherto has somehow stumbled forward, making progress more by Divine direction than by human intention. More and more, in our day, progress is ceasing to be a matter of natural selection, and becoming, for the first time, a conscious purpose of rational man.

World history is becoming one History; and, as M. P. Follett has shown in a remarkable book, "The New State," the basis of democracy is the faith in this essential unity, a unity to be worked out, not yet realized—a faith stirring everywhere in the modern world. Only through all men, said Goethe, can mankind be made. It is Humanity that flies, not the individual aviator alone. A sense of unity, of solidarity grows betimes, deepened rather than destroyed by the world-war, since it involved us in a community of calamity. Our hope lies in the collective effort of humanity, which as yet is but dimly aware of its oneness, and has not yet imagined, much less formulated, what it might do if it worked with one purpose and together. Timidly, tentatively, with many fears and suspicions, races and peoples are beginning for the first time to sit together in conclave, and to take counsel in behalf of the common good. What may not be hoped of men if once they do learn to live with their fellows and work for one end? Even now, though our vision is somewhat clouded by dismaying difficulties and entangling details, we do see a better world at least in outline; and nothing is plainer than that if we are to reach it we must have the finest minds of the whole race. Either we shall win it together, or not at all.

THE GREATER MIND

More than all what we need for the healing of the world is the greater mind, the greater soul, with more knowledge, more sympathy, more hope for all mankind. And that greater, nobler mind will come—is actually coming—as fast as we are worthy to receive it and ready to welcome it. A great man of science has said that "growth of soul is progress" and there is no other progress; with which agrees the word of a man of letters who tells us that the thought of the last fifty years has been an exposition of those words of Keats in which many of us have found comfort and inspiration: "The world is not a vale of tears, but a vale of soul-making." And that means that the individual—you and I, since everything depends on the individual—must win the greater mind; must discover that the good of humanity as a whole does actually exist and dedicate ourselves to its services. For, in the end, whatever large programs we propound, the world will not be better than the men and women who inhabit it.

"Keep on facing it," said the old skipper to the young mate in the Conrad story. Reading on, ere we know it the ship has become a symbol of the life of mankind. MacWhirr decides that the only thing to be done is to keep up steam and sail into the teeth of the Typhoon. Albeit he takes time to quiet the terrified coolies on board, much to the amazement of Jukes. He does not know whether the ship will be lost or not. Nor do we. What he does know is how he must act. But he never loses hope. "She may come out of it yet," that is all he said when driven to speech. When Jukes tells him that the boats are gone, he yells back sensibly, "Can't be helped." And again Jukes shouted to him:

And again he heard that voice, forced and ringing feebly, but with a penetrating effect of quietness in the enormous discord of noises, as if sent out from some remote spot of peace beyond the black wastes of the gale; again he heard a man's voice—the frail and indomitable sound that can be made to carry an infinity of thought, resolution, and purpose, that shall be pronouncing confident words on the last day, when heavens fall and justice is done—again he heard it, and it was crying to him, as if from very, very far—"All Right!"

After this manner one may find strength and hope in a time of rancor and recreation, hearing a voice in the midst of the storm of human circumstances—a Voice like unto the Son of Man—bidding us to be not afraid. There waits in man, to be developed by the Grace of God, a power that will unite him with all other men, linking his fitful will with the Eternal Goodwill, in whose service he shall find fullness of personality and richness of fellowship.

These things shall be! a loftier race
Than e'er the world hath known shall rise
With flame of freedom in their souls
And light of knowledge in their eyes.
They shall be gentle, brave, and strong
To spill no drop of blood, but dare
All that may plant man's lordship firm
On earth and fire, and sea and air.
Nation with nation, land with land,
Unharm'd shall live as comrades free:
In every heart and brain shall throb
The pulse of one fraternity.

Unity and Difference

By Roy Temple House

SOME years ago a very small boy,—who, it may be parenthesized, was the writer,—attended an open air convention in the company of his mother. As they took their places he noticed that a large, important-looking man was seated immediately behind them; and when the audience rose to sing a moment later, the small boy then discovered that this gentleman was attacking the song with great gusto. But, horror of horrors! he didn't sing the tune. While the proper thing to do was to squeak about among the upper f's and g's, this man, who looked as if he ought to have known better, was growling along an octave or two lower. It was really distressing, and the small boy felt almost as if it were his duty to turn round and rebuke the offender publicly. He restrained his indignation, however, till he had left the meeting with his mother; and on the way home he asked her why the man had made such a spectacle of himself, or to put it more accurately, such a tone-poem of himself during the singing. The mother, somewhat puzzled, assured the budding critic that the gentleman was considered one of the best singers in the town, and that she was sure he must have sung properly.

"But he didn't," insisted the boy. "When we sang way up he sang way down, and he'd growl along the same sound for a line at a time without changing."

"FOUR PARTS IN SINGING"

Then the mother understood; and in such lucid language as none but mothers have at their command, she explained to this judge who had passed judgment without adequate data, that there are four parts in singing, and that the most beautiful music is made when certain ones of the singers carry the melody and others, in three groups, follow three distinct paths of tone all of which differ from the path of the melody. This, she said, was harmony, and as there is no music worth the name without harmony, there is no harmony without difference, for harmony is difference.

Then the boy understood that this man, by singing as he had done, had helped the music vastly more than if he had torn his throat trying to squeal along with the sopranos. And since he was a fairly good boy at heart, even if he was inclined to practice what many years later he heard Dr. Charles E. Jefferson call the basing of cosmopolitan conclusions on provincial observations,—since he had a sense of justice below the surface somewhere, he felt very much ashamed of himself, and ever after regarded that man with a respect which was heightened with a touch of contrition.

And the moral is simply this: When you hear a man who isn't singing at your pitch, don't condemn him too hastily. He may be singing bass.

The Church and the Movies

By J. Ray Johnson

WITHIN the last few years, there has appeared a new factor in the world wide dissemination of ideas, knowledge and information, that for the most part has been developed along entirely wrong lines. Nevertheless it is a factor that may be turned into a powerful agency for good, and may be made to serve the high ideals of Christianity as certainly and effectively as that epoch making discovery of the fundamentals of printing by Johan Gutenberg in Strassburg, nearly six hundred years ago.

I refer of course to the motion picture, without question the most popular form of amusement ever devised by man. Since the appearance of the first crude films about a generation ago, the moving picture has spread in favor around the world until now the screened drama and comedy are enjoyed by millions on every continent. The silent story-teller has taken the place of the wandering minstrel of other days upon a gigantic scale, appealing as insistently to the unlettered savage on the fringe of the African jungle, as to the cultured resident of continental and American cities.

It is natural, of course, that an amusement medium appealing so powerfully to the minds of men and having within it the possibilities of tremendous gain should be commercialized almost coincident with its appearance. This is exactly what happened to the motion picture. Small groups of men in this country and in Europe saw bright visions of great wealth in the development of the motion picture and lost very little time in gaining control of the screen. These pioneers in what was destined to be one of the greatest industries in the world's history, were not moved by altruistic motives. They had no thought, nor did they care for the vast educational possibilities contained within the idea. They were not churchmen and so had no conception of the great part the film might play one day in the glorious task of spreading the teachings of Christ to the nethermost ends of the earth. In a word—the moving picture did not come into being as a theatrical agency per se, but was made part of the theater by far-seeing financial minds who recognized in it an instrument that could be made to depict in the most graphic manner an idea or a story to men of all tongues, of all races, and of all degrees of intellect. Here, indeed, was an opportunity to reap immense fortunes and restore the rapidly failing glory of the theater. And, incidentally, here is a great step forward in civilization. The age-old barrier of language is now broken down and the widely divided people of the world are in a position at last to learn of each other's aims, ideals and customs.

PROSTITUTION OF THE SCREEN

To the churchman, or the average citizen, imbued with high ideals, the history of the development of the screen has been a disgraceful story. The most sordid motives of mankind, sex stories of the most alluring type, the rewards of greed and avarice have been spread upon the screen for all the world to see—the young as well as the more mature. The vampire came into being and the thief in evening clothes was glorified. Thousands of young women copied the head dress, the mannerisms and the facial make-up of the most famous screen vampires, and hundreds of our young men, brought to a court of justice, traced their downfall to an attempt to copy the achievements of screen heroes of uncertain morals. Producers attempted to outstrip each other in a perfect orgy of filth. During all this period groups of men and women representing the better elements of society, protested vigorously and tried by legislation and otherwise to control the screen, but the more sharply the protest was made the more luridly the producers advertised their wares and the greater the throngs that flocked to the picture palaces. It became known that all that was necessary to insure great crowds was to obtain the condemnation of the newspapers and the clergymen and to have the picture publicly branded as immoral.

Disgraceful as the history of the film has been, the development was strictly along logical lines. Picture producers had their eyes on the pocketbooks of their prospective patrons and not upon their morals. These men, in business for profit and not for love of church, or love of education, could not be expected to produce anything beyond "box-office attractions" and they soon decided that "box-office attractions" meant sex with a capital S. But in making their huge fortunes the picture pioneers developed and perfected the machinery and appliances that go with the film and studio of today. In doing so they were building far better than they intended. The screen is slowly emerging from the ruck. It is being purified. Educators and Christian men everywhere are recognizing it as a powerful factor for good. The screen is entering upon a new era and it is certainly within the realm of the possible to say that within the next generation it will carry the message of the gospel to the four corners of the earth; that it will aid in restoring life to thousands of Christian churches which have felt the baneful influences of the times, and that it will be used as a mighty weapon against the destructive forces of anarchy that are now abroad.

EDUCATIONAL USES OF THE FILM

Who will say that the screen should be consigned to the theater and made to remain there? Who will say that it is destined to serve always as a purveyor of tawdry tales and slapstick comedies? No student who has cast his eye even in the most casual way over the history of the development of mankind can come to this conclusion. Even before the development of articulate speech our primitive ancestors scratched pictures on the walls of their cave dwellings. The alphabets of modern times were developed from ancient picture writings. In the Middle Ages the most brilliantly illuminated Testaments were the most popular. Throughout all history the picture has been recognized as the simplest and surest method of fixing attention. And times have not changed much, as the billboards, magazines and street car advertisements will prove.

Educational possibilities of the film have been scarcely touched, but there are thousands who say that within a space of ten years every large school in the country will be equipped with motion picture apparatus using the screen more and the blackboard less.

Hundreds of clergymen are using the screen today to good effect, and the number is constantly increasing. In the motion picture field clergymen have encountered an inability to obtain a constant supply of safe films for use in the churches. Producers, of course, have been concerned with the theatrical field and have had little time and less inclination to cater to the ministers. But recently it has been announced that regular programs for churches are available. These programs, made up of one religious picture, a drama, a comedy, a travelogue, a news weekly and educational films, are produced under the supervision of churchmen who know just what the church wants. Here we have a new note in motion picture production and the beginning of the development of a film along entirely new lines.

LATENT ANTAGONISM OF CHURCH

The church is seizing upon this idea with a great deal of enthusiasm, but it has taken hold slowly because of a latent antagonism to new things which still persists in widely scattered groups of churchmen. This leaning toward ultra-conservatism—for it may be that—is not peculiar to Christianity, but seems to have gone hand in hand with religious teaching for many centuries. However, it will seem that in the final analysis, religion has always been spread by taking full advantage of the best means available at the time for the general dissemination of ideas and truths.

Religion had a pretty hard time of it until the coming of the written word with a visible message. Before the Jews took upon themselves some of the culture and civilization of their Babylonian captors they were wandering tribes worshipping Jehovah and Baal at various times, but after the captivity they put their sacred books in concrete form, taking advantage of the first good publicity medium since the development of the spoken word. From that time we find Israel well established. These written records conserved by the Jews formed the groundwork upon which Christianity was later to be built.

As early as 140 A. D. the New Testament was in written form and we learn from the "Shepherd of Hermas," a Roman layman, that many persons gathered often, probably daily, to study and discuss the sacred writings. Many Bibles were painfully copied by hand and distributed among the Christians, but we find, some centuries later, that the conservative element was a bit fearful of using this powerful instrument for spreading the gospel and in the twelfth century it was withdrawn from public use. We hear a great churchman proclaim that "if a layman touch the Bible he is guilty of a sacrilege and should be stoned or shot through." In the later middle ages prohibition against the reading of the Bible was rigidly enforced.

OVERCOMING CONSERVATISM

When Johan Gutenberg struck upon the happy idea of carving letters on a block of wood, thereby producing many copies of a book at one time, he took the Bible as the first book to be printed. An edition was run off, but Gutenberg did not receive the support to which he was entitled by the people of the church. Instead, his creditors seized his type and he found himself without money or support. Laboriously he made another set of type and printed a series of secular books in order to obtain the money necessary for operation. But he did not lose faith, and soon afterwards we find Gutenberg printing a second edition of the Bible.

In our times and in fact within the memory of many who are not much beyond the mark of middle life, the sharp fight waged against the organ as an instrument for use in the church is a vivid memory. The organ was described as an instrument of the devil. It was unclean because it was part of the theater and many of the more conservative within the church would have none of it. Even then, however, ministers were realizing that something must be done to make the church more attractive and the fight of the organ went merrily on. Congregations were split over it and I am not quite sure that the battle isn't being waged in some of the backwaters of our population even yet.

ADVERTISING RELIGION

The question of church advertising in the newspapers is one of yesterday. Advocates of this new method to fill vacant pews maintained that if advertising could sell Battle Creek Breakfast Food and Detroit Motor Cars, it could certainly be a great help in realizing the greatest idea that ever dawned upon the world. In its early stages the fight was sharp but today there is scarcely a newspaper in the country that does not carry its share of church advertising.

The opposition to the motion picture in the church or the parish house is not as deep-rooted, but in some localities it exists, nevertheless. The conservative element declares that the use of the motion picture for the dissemination of ideas and stories is undignified and yet they watch the steady stream of their young people file past the doors of their churches and fill to capacity the picture theatres where they frequently witness spectacles that just scrape the edge of police ordinances.

I confidently look forward to the day when the church shall recognize the film as a necessary adjunct to the delivery of its message in a way to reach directly the hearts of millions who have missed the story as expressed in the spoken word.

CORRESPONDENCE

China Missionary Hurt by Convention Demand

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The Christian Evangelist came last night with its report of the St. Louis Convention. If correctly reported, the convention voted for my "prompt cessation of service as representative of the Disciples of Christ" if I cannot give better evidence of my loyalty to the brotherhood than I have yet given and "thus restore in the hearts of all, complete confidence."

It is contemplated that my avowing now, under the alternative of "prompt cessation of service," the same loyalty we as a mission freely and fully avowed in our letter of January 12, 1920, without thought of compulsion, will be sufficient to create full confidence. Frankly, brethren, I do not believe character and confidence, once destroyed, can be thus easily restored. A statement signed under these conditions will not be of any more value than the testimony of twenty-four years of service, during which I have been as loyal as I have known how to be and have not been guilty of any of the things charged against me so far as I know.

However, I do not very well know the charges. No editor, contributor, or critic of any kind has ever spoken, written, or sent to me a word, written or printed line, to call my attention to any supposed error or fault, to restore me to the right way, or even to let me know the charges against me and ask for explanation or rebuttal. One of my friends did send me one copy of one paper, and a quotation from another, but this was not as a part of the trial by which I have been condemned, and from which the rest of my days will not be enough to allow me to recover.

I trust that in the future others under trial may be given some hearing before judgment is passed, and also that a patient effort be made to get at most of the important facts before any great disturbance is made in the brotherhood.

Now a word as to the mission. Its members have sometimes recognized a Presbyterian, a Methodist, or even a Quaker as a Christian. They have allowed these to work and worship with them. They have counted such as a part of the Christian force standing with them against heathenism. In exceptional cases some of these have been employed. But never so far as I know have your representatives placed such a one's name on the roll when this little group was organized into a New Testament church with elders and deacons. Before this organization, lines have not been so closely drawn. I do not know of any case where one unimmersed has urged that his or her name be written on the roll. When we extend them all possible Christian courtesies, a place for work and worship, they ask no more.

But now union movements are forming. If we go into them in any very definite way we will have to face these questions under somewhat changed conditions. We want to have some share in union movements. The mission faced calmly and as clearly as we could the facts as they appeared at that time with an effort to see whereunto they would lead. We favored presenting the situation to our executive committee, asking their guidance. This the mission did, pledging its loyalty to the brotherhood and asking to know the mind of the brotherhood. We took no vote on open membership or district control of local churches. The executive committee replied that the brotherhood would not favor either of these steps. This was reported to the mission and there the matter has ended. The mission has taken no action since, but should it do so I have no doubt it would be one of hearty and loyal keeping of its pledge made to the brotherhood.

FRANK GARRETT.

Nantungchow, China, Dec. 4.

[The above letter was received just as we were going to press. It is the first communication received from the China mission since the report of the creedal resolution passed by the St. Louis convention in October reached the missionaries. Editorial comment will be reserved until later.—THE EDITOR.]

A Truthful Church Record

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The question of "Open Membership" seems to be the "paramount issue" among the Disciples just now. I think you touched the vital spot in your article, "What is Open Membership?" in your issue of Oct. 28, where you refer to "the so-called right-hand of fellowship and the authoritative church roll" as being "extra-scriptural devices." The question of "open-membership," it seems to me, is simply a question of bookkeeping. We have been trying all too long to keep books for heaven. We have been trying all too long to manufacture a church roll that would correspond to the "roll up yonder."

I favor the abolition of the "authoritative" church roll all together and employing in its stead a type of bookkeeping or record-making that will take account of all those who work and worship with us for what they are, namely, "confessed believers," "baptized believers," "friendly cooperators," etc., etc. In the issuing of a church letter, let the facts according to the case be stated. In the selection of officers and leaders, let the circumstances be considered and the best available material be chosen.

I am writing this to lend endorsement to any and every movement and effort in the direction of the abolition of the unscriptural church roll that has held and is still holding us in bondage.

I vote "aye" for a practice that will be more "apostolic" in the matter of church membership.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Rich Young Ruler *

DO not forget that this young-blood was rich—that was what was wrong. If he had been poorer he would have turned out better. Well, you say, that is a queer word for a preacher to say. Indeed it is, for too many preachers have been fawning upon the rich, and certainly missing the whole point in this story. It is certainly dangerous to be rich. Unless this story brings this out I utterly miss the point. If you don't accept my point of view read again verses 23 and 24. Now, there is only one salvation for a rich man and that is to go in for God full-length. If he compromises or hesitates he is lost. We have in our churches some of the noblest people possible—rich men and women who live for Christ, whose money is at the call of the Master and whose lives are simple and true. Such people are of vast value. But there are other types of rich men. Men who want to run the church as they run their business; men who domineer and browbeat; men who hire and fire; men who will tolerate no ideas not their own; men who, because they know business think they know theology; men who are benevolent for the sake of publicity; men who want the chief places in the synagog. They remind me of superb cats that purr when you smooth the fur the right way, but who scratch and spit in your face when you go counter to their wishes!

A rich man who is democratic is a blessing to a church, but a rich man who is aristocratic is a curse. A rich man who is generous may help the cause but a rich man who is stingy is worse than nothing. Rich men should be treated just like any other men. I would rather have a man give his talents than his money. The church needs his life more than his ducats. A rich man's opinions about theology are of no more value than those of anyone else. Too often a rich man imposes his rigid ideas upon the church he joins. To the preacher he virtually says, "Now we will get along famously so long as you preach what I believe about labor and capital and about theology, but remember, if you dare to have independent notions about these vital things, no matter how true those ideas may be, I will see that your salary is cut, I will not pay my subscription." In that hour the minister either sells his soul or does the opposite. Read "The Community Church" by Jackson, and hear him tell the story of rich churches that he knows.

What will happen if the minister is independent and fearless? He will repel certain rich men and he will attract others. There are rich men who are open-minded and progressive and who like a regular man when they meet him. When they find that the preacher will starve rather than surrender they will back him to the limit. Such men are of the highest value. Enlisted in city betterment, in missions, in building campaigns or in any other major church operations, they toil heroically. There are good rich men and they are apt to be very, very good, and there are bad rich men and they are intolerable.

All the good points of this young ruler could not overcome the sin of his stinginess. He had youth, charm, good clothes, fine cars, morality, reverence, earnestness and a certain (worthless) type of religion. He belonged to the church; he went to church; he held a prominent office in the church. He was a decoration to the morning congregation and a catch for the preacher who got him in. But there was a flaw in the diamond that made it useless. He was tight. It was a plain case of being stingy. His home, his cars, his club, his time and his money were all for himself. Jesus pointed out his lack and invited him to correct it and come into his fellowship. But he could not pay the price and he went away sorrowful.

Rich men will sit in the classes where this lesson is taught. Declare the whole gospel to them. When you talk about the whole gospel here is a part of that whole, believe me. Tell them how dangerous it is to be rich. Win them to a whole-hearted devotion to Christ and his ideals. Wealth is a mighty power for good or ill. Help them to feel the drawing power of Jesus' program for the use of all power—physical, mental, social, psychical or financial. Abused power means hell, used power means heaven. If the rich young ruler had only followed Christ!

BOOKS

THE CAPTIVES. By Hugh Walpole. After an excursion into writing novels of Russia, Mr. Walpole, who is regarded as a coming English "classic," of the caliber of Dickens and Thackeray, returns to the depicting of English life. The "Captives" were Maggie and Martin Warlock, "queer, crooked but ecstatic souls," enthralled by the intense consciousness of a narrow sect. (Doran. $2.)

THE PRODIGAL VILLAGE. By Irving Bacheller. This author is infrequently heard from in recent years, though he was at one time one of the best sellers, as author of Eben Holden, etc. His recent "Man for the Ages" was a sincere and artistic picture of the earlier life of Lincoln. The latest book is a story which carries with it an appeal for the old-time sturdy American ideals which in the opinion of many are forever passing. (Bobbs-Merrill. $1.50.)

ANTHOLOGY OF MAGAZINE VERSE FOR 1920. America is fortunate in having such an industrious critic and editor as William Stanley Braithwaite, who each year gleans from the verse published in two dozen or so magazines, that he considers the best. There are about one hundred poems in this year's vintage. In addition, there is a list of the poems published in these magazines, with other valuable features. (Small Maynard.)

MEN AND BOOKS AND CITIES. By Robert Cortes Holliday. The lively essayist and line-conductor of the New York Sun, here tells of a pilgrimage across the continent, in which he visited Indianapolis, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco and a few other cities. As he journeyed he picked up acquaintance with some new writers such as Carl Sandburg, and renewed his friendship with Meredith Nicholson, Booth Tarkington and others. (Doran.)

Poems of Christian Reconstruction

By Thomas Curtis Clark

A Song for Christian Laborers

NOT only in our churchly shrines
We praise Thy holy name,
Not only by our prayers and vows
We hail Thy sacred fame;
But in our work we worship Thee,
The lowly Nazarene,
To whom all toiling was of worth,
For whom no task was mean.

May all our labors be to Thee,
Dear Master of our life;
Inspire our hearts with songs of joy,
Rebuke our selfish strife;
In grimy shop and busy mart
May we not waste nor shirk,
But ever conscious of Thine eyes,
Loved Comrade of our work.

The City

THE city that we seek
Is not of gems and gold;
No citadel of light
Shall to our eyes unfold:
Today we slowly rear
The city of God's own;
Within the hearts of men
We build it, stone on stone.

The streets are not of pearl
Which thread that city fair;
No walls of emerald
Or amethyst are there:
With stones of loving deeds,
With walls of kindly thought,
We build that Kingdom blest—
The city "God hath wrought."

No man shall dwell therein
Who labors but for self;
No one shall tread its streets
Who serves the god of self,
But each shall work for each
And greed shall be forgot,
For love abides therein
And hatred cometh not.

The city that we seek
Is not of gems and gold;
No citadel of light
Shall to our eyes unfold:
Today we slowly build
The city of God's own;
Within the hearts of men
We build it, stone on stone.

The New Eden

WHEN every child shall, through his native gift,
Be truthward led along the ways of joy;

When every man shall at his labor lift Hand, head and heart to God, who gave employ;

(When every one an artist soul shall be,
At forge or easel, at the desk or loom,
Then through his task shall every man
be free,
And none shall toil, as captive to his doom.

Cities shall then become the shrines of art;
Towns, gardens all, shall blossom as the May;
Laughter shall thrive, of every life a part,
And rest await each man at close of day.

Then shall be born the kingdom of the blest;
In every heart shall love exalted be;
Then God once more shall see His garden
drest
With flower and fruit, and every pleasant tree.

Sons of Promise

IN every meanest face I see
A perfected humanity;
All men, though brothers of the clod,
Bear promise of the sons of God.

No human ore that does not hold
A precious element of gold;
No heart so blackened and debased
But has for Him some treasure chaste.

The Golden Age

THE golden age will dawn
When man shall dare to be
From false ambition free,
His goal the truth;
When every youth
Shall seek, not wealth and fame,
But this—a spotless name.
Righteousness shall be bold
In that fair age of gold.

The golden age will come
When men shall work for joy;
When each shall find employ
Suited to each;
When toil shall teach,
Not bring the soul disgust;
Men will not hear, "Thou must!"
Labor will not be sold,
In that bright age of gold.

The golden age on earth
Will be a time of peace;
The wars of greed shall cease;
Envy shall fail,
Mercy prevail;

Creeds shall not separate;
Caste shall be out of date;
Love shall all hearts enfold
In that fair age of gold.

The Touch of Human Hands

THE touch of human hands—
That is the boon we ask;
For groping, day by day,
Along the stony way,
We need the comrade heart
That understands,
And the warmth, the living warmth
Of human hands.

The touch of human hands—
Not vain, unthinking words,
Nor that cold charity
Which shuns our misery;
We seek a loyal friend
Who understands,
And the warmth, the pulsing warmth
Of human hands.

The touch of human hands—
Such care as was in Him
Who walked in Galilee
Besides the silver sea;
We need a patient guide
Who understands,
And the warmth, the loving warmth
Of human hands.

The Coming

CHRIST will come to earth again;
He will come to dwell with men;
He will meet them in the mart;
He will greet them heart to heart;
He will make all hard things plain,
When He comes.

Christ will come again to earth;
Then shall be a new world-birth;
War and armaments shall cease;
Every land shall bide in peace;
Swords will be of little worth,
When He comes.

Christ will come, aye, He will come
Not with trumpet blare and drum;
But with lives of kindness
All men shall His Name confess;
There shall none be blind or dumb,
When He comes.

Christ will come to earth—and then
Love shall reign supreme with men;
For the hardness of our creeds
Will give way to loving deeds;
Heaven and earth will meet again,
When He comes.

Bishop Burch Meets Untimely Death

Bishop Charles Sumner Burch, of the diocese of New York and in the fellowship of the Protestant Episcopal church, passed away on December 20. The cause of his death is traced to overwork in connection with the plans for the Cathedral of St. John the Divine and in the work of administration. Bishop Burch was born in Pinckney, Mich., June 30, 1855. He took his B.A. degree from the University of Michigan and studied theology at St. John's, Md., and at Hobart. He was engaged in the publishing business in Chicago between the years of 1876 and 1890 and was editor and manager of the Grand Rapids Evening Press from 1897 to 1905. He was fifty years of age when ordained a priest in the Protestant Episcopal church, and he served as priest in St. Andrew's Church, Long Island, New York, between 1905-1911. He was then made suffragan bishop of New York and in 1919 he became bishop of New York, succeeding Bishop Greer. He tended to conservatism, especially in the field of economics, but had a genius for administration. He is one of the few examples of a man going into the ministry late in life and achieving the most eminent position in the gift of his church.

Episcopalians Use Noted Chinese Christian

The first Christian consul to be sent to America by the Chinese government is C. I. Surz. He is a graduate of St. John's University of Shanghai. His family have been in the church for two generations. In America the National Student Council provides organization for the foreign students, and Consul General Surz has been made first president of the Chinese Episcopal Club of New York, which is a branch of the National Student Council.

Catholic Church Makes Great Headway in Diplomacy

The program of the Vatican in extending the temporal power has never made more headway in a single year than during 1920. There are now diplomatic interchanges between the Vatican and the British, French and Swiss governments. While these governments have but little business with the Catholic church, they have found that many of the international intrigues are born in Rome, and it is impossible to remain outside the circle where information is to be gained. Russia and Sweden still refuse any recognition of the Vatican, as do Mexico and certain of the South American countries. So long as the League of Nations does not function vigorously there seems a probability that the Vatican will be a force in the international intrigue which is now busy remaking the map of the world.

Pope Puts Y. M. C. A. Under the Ban

The hostility of the Roman Catholic church to the Y. M. C. A. has come out into the open. During the war there were frequent attacks upon the organization, and it was openly charged by Protestant leaders that this opposition could be traced to the door of the Catholic church. In the future there will be no doubt. The Pope has issued a decree naming the Y. M. C. A. and asking the bishops to watch an organization which "while professing absolute freedom of thought in religious matters, instills indifferentism and apostasy to the Catholic religion in the minds of its adherents." The association officials in New York deny that the association is ever used as a proselyting organization, though the evangelical test of membership does not permit Roman Catholics to become active members in the association.

Ministerial Prospects in Various Organizations

The statistical work of the Council of the Church Boards of Education has brought home to the various denominational leaders the magnitude of their problem in providing competent and educated leadership for the churches. Some denominations have thousands of men with less than a college training and with practically no training in the disciplines of a theological seminary. The northern Baptists have been graduating from their institutions only one man for every 24,146 members and many of those of this number are from the Divinity School of Chicago and go into the ministry of other communions. On the other hand the United Presbyterian church is graduating one minister for each 7,854 members and these men are going into the ministry of this denomination almost exclusively. The Reformed church and the Lutheran church have good records in the matter of the ministerial supply, but the five great evangelical bodies have records that are almost uniformly low, the Presbyterians presenting statistics rather more favorable than those of the other large evangelical groups.

Memorial Services for Rev. A. McLean

Memorial services are being held in various parts of America for Rev. A. McLean, the missionary leader of the Disciples of Christ who died in December. Chicago Disciples are being called together for this purpose by the Disciples' Club, and many of the churches in southern California have already held such a service. On the Pacific coast the gatherings assumed the form of a double memorial, part of the service commemorating the life and labors of Prof. D. R. Dungan, formerly a Bible teacher in Drake University. The life work of A. McLean has been so well done that the missionary work of the Disciples is expected to go on now to the realization

Divinity House and Church Reach Building Goal

GR^{EAT} rejoicing characterized the watch night meeting of Hyde Park Church of Disciples, Chicago, when Dr. Edward Scribner Ames, the pastor, announced the successful finish of a two years' canvass for $200,000 with which to provide two buildings on the commanding corner across the street from the University of Chicago quadrangle where the present modest church structure stands. One of the new buildings is to be the habitation of the Disciples Divinity House, a theological training school for graduate students, and the other the house of worship for Hyde Park Church. The church edifice will occupy the corner of the spacious lot. It will be used by the Divinity House organization as a chapel and the Divinity House building will be accessible for the church's use for social, educational and community activities. The fund represents over two hundred gifts. It had been announced a month ago that $170,000 had been pledged, much of which was contingent upon the total sum being secured by January 1. Up to the last day of the old year the success of the enterprise was still in suspense. But on that day a gift of $10,000 received by Dr. Ames removed all doubt. The chief credit of this achievement belongs to Dr. Ames, who has solicited all the gifts personally or directed the activities of his helpers in the church and the Divinity House board of trustees. His parishioners marvel at the capacity of their minister, at the versatility and practicality of his leadership in a campaign of this sort which was undertaken in addition to his academic responsibilities as professor of philosophy in the university. The affection in which he is held not alone by his congregation but in the entire community was capitalized by the noiseless and patient quest for this fund. Dr. Ames' public interpretation of religion and his personal illustration of it as a true shepherd of souls is proverbial in the entire university community. The present achievement is the most brilliant and substantial in the history of the Disciples communion in Chicago. With adequate building facilities the Disciples Divinity House will be in a way to realize its dream of more than twenty years. And with an adequate and commanding house of worship the already crowded Hyde Park congregation will no doubt enter upon a new era of growth and service. It is hoped to begin building operations during the coming summer.

Churches Plan for United Work

The churches of the various denominations at work in Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, met recently in New Castle and spent a day in consultation over a unified program. It was decided to make the evangelistic interest primary during the coming year. The outstanding features of their plan include the idea of a survey of the entire county to determine just who are outside the churches. Personal work will be organized and the spiritual phases of religion will be given emphasis. There was common agreement that the evangelistic approach should be entirely devoid of "professionalism." Among the addresses at the conference were two very helpful lectures by Rev. L. G. Batman of Youngstown, O.

Dr. Willett's Visit to the Pacific Coast

During a portion of the winter, particularly the month of February and the first half of March, Dr. Willett expects to visit the Pacific coast in response to numerous invitations for lectures and addresses. He will go primarily in the interest of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. It will be his purpose to interpret the entire cooperative movement among the churches, the work of the Federal Council, the growth and service of city and state federations and councils, and other phases of present day effort at closer cooperation. He will speak at several of the educational institutions on the coast, and on the way out and returning. He will also deliver lectures on biblical, educational and other timely themes under the auspices of groups of churches and other agencies. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Willett.

Feel that we Have Enough Federations

No greater need has existed in Protestant Christian work in America during the past ten years than a federation of our numerous federations. One after another national movement has been launched in New York, sometimes without consulting the officary of the various denominations and the entire church of the land has been summoned to cooperation under the pain of being considered disloyal. The Federal Council recently appointed a group of representatives to confer with the receivers of the Inter-church World Movement, and with the organized forces of home and foreign missions. The findings of this group were as follows:

"It is the sense of this conference that the churches possess in the existing agencies sufficient organizations for the needs of their cooperative work at the present time if these agencies are adequately developed and correlated:

"That it is desirable that these agencies should be encouraged and enabled to develop their activities so as to provide adequately for their expanding tasks and responsibilities and that they should be given for this purpose the fullest measure of freedom and confidence;

"That they should, at the same time, maintain and utilize the relations of consultation and affiliation through the Federal Council which have been established;

"That they should appoint also a committee on consultation, made up for the present of three representatives (from each of the bodies represented in the conference, which should meet periodically to consider matters of common interest, and, further, that this committee should meet as early as possible and study the problems of cooperation among these denominational agencies and report to a later conference before May 1."

Will Hold Mid-west Meeting on Christian Unity

An interdenominational meeting was held in Union Avenue Church of Disciples, St. Louis, recently, to consider the practicability of holding a conference on Christian union in which would be represented all the churches of the mid-west. A favorable decision was reached and the Second Baptist Church of St. Louis was chosen as the place of meeting, with the date fixed for Feb. 2-4. The conference will be set up by the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, a Disciples organization of which Dr. Peter Ainslie is president.

Overture on Women Elders Carries

The Columbus (O.) presbytery recently considered two important overtures from General Assembly, one on the question of the plan for organic unity known as the "Philadelphia plan," and the other on the matter of women elders. The overture on church unity was rejected while the overture for women elders was passed by a majority of one vote.

Well-Known City Leader Called to Another City

Kansas City is probably the strongest city center of the Disciples denomination. Many of its great churches are located there and there is a constant reaching out into new fields. For the past twenty-four years Rev. Frank L. Bowen has been the leader of the extension work. His policy has been to organize a new church and stay with it himself until it was safely on its feet. This policy has been carried out by means of the active support of all the churches of the denomination in the city. Their official boards maintain a unified organization for the direction of city mission work. Mr. Bowen has had a call recently from Los Angeles where he could serve a strong group of churches in the same way as he has been serving in Kansas City. He has not yet announced his decision. It seems unlikely that he will consent to sever his relationship with the Kansas City churches where his work continues fruitful.

Catholics Will Lobby Against Educational Bill

The National Council of Catholic Men is a new organization which helps to give coherency to the laymen's organizations of the Roman Catholic church in America. All of the laymen's organizations of the church are to be federated in this organization. The strength of the National Council of Catholic Men will be mobilized against the Smith-Towner bill in Congress, which provides for a federal department of education, and makes appropriations to aid the states in educating the immigrants.

Federal Council Questions Fairness of "Open Shop" Movement

A STATEMENT bearing on the present "open shop" agitation has been issued by the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. The questions raised by the commission are of especial significance in view of the revelations of the Lockwood Housing investigation in New York. The commission believes itself to voice the representative Protestant view on the "open shop drive" which is in thorough accord with the recent utterance of the National Catholic Welfare Council. The statement of the commission is as follows:

"The relations between employers and workers throughout the United States are seriously affected at this moment by a campaign which is being conducted for the 'open shop' policy—the so-called 'American Plan' of employment. These terms are now being frequently used to designate establishments that are definitely anti-union. Obviously, a shop of this kind is not an 'open shop' but a 'closed shop'—closed against members of labor unions.

"We feel impelled to call public attention to the fact that a very widespread impression exists that the present 'open shop' campaign is inspired in many quarters by this antagonism to union labor. Many disinterested persons are convinced that an attempt is being made to destroy the organized labor movement. Any such attempt must be viewed with apprehension by fair-minded people. When, for example, an applicant for work is compelled to sign a contract pledging himself against affiliation with a union, or when a union man is refused employment or discharged, merely on the ground of union membership, the employer is using coercive methods and is violating the fundamental principle of an open shop. Such action is as unfair and inimical to economic freedom and to the interest of society as is corresponding coercion exercised by labor bodies in behalf of the closed shop.

"It seems incumbent upon Christian employers to scrutinize carefully any movement, however plausible, which is likely to result in denying to the workers such affiliation as will in their judgment best safeguard their interests and promote their welfare, and to precipitate disastrous industrial conflicts at a time when the country needs goodwill and cooperation between employers and employees."

Presbytery Is Opposed to Plan for Organic Unity

The Presbyterians are not unanimous for their own plan of organic unity for the evangelical churches in America. The presbytery of Pittsburgh recently with unanimous vote rejected the overture for organic unity. It is objected that the present plan before the churches does not merge the churches into one church but provides a large area of denominational autonomy. It is also objected that the plan does not declare whether it is only provisional or final. The Pittsburgh ministers insist that the so-called "Philadelphia plan" is only another Federal Council, and that the present Federal Council serves very well as a church federation. Criticism was also made of the technical form in which General Assembly sent the overture to the presbyteries.

Minister Being Considered for Yale Presidency

There are three candidates under consideration for the presidency of Yale University. These are Dr. Fred T. Murphy of St. Louis, Prof. Herbert E. Hawkes of Columbia and Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin of New York. The New York minister seems at this time to be the leading candidate. Dr. Coffin has been pastor of Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York since 1905. He was educated at Yale and Union Seminary, taking a B.D. degree at the latter institution in 1900. He is forty-three years of age and has a number of strong books to his credit. He is one of New York's most successful and convincing pastors.

Democracy Coming in Church of England

The past year has been a revolutionary one in the Church of England. The National Assembly, created by act of parliament, meets for five days three times a year and has power over most of the ecclesiastical matters which in the old days would have come before parliament, the matter of church doctrine being alone excepted. The National Assembly has a large body of laymen in its fellowship and one of the first acts of these laymen was to provide for a parochial church council. This council would not have the power to call a rector, but it could protest to the bishop against an undesirable appointment. In the long run the bishop would have to take these protests into account. Thus the episcopal power tends to be limited by the new democratic sentiment that is touching most of our social institutions.

Three New Missionary Bishops Chosen

The Protestant Episcopal church is increasing its force of missionary bishops. The Michigan Churchman reports recent progress in this direction as follows: Meeting in St. Louis, October 27th, the House of Bishops elected three bishops for the missionary fields of Salina, Honolulu and Liberia. The Rev. Robert H. Mize for the missionary district of Salina (comprising the western half of Kansas), is the rector of St. Paul's Church, Kansas City, and has spent his entire ministry in that diocese. Rev. John D. La Mothe, elected to succeed Bishop Restarick, was born on the Isle of Man June 8th, 1868. He has been rector of the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, since 1916. Rev. Theophilus Momolu Gardiner, elected bishop-suffragan of Liberia, is a native Liberian, ordained to the diaconate by the late Bishop Ferguson in 1896 and to the priesthood ten years later. At the present time he is president of the Council of Advice of Liberia and is missionary at Hoffman Station and in the Sodoke District. He will be the first native Liberian bishop to be consecrated, Bishop Ferguson, though of African descent, having been born in America, from whence he went to Liberia with his parents when he was a child.

Preacher with a Remarkable Gift

The ability to remember names and faces is one of the valuable gifts possessed by a public man. The sincerest compliment a celebrity ever pays the ordinary citizen is to remember him. The southland has a minister who is probably the greatest genius to be found in the entire country in remembering people. Rev. William M. Anderson, D.D., formerly preached at Nashville, Tenn., and while there he learned the names of forty thousand people. His reputation for memory has gone far and wide. He is often put to the test in interesting ways, but seldom fails. He is now pastor of First Presbyterian Church in Dallas, Tex. During a ministry of 32 years he has married 1,800 couples.

Divinity Students Seek Independent Schools

The young theologian does not propose to have a blind bridle put upon him by a theological school these days. Figures recently gathered are quite startling as showing the growth of independence in the various denominations. The

Association of Agricultural Missions

WHILE the majority of the people in the United States live in cities, it is not so in other parts of the world. In foreign mission fields particularly vast sections of the population live in the country. India is made up of millions of rural people and it is estimated that three fourths of the missionary territory of the world is rural. In view of these facts the recent gathering held in New York under the auspices of the International Association of Agricultural Missions takes on deep significance. The growth of the spiritual life is to be coupled up with agricultural progress, if the plans of these religious leaders are carried out. The Association is barely a year old but it brought together missionary secretaries, presidents of agricultural schools and other prominent leaders. Rev. Edmund de S. Bruner, Ph. D., reporting the meeting, says:

"It was declared that the non-Christian farmers need agricultural training, which means that our church educational system in non-Christian lands should be changed from the predominant literary type to a predominant vocational type. Teaching must be by demonstration, and it must reach the people at the point of their greatest need. It was stressed again and again that there must be central training schools of agriculture under union auspices. Only so can the expense be borne, for vocational education is more costly than that of any other type. Such a system of education can correlate agriculture into the program of a socialized church and school, and together raise the people up to the power of self-government and co-operation.

"Sam Higginbottom, of Allahabad, India, spoke very forcefully on the whole situation. He held strongly that men must be trained to work by themselves for their fellow men, that they must be made self-supporting. Not to so train them is to defeat the very object of missions. He described the system of cooperative credit by which in certain communities in India the native can obtain credit at nine per cent, instead of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty per cent, as charged by the village lenders. Cheap credit, however, must be accompanied by the agricultural training which will bring about increased production. Only in this way can full advantage be taken of cheap credit, and only in this way can the Indian make the first step toward a self-supporting Church.

"It was significant that there were representatives from half a dozen or more of the agricultural colleges. They declared that they were agreed to adjust their curriculums so as to give training to the agricultural missionaries. Two of them, President Butterfield, of Massachusetts Agricultural College, and Dean Mann, of the New York School of Agriculture, spoke. Others of the speakers included: Dr. Warren H. Wilson, Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, New York; Dr. J. H. Reisner, University of Nanking, China; Dr. William E. Strong, secretary, American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Congregational Church; Dr. Thomas S. Donohugh, Methodist Board of Foreign Missions, New York; Professor Edward Alsworth Ross, State University of Madison, Wisconsin; Professor D. J. Fleming, Union Theological Seminary, New York, and Dr. T. H. P. Sailer, Teachers' College, Columbia University, New York.

"The Association discussed its program for the year ahead which will include an effort to enlist students in the work, reaching especially agricultural college men, and an effort to present foreign missions to country churches in the home field from the standpoint of rural life and needs in heathen lands through lantern slides, and an effort to serve as a clearing house to boards who plan to send out agricultural missionaries.

Congregational young man seems most of all independent of the denominational leading strings. So-called Congregational seminaries are educating 67 per cent of their students for denominations other than their own, while 40 per cent of the Congregational students are studying in institutions controlled by other denominations. The Disciples seem to show an almost equal degree of independence these days. This is probably due to the fact that only in recent years have true theological seminaries been developed among them. There are at the present time 72 Disciples in the better known theological schools outside the denomination. The Methodist institutions receive very few students from outside the denomination, but many Methodists avail themselves of the opportunities provided by other denominations. The Presbyterians provide instruction for 143 outside the denomination while 66 of their men are studying in non-Presbyterian institutions. There is less independency among the Baptists than elsewhere among evangelical denominations. The students in recognized institutions of all denominations are 4,931, an astonishingly small number.

Disciple Fund Comes in Slowly

The difficulty of collecting long-time pledges scattered all over the nation is well illustrated in the case of the Men and Millions Fund of the Disciples. They were the first people to undertake one of those nation-wide comprehensive devices for funds which afterward became familiar to all denominations. Their success in getting five year pledges for about seven million dollars emboldened religious leaders of other communions to undertake more ambitious plans. On the seven million dollars, payments began to come in in 1913 and since that date the collections have been $3,923,072.38. Nearly a million dollars has been collected the past year. The expenses incurred by the office in collecting money the past year have aggregated $22,252.88.

University Preachers at Chicago

The list of preachers at the University of Chicago for the winter quarter is a particularly imposing one. Some of the most eminent preachers in the land take part in building up the religious life at the university. On January 9 and 16 Bishop William Fraser McDowell, of Washington, D. C., will be university preacher; on January 23, Dr. James E. Freeman, of St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis, Minnesota; and on January 30, Dr. James Wellington Hoag, of the Woodward Avenue Baptist Church, Detroit, Michigan. The first preacher in February will be President J. Ross Stevenson, of Princeton Theological Seminary, who will be followed by Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York City. Rev. George C. Pidgeon, of the Bloor Street Presbyterian Church, Toronto, Canada, will preach the last two Sundays in February. The first preacher in March will be Rev.

Hugh Thomson Kerr, of the Shadyside Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh, Pa.; the convocation preacher on March 13 will be Dr. Henry van Dyke, of Princeton University.

Seven Pledged to Religious Service

The Christmas service in First Christian Church, Hastings, Neb., was a rendition of "White Gifts for the King." The occasion was made noteworthy this year by seven young people pledging themselves to religious work, either in the ministry or on the mission field. Seven others united with the church. A large sum was raised for the pension fund of the church. More than a thousand people were present. The need of recruiting the ministry is felt everywhere these days and it is significant that at the very service where ministerial pensions was the central interest the young people should consecrate themselves to the gospel ministry.

Great Building Collapses as It Nears Completion

The Disciples of Christ in southern California have been watching with interest the growth of the new church edifice at Long Beach, which was being erected at a cost of $200,000. As the building neared completion, the dome fell and carried portions of the walls in with it. The accident happened just at the coming of the noon hour when most of the workmen were out of the building and only four workmen were injured. It will now require another hundred thousand dollars to complete the building, but this amount is being subscribed. The congregation is deeply thankful that the accident happened when so few people

Churches to Work for Prisoners

THE New Testament ministry provided for the needs of prisoners, but in many cases this work has been neglected in modern times. The federal prisoners at Atlanta, Ga., have been specially in the eye of the nation on account of the numerous Conscientious Objectors confined there. This prison at the present time holds Eugene Debs, socialist, candidate for president. The needs of the prisoners first came forcibly to the attention of Dr. L. O. Bricker, pastor of First Christian Church. He called together his fellow-churchmen, and they decided to form the Churches' Prison Association. Dr. Bricker has been made president of this organization.

A study of the denominational preferences of the prisoners was made, and is interesting. Nearly every religious denomination has brethren in this prison. The largest number, 551, claim affiliation with the Baptist church. The Roman Catholics have 483, and the Methodists the third largest number, 348. The Holiness church, whose members profess to be beyond sin, have two members who seem to have been mistaken in their assurances. Even so young a denomination as the Christian Scientists have 9 of their brethren in this prison. The study of the prisoners by age is also significant. Under 20 years of age there are 195; between 20 and 30, 850; between 30 and 40, 466; between 40 and 50, 245; and over 50, 142.

The churches have divided their work into two general divisions. There is the work for the prisoners in confinement and the work for those who are released. The first and most obvious thing is the personal visit on the part of some Christian person. It is the hope that many religious men in Atlanta may take under their spiritual care some person of the same denomination. Besides visitation, there is correspondence, and a much larger circle will be enlisted to write letters. These letters will open up personal problems and give much ethical advice and religious instruction.

Many of the prisoners need legal advice which they are not able to employ. The prisoner confined illegally has always been a person who particularly drew upon the sympathies of the Christian church. Christian attorneys will endeavor to provide aid for these. The churches will hope also to cooperate with the prison night school in providing occasional lectures. Men who are pursuing higher studies in the night schools often need books which they cannot procure. These books will be furnished so that no ambitious man will be compelled to lose entirely the years which he spends in confinement in expiation of his offences against the law.

The work for the discharged prisoner is even more urgent for it is in this period that so many men with good intentions slip back again into the evil ways of the past. Prison discipline is not always conducive to the formation of strong, self-reliant character. These men will, as far as possible, be provided with positions and surrounded with brotherly oversight until they get firmly fixed in these positions.

The families of prisoners are also the subjects of concern on the part of the churches. Many people come to Atlanta to visit their loved ones in the prison. The churches will endeavor to locate these people wisely and look after their needs.

In days gone by the ministry to prisoners has been left largely to other organizations than the church. Mrs. Maude Ballington Booth of the Volunteers of America has done a significant work. It is evident, however, that the prisoner will receive more help from the religious organization that influenced him in childhood than from some society whose vocabulary is strange and which awakens in him no memories of other and better days. Churches in other cities which have penal institutions will watch the outcome of the Atlanta program with great interest.

were exposed to the danger, and the thought of a possible catastrophe after the building had been completed is a sobering reflection to the entire membership.

"Feed the Theologs" New Slogan

A new slogan seems to be arising in church circles: "Feed the Theolog." Rev. Ashley S. Johnson, who conducts a self-help school in the mountains of Tennessee for Disciple ministerial candidates of limited means has asked for business men who will feed the students just one meal. The Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Richmond, Va., recently received a barrel of apples from a Southern church. Many of these institutions make their appeal to young men in limited circumstances and the amount of aid necessary in educating ministers is greater than in some other callings where the financial remuneration is more attractive.

Church Building Will Be Resumed Again

The building of church edifices came almost to a standstill after America's entrance into the war, but the necessities of the churches are driving them to undertake building enterprises, even though the prices are still very high both for labor and materials. The Presbyterian Board of Church Election has appropriated a million dollars for new building enterprises during the coming year. In other denominations there are plans for many new buildings for the year 1921.

Veteran Baptist Minister Meets with Accident

Dr. John Clifford is one of the best known Baptist ministers in the world. His ministry in Great Britain has made him a national figure in that land. He was recently knocked down by a taxicab and seriously injured. His physicians say he will recover, but they will not allow him to make any public addresses for some time to come. He tends to make light of his mishap and says, "It was a very bad way of beginning my eighty-fifth year."

British Preacher Denounces Slanders

One of the most esteemed ministers in London is Dr. J. Stuart Holden, rector of St. Paul's, Portman Square, Church. He conducts an evangelical "low church" service and attracts large congregations especially of the young people by the ability and graciousness of his preaching. He recently spoke on slander, showing how it hardened public men to any sort of constructive criticism. He was particularly caustic with those orthodox religious folk who slander preachers on account of liberal views.

Death of Noted Religious Leader

The announcement of the death of Dr. Abraham Kuyper of Holland brings to mind a unique career. Dr. Kuyper was scholar, preacher and politician. As Premier of Holland he formed a coalition with Catholic conservatives and successfully combatted radical tendencies in the government. He was also a conservative in theology, opposing the radical views of certain Dutch scholars. His theological magnum opus is the Encyclopedia of Theology.

Ministers Consider Revival of Pastoral Activities

The ministers of the United Presbyterian church in Pittsburgh spent two Sunday mornings recently in a study of pastoral methods. They make no secret of the fact that there has grown up among modern ministers considerable dislike for the customary parish methods. Some ministers make no house-to-house calls except in the case of illness. Dr. J. D. Rankin spoke to the Pittsburgh group on "Most Efficient Methods of Pastoral Visitation." At another meeting of the same group of ministers the topic was "The Pastor's Best Work in the Parish."

Congregational Ministers Dine with Unitarians

Unitarians and Congregationalists in New England are breaking down the middle wall that once separated them and now find it possible to have fellowship on many occasions. Recently the Congregational ministers of Boston adjourned their regular Monday meeting at Pilgrim Hall and joined their Unitarian brethren at Unity House in a luncheon presided over by Rev. Harry Foster Burns. Speakers for the Unitarian Forward Movement provided the program.

Japanese Still Suspicious of Christians in Korea

The Japanese police in Korea continue in their attitude of suspicion toward the native Christians of Korea. Although announcement has been made that corporal punishment has been abolished by the courts it is still employed by the police before trial and conviction. Recently a group of students set out on a preaching tour. They were arrested on suspicion, and all but one are still held in jail.

Lutherans Want Americanization Defined

There is a definite suggestion in the Lutheran that the present Americanization movement define more accurately its terms. Recently a community club for foreign born in a large city declared that it did not want its girls Americanized. The parents said that American girls were out till twelve or one o'clock without chaperones and they did not wish to have their own daughters act in this way. All over the country there is need that Americans should themselves be Americanized if they are to convince the newcomers of the validity of their ideals.

Dr. Newton's Sermons Attractive

Probably no preacher in America is attracting more favorable attention just now than Dr. Joseph Fort Newton. His sermons are published weekly by the Murray Press and sent to a large mailing list. His vesper services at the Church of the Divine Paternity in New York are attracting widespread interest. Teachers are advising their pupils to attend the services. The subjects for December were "Jesus and George Eliot," "The Wisdom of Meredith," "Kipling," "The Literature of Childhood." Dr. Newton is in great demand at church conventions throughout the east.

British Table Talk

London, December 7.

THE demonstration of ten thousand people in the Royal Albert Hall on Saturday afternoon, December 4, presided over by a Conservative M. P. belonging to a ducal family, and addressed by an ex-Prime Minister, an ex-Lord Chancellor, an Anglican bishop, a representative Free Church minister, a woman Labor leader, and Britain's leading woman preacher, made it quite clear that, while no true Britisher sympathises with Sinn Fein outrages, the mass of English, Scottish and Welsh people detest and are ashamed of the blind and futile policy of reprisals. In this matter the British government do not represent the nation. Lloyd George possesses an uncanny power of hypnotising his followers, distorting their vision, beclouding their judgment. Sane men and women, who do not allow themselves to come under the spell of the little wizard from Wales hold that, however great the provocation, nothing can justify visiting the sins of the guilty upon innocent men, women and children, and destroying the property of owners whose only crime is that they happen to be fellow citizens of rebels and murderers. Lord Henry Bentinck, Mr. Asquith, the Bishop of Peterborough, Lord Buckmaster, Dr. Horton, Miss Margaret Bondfield, and Miss Maude Royden, evoked storms of applause when they insisted that the heart of the British nation beats with passionate sympathy with Ireland, ardently desires to treat her not only with justice but with generosity, yearns for peace and fraternity between the two peoples. The "Westminster Gazette" says: "Never before have women speaking to men roused such passionate response in the Albert Hall." One is reluctant to make a comparison of solemn events, yet we ought not to miss the significance of the fact that, while many thousands of Londoners lined the course of the funeral procession of the British officers who were foully murdered by Sinn Feiners in Dublin, in order to pay these martyrs to duty a tribute of respect, still more thousands, the "Daily Mail" being witness, stood on the sidewalks when the corpse of the late Lord Mayor of Cork passed by. A great protest meeting, addressed by Sir John Simon, Sir Horace Plunkett and Mr. G. K. Chesterton, has also been held in the Central Hall, Westminster, and similar meetings are being arranged. The Baptist Union and other religious bodies have passed resolutions at once expressing horror and indignation at the Sinn Fein policy of assassination and calling upon the government to suppress reprisals with the utmost vigor. On all sides the demand now is, If we cannot have peace at once between Britain and Ireland, let us at least have an armistice, in the hope that at this eleventh hour the basis of a permanent settlement may be arrived at.

Bible Criticism for the Plain Man

The Religious Thought Society does useful work by giving quiet people an opportunity of hearing at small gatherings qualified speakers discuss important themes. "Gospel Criticism for the Plain Man" was the title of an address on December 3 by Canon Barnes. While the processes of scholarship will, he said, never create faith—for faith rests on values, and values seem to wither under logical dissection—yet the results of sane Bible criticism are of importance to those who wish to have an intelligent foundation for their religious belief. If established results were generally accepted, eager partisans in current religious disputes would find some of their favorite weapons blunted, and thereby the cause of Christian reunion would be advanced. But no effective use can be made of the new knowledge until the plain man, the ordinary woman, the Christian in the pew, accepts it. These people must be helped to see that we now know Jesus and the content of his teaching with a new certainty, that the Lord's human and spiritual greatness are revealed as never before; while at the same time we can trace in the Gospels the growth of that human element which is the cause of most of our present unhappy divisions. Dr. Garvie, principal of New (Congregational) College, a cautious scholar, agreed with all that the canon said, contending that instead of religion being in any way impoverished by the results of modern scholarship, it was relieved of accretions trying to faith. Unreasoning traditionalism was responsible for a great amount of atheism and scepticism. When modern methods of scholarship are applied those things that divide Christendom most are found not to belong to the authentic message, the original revelation of Jesus Christ, but are later developments. The dean of St. Paul's associated himself with the previous speakers. Here, he said, you have three church dignitaries, with characters and reputations to lose, who are willing to accept the conclusions of modern criticism with regard to both the Old and the New Testaments. Ten years ago it would have been impossible for them to do that; it was an unmixed gain that at last their tongues were loosed. They still believed in the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and he was convinced that as critical results became diffused in the churches the effect would be not to destroy people's faith but to confirm it.

The Youngest Bishop

The appointment of Canon William Temple to the See of Manchester gives universal satisfaction. Son of an archbishop, he was born to the ecclesiastical purple, and has proved equal to its demands. For a time he was a headmaster, like his father, Dr. Temple, whom the boys called "a beast, but a just beast." Then he became rector of St. James', Piccadilly, resigning the charge to devote himself to the Life and Liberty Movement. This led to the promotion of the Enabling Bill constituting the National Assembly of the Church of England. The movement will now set itself to realize the aims of the Lambeth Appeal and its efforts will be greatly facilitated by having its leader on the episcopal bench. With the approval of the two archbishops, the organizers of the movement have decided "to press forward with all their strength during the winter and early spring to preach the message of the fellowship of man with God, and of man with man, as set out in the great Lambeth Conference report." Their immediate objectives will be to rouse churchmen to the absolute necessity of a real League of Nations, peace in the industrial world, and reunion of the churches. Bishop Temple has always supported interdenominational efforts. He has shown his keen sympathy with the workers by joining the Labor party. Aged thirty-nine, he is the youngest bishop on the bench, and looks even younger than his years. In fact, in appearance he is rather like a fat and jolly schoolboy.

Love Off to the War

By Thomas Curtis Clark

DR. JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, until recently minister of the City Temple, London, now of New York City, says: "Thomas Curtis Clark has an authentic mission as an interpreter of the deep things that matter most." Henry van Dyke says: "I find both thought and music in his verses." John Masefield, the leader among modern English poets, and Sara Teasdale, America's most famous lyricist, pronounce his poems "charming." Edgar DeWitt Jones, author of "Fairhope," "The Inner Circle," etc., says: "Mr. Clark is a poet of the inner life, an interpreter of the soul, a seer of the realm spiritual."

In this book, which is his latest collection, are gathered 125 poems, practically all of which are quotable. The book is beautifully printed and bound, making a perfect gift.

Preaching and Paganism

By ALBERT PARKER FITCH,

Professor of the History of Religion in Amherst College.

THIS volume contains the Lyman Beecher Lectures on Preaching for 1920, which were delivered by Dr. Fitch this year, under the auspices of Yale University. In this book the author "asserts the eternal and objective reality of that Presence, the consciousness of Whom is alike the beginning and the end, the motive and the reward of religious experience."

FOUR HITHERTO UN- PUBLISHED GOSPELS

Being a series of character studies cast in the form of personal memoirs of John the Baptist, Andrew the Brother of Simon Peter, Judas Iscariot, and James the Brother of Jesus.

By William E. Barton, D D.

Author of "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln," "Wit and Wisdom of Safed the Sage," etc.

THESE brief "new gospels" while of course wholly imaginary in form are based on the facts found in the Gospels which have been skillfully woven into historic unity so that the setting of each story has the vividness of reality. The narratives display true dramatic instinct and the character analyses rare psychological insight. The author says in his preface: "These narratives make no pretense of antiquity. They are a modern attempt to discover what kind of side-light would have been cast upon the ministry of Jesus if four other men, beside the four who have told us of him, had written brief stories of what they saw and thought about Jesus."

Religion and Business

By Roger W. Babson

MR. BABSON is known as President of the Babson Statistical Organization, and as an expert in the science of business. But he is also a sturdy believer in the possibilities of the church. Here is the closing paragraph of his book:

"It is not the purpose of this book to suggest details of a plan for redeeming the world, but rather to emphasize the fact that the world can be redeemed socially, industrially only through religion. Governments may succeed in protecting men in freedom of effort and rights of ownership; but only religion can energize men unto a maximum of useful service and make them content with a simple material reward."

Some Chapter Titles

Business Men and the Church.
Rich Men's and Poor Men's Churches.
Religion and the Wage Worker.
Natural Law Underlies Jesus' Teachings.
Training Our Children in Religion.
The Greatest of Undeveloped Resources—Faith.
Religion and Personal Efficiency.
The Religion Which Will Survive.
The Interchurch Movement.
The Great Opportunity for the Church in Industry.
Can Religion Be Subsidized?
Immediate Problems Facing the Church.

The Outline of History

A Plain History of Life
and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Ernest Baker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Prof. Gilbert Murray. Illustrated by J. F. Horrabin.

HERE is history from the beginning of life on our earth so far as we can trace it by paleolithic records, through the civilizing and decivilizing ages down to yesterday. And much of it is history from the standpoint of common sense. We would hold this view even after you pointed out that Mr. Wells does irreparable damage to many an ancient convention and orthodox tradition. He trains his guns fearlessly on superstition, on corrupting tradition, on historical malpractice.

The author's conclusions stimulate thought. He is an optimist. He sees a new sanity emerging from the hatreds of the war. He looks for a revision of ideas and institutions and the development of a citizenship of the world, with the breakdown of nationalism. Religion to his mind has been obscured by creeds—"the old political and social assumptions, the old religious formulas have lost their conviction." But he expects the future to bring a brotherhood of men rather than of nations, wider education and a religion apart from forms and creeds. Man is to become happier and more contented on earth. He does not seem to fear that, judging by the rate we are going, the old ball may become cold before we achieve that ideal.

This will be the big book of the season. Every thinking citizen of these pregnant times should have it.

In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

Solving the Minister's Problem

An Extract from Lloyd C. Douglas'

"Wanted—A Congregation"

... "Crowds? Do you know of very many preachers, Tom, who are surrounded by crowds, today?" Blue spoke bitterly.

"Not many—no. But there are enough to point the moral. You speak as if the people of Middlepoint were not very faithful in their church attendance. Don't you have a good congregation in your church, Dan?"

"About—one hundred and fifty on Sunday morning, when the conditions are just right—the weather, you know; and the season."

"How many people would your church accommodate?"

"More than six hundred, it is said."

"Ah—so that is the trouble!" MacGregor had the air of one unearthing a secret. "I can tell, by your tone, that you are discouraged, Dan. Now I know the reason. It is because you are seeing no results. You would preach like a house afire if you had a congregation! Lacking a congregation, you haven't very much interest in the job—now isn't that so?"

The preacher nodded affirmatively. MacGregor grew spirited.

"That's exactly what ails the preachers of this country, at the present moment, Dan. Nobody to preach to! Why, I can see the whole problem as clearly as if I were its own mother! The preacher knows that he is going to face a small group of lonesome people, scattered in little squads over a big, three-fourths empty meeting-house. It will be exactly the same bunch that was there last Sunday—a few less, perhaps, but no more. So—he gets to work on a sermon for that little handful. Not much wonder if he can't put his full energy into it. Yes, sir; I can see how it would be. Take my own case: If I knew, as I sat down to write an editorial, that the edition of The Star containing it would be limited to one hundred and fifty copies, I would go at it with utter disinterest. Not that these people wouldn't be worth talking to; but because it would be a confession of complete defeat and collapse if my paper were unable to do a larger business than that. But when I know that every pen-stroke means something to twenty-five thousand people, I spur my mind to its best endeavor! Now, suppose, Dan, that you knew, to a moral certainty, that you would have a crowd, next Sunday morning—a compact, shoulder-to-shoulder, alert congregation—wouldn't you go to your task of sermon preparation, with an entirely different attitude than usual?"

"Yet, Tom," sighed Blue, "It is the old story of 'which comes first—the hen or the egg?' To get a crowd, a man must know how to preach with great vigor. To preach with great vigor he must have a crowd. I defy any man to do his best work with a despairing little handful in a vast tank that is built to hold four or five times as many people. It can't be done! Very well; what is he to do about it? Suppose he decides that a large congregation is the only solution to his problem! How does he go about it to recruit it? I'm sure I don't know. I wish I did!"

MacGregor was reproaching himself bitterly for having permitted and encouraged the conversation to this unpleasant quarter. Fine way, indeed, to spend an hour with his old friend of college days—to hold up a mirror so that he might see how feeble were his endeavors. Yet, he had a feeling that to change the conversation now would mean nothing less than that he considered Dan Blue's case beyond help. No; he had gone into this thing, with his eyes open. He must see it through.

"See here, old chap; you've simply got to buck up! I know you! I've heard you speak! I've heard you pour yourself out, many a time, in a way that sent the creeps up and down my spinal column! You've got it in you to be a successful and happy preacher! Give you a crowd—the promise of a crowd—and you would surprise yourself and all your friends in Middlepoint by the sudden release of a volume of unsuspected pulpit power! I know it!"

Blue felt an instinctive tightening of his muscles, a quick—

A Prayer for Guidance in Praying

HEAVENLY FATHER, who art ever reaching into our lives with gentle hands of love, seeking to do us good and to lift us over the barriers that obstruct our way, quicken in our hearts a due sense of Thy nearness, of Thine approachableness, and of the sure reward with which Thou dost enrich all those who practice communion with Thee. Forgive us that we make such hard work of prayer. Our minds are beset with doubts and misgivings and the inhibitions of mortal misunderstandings, so that our souls lack freedom and confidence in Thy presence. Woven in with all our golden impulses and hopes are the leaden instincts of passion and self-seeking which, when we look into Thy face, O Holy One, turn our words into ashes upon our lips.

Lord, teach us to pray! Remove from our hearts those things that hinder and embarrass our fellowship with Thee. How can we find inward peace, how go forward with firm feet, how attain the fair prizes of joy and influence and character save as Thou showest us where Thou hast hid them? And how canst Thou show us these fine meanings and values of life, save as we open our thoughts and our lips in easy communion with Thee? May Thy holy presence dissipate our doubt and Thy grace cleanse us from guilt and Thy purity burn from our minds all base desire, so that, having clean hands and a pure heart, we may ascend into the hill of the Lord.

Show us, our Father, what to ask for and how. Make us acquainted with Thy nature and character so that we shall ask only for those things that belong to Thee to give. Forbid that we ask amiss, even for the gifts Thou wouldest willingly bestow. Train in us that fine instinct of reverence which prompts Thy children both to shrink from approaching Thee and yet to dare to approach Thee. And may we keep open the pathway to Thy presence by oft traversing it in humble and earnest desire to know Thy will. In the name of Christ. Amen.

German Church Arising From the Ruins

DURING the war the future of the German church seemed dark enough. Tens of thousands were availing themselves of their privilege of renouncing their membership, partly to escape an insignificant taxation, but more especially to show their contempt for the state church. From the time of Martin Luther, the prince was the episcopus of the German church, which was supported by taxation. In the revolution the church has been disestablished and compelled to find its own support. The social democracy did not take away the endowments, as has been done sometimes in a revolution, but the tax machinery may no longer be used for the church. If German Christians at first believed that this would prove the ruin of their church, they are now happily disillusioned. There is evidence of a real spiritual awakening in Germany. It was only two years ago that the great historian, Harnack, declared that the German church was bankrupt. He probably would not speak in this tone at the present time. The new day has dawned because the church has become a truly democratic institution. Even the women of Germany are given a vote in ecclesiastical affairs. Meanwhile the churches in other sections of the world may well watch the new era in German religion. There is little enough democracy in any of the churches. In America, where there is no prince and no parliament to control religion, there are often forms of control more odious and more dangerous. More than one evangelical denomination has found itself intimidated at its national meeting by some prince of plutocracy who threatens to withdraw his support from missions or education if the more liberal thing is done. Self-perpetuating oligarchies find methods of continuing themselves in office long after they have forfeited popular support and good-will. Democracy may mean occasional errors in judgment, but it will never mean an alienation between the church and the masses.

America and Disarmament

IT has seemed lately that America alone stands in the way of the reduction of armaments. Secretary Daniels has been carrying the big stick and talking about an eighty-eight ship program for the next three year period. There is nothing for England to do in the face of such an announcement but to try her best to meet the ship-building ambitions of the United States, even though she becomes delinquent in her financial obligations to America. But there are signs of approaching sanity in the councils of the nation. President-elect Harding has been holding conferences and it is reported that he hopes to open negotiations with the great powers on the subject of armaments. He will hold diplomatic interchange with Great Britain, France, Italy and Japan. Mr. Lloyd George has recently declared that the terrible race for armaments must be stopped. The situation is now plastic and strong affirmations on the part of groups of citizens in this country may result in saving all the money that is needed to rehabilitate a broken and discouraged world. To go on in the mad race for armaments means wasting the money that should be used to restore the industries and feed the helpless little children who will perish without help. This is the time to agitate world peace. When the passions and prejudices of war arise, there is no opportunity. But America holds the key to the peace of the world, and the church holds the key to America. Men and women who hate war may accomplish more during this new year than they will have an opportunity to accomplish for a generation afterwards.

Religion and the Bolsheviks

AMONG the delusions of the Russian Bolsheviks was the idea of abolishing religion. All over the country signs were posted which said, "Religion is the opium of the people." The revolution really hoped that among its other reforms it would demonstrate to the world a nation in which there was no religion. Probably for a little while this onslaught produced effect. The church had the misfortune of having been maintained under the patronage of the old government. But readjustments have come very quickly in Russia. Travellers returning from that country either express doubt about the Bolsheviks' ability to defeat religion, or else tell enthusiastic stories of the revival of religion. Having been freed from the repressing influence of the state, the Orthodox church tends to become more evangelical. Rev. Francis E. (Father Endeavor) Clark is hopeful of a strong Christian Endeavor movement in that communion, a thing not to be dreamed of a few years ago. The philosopher Berdiayev, who speaks with authority concerning the Orthodox church, said recently: "A new Orthodox church is being raised, a more Christian, a more liberal church. The revolution brought freedom to the Orthodox church; it has liberated it from bondage. Of course, all this is still dim and indefinite. But then the Russian church is now only in the course of reformation, and her future outlines are only beginning to emerge from the dim mists." Thus we are seeing before our very eyes a demonstration of the truth that no people lives long without religion. The death of all religion means the end of national life. Churches come and go. Germany may change from Catholicism to Protestantism, or Spain from Mahomedanism to Christianity, but in the long run a people will have its religion. Those who have lived in fear concerning the future of religion in America should learn from the course of history how "incurably religious" man is. The problem is simply whether we shall have a religion that is rich enough and rational enough to help or hinder human welfare. Religion is perennial because man's thirst for God is inherent and ineradicable.

Prolonging Ireland's Agony

WITHOUT doubt the Irish question would have been settled long ago had it not been for the interference of private citizens in the United States who have foreign loyalties. Yet the story of crime and reprisal still goes on. There is much in the story that is not to the credit of the soldiers of Great Britain. There is even more that is not to the credit of the citizens of Ireland. There can be only one solution thinkable, and that is compromise. Even if the United States wanted to intervene, she would have to defeat the British navy before any effective action could be taken. Such an idea is preposterous at the present time. The United States does not want to do anything of that sort. We are quite willing to give passports to any of our citizens who want to fight for Ireland. We only wonder that they have not left long ago. The settlement of the Irish question will never be made in Washington. It will be a compromise settlement that will be drawn up by sensible Irishmen and sensible Englishmen. The one thing that inhibits this settlement is interference in the United States. The Irish settlement might come in six weeks. Conceivably it could be delayed for six years. If delayed, it would be at the cost of Irish lives and British lives. The British government is willing, and long since has been willing, that Ireland should have self-government. Other sections of the British Empire live loyally within the empire with every freedom which is enjoyed in the United States. Ireland can have this freedom once she relinquishes the idea of a sort of independence which neither the British Empire nor the rest of the world can afford to give her. Whoever delays the day of good understanding between Ireland and Great Britain sins against the peace of the world. In Washington there should be an end of petty political play, now that our national election is over.

The Poor Anglican Bishops

CONSIDERABLE perturbation obtains in certain Anglican quarters over the poverty into which war taxes have thrust their bishops. There are many noble men among the Anglican bishops, some of whom would no doubt welcome an enforced simplicity of living that would better befit ministers of the lowly Carpenter, but the "establishment" has historically put them in the Roman Catholic category of "princes of the church" and bestowed upon them palaces and incomes that run an average of more than $25,000 per year. The palatial homes and a style of living that keeps them in the social classification of the aristocracy are required. The salaries were fixed eighty years ago and according to prices in those days were munificent. Before that day a bishop often received hundreds of thousands per year. In the forty years of his official life one of them received a total of more than eight millions. The Bishop of London has two palaces in the city and the Archbishop of Canterbury lives in one of the greatest of England's historic palaces in the heart of the city and draws $75,000 per year. Even then he is doubtless able to save in an official life-time no very great fortune, so extensive are the conventional demands for luxurious entertainment and living. On the other hand the curates and the majority of the clergy live on the most pitiable salaries. The Anglican church has so long lived as an almoner of public and ancient endowment that the rank and file have no training in habits of church support. It would be a most wholesome thing for that great church if it were put on a basis in both finance and privilege with all other Christian charities in Britain. It ill befits a democracy to make its chief servants of the Lord munificent princes.

The Cosmogony of Modern Religion

EVERY one of the higher religions has its own cosmogony. The story of beginnings in the Old Testament repeats older stories found in the Babylonian religion, translating their polytheism into monotheism. The Greeks in their mythology tried to account for many things that have puzzled the mind of man. Since the days of Charles Darwin a new cosmogony has been superseding those more ancient. Built upon the hypothesis of evolution, it has recounted the story of the origin of life and the descent of man, or as Henry Drummond preferred to call it, the "ascent of man." It was a brilliant literary enterprise to tell the story elaborated by science with the pen of a journalist and novelist. That is what has made H. G. Wells' "The Outline of History" the great success that it is coming to be. Of course no one reads this new cosmogony without feeling that it, too, lies largely in the field of fancy and hypothesis. Like the cosmogonies that it supersedes, it is the work of imagination. Yet it is a view of the world into which the little fragments of our knowledge concerning the early history of the planet and of human life fit better than in any scheme yet devised. Progress involves the idea of arrangement, order and improvement. Even a man who, like Mr. Wells, finds his intellectual rootage outside the church cannot think of his universe without some conception of God. When the new cosmogony is consciously adopted by the church it will carry with it profound consequences. A redemption made necessary by reason of an Adamic fall from an innocent state of perfection gives place to a redemption whose essence is the process of completing an imperfect being. The task of the kingdom will be wrought out in patience, once we recognize how near we are to the Neanderthal man with his bestial life. But the new cosmogony sets Jesus Christ forth in a new light. The gulf between him and the "natural" man is greater than ever. But his significance for mankind is more convincing, more realistic and thrilling with grace and hope.

The Mystic Power of Biblical Passages

ALL readers who are sensitive to the music of great utterances have thrilled at the power of some telling verse from the classics, and particularly at the effect of some apt sentence from Holy Scripture woven into the texture of written or spoken words. In that wonderful passage in "The Tale of Two Cities" in which the euthanasia of Sydney Carton is described, half the magic of the narrative is imparted by the sudden and apparently unconscious interjection of the majestic utterance of our Lord, "I am the resurrection and the life." A notable illustration of the same compelling quality of biblical phrases was given during the recent meeting of the Federal Council in Boston. Urgent pleas had been made by Mr. Hoover in behalf of the starving children of Europe, and by others in reference to those in Armenia and China. Then Dr. Speer, the presiding officer, without introduction or comment, read the great passage from the Gospel of Matthew giving the Savior's statement of the reasons for the heavenly welcome of the kind in heart. Never had the tremendous words, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these," seemed so solemn and so pregnant to those who sat in the hush and emotion of that hour.

Quackery in Religious Therapeutics

IT has been a task of centuries to curb quackery in the medical profession. With the aid of the law, a powerful organization of men of science have done what they could to keep good the credit of a great profession. The nobler the profession, the greater the temptation to misuse it. It is not surprising, therefore, that religion has had its quacks as well as medicine. The prophecy-monger and the faith healer have been the foremost of modern quacks. A big banner across a street in Pittsburgh announces that after 1925 death will be optional. Any man who has the least idea that this promise can be fulfilled will investigate.

He is then led into a maze of Bible interpretations, and in this field he may not be expert. If the thought of death has troubled him a good deal, he may grasp at a straw and claim the miraculous thing that is offered. This offer is put forth by the followers of the late Pastor Russell, of Millennial Dawn fame. This sect set 1914 as the time for the end of the world. The world stands pretty solidly yet, and things seem to be running along quite well. We imagine that the undertakers will continue to do a thriving business even after 1925. Nothing else has ever hurt their business, and it will take more than prophecy-mongers to stop them. In the name of religion, faith-healers have extorted extravagant sums from trusting patients. This was one of the scandals in connection with the founding of Zion City. Evangelical religion is not as skillful in advertising itself as are the religious fakes, and it has an unfortunate way of hiding its light under a bushel, but in the long run the people must turn to it for the spiritual medicine that heals and saves.

The Child in the Midst

THE gracious season of the holidays, through which we have just come, is a fresh reminder of the place which the child holds in modern life. The child is the center of the Christmas joy and gift-bestowing. The shop windows glow with toys and treasures which make their appeal to childhood. Most of the Christmas festivities are graduated to the spirit and appreciation of children. In a peculiar sense Christmas is the children's festival. And this is the more appropriate since its motive is the remembrance of the Child whose birth made beautiful and sacred all childhood henceforth.

But this is only a symbol of the growing degree in which the child is taking the center of the world's attention in the lands of Christian civilization. The most interesting studies, those of origins, nurture, nutrition, education, manners, physical welfare, housing, industrial solicitude, and the moral life, have their beginnings and incentives in the child. He is our most precious possession. He demands and secures the regard of every class in the community. Literature, art, manufacture, salesmanship and recreation all revolve in growing measure about the little child.

For this reason the appeal for help in behalf of destitute populations takes increasingly the form of entreaty in behalf of children. Mr. Hoover is asking for great sums of money for the relief of the starving in central Europe, and the heart of his message is the cry of the little children, whose fate will determine the character of the future Europe for generations to come. The Near East Relief is bringing continuously to the attention of Christendom the appalling conditions in Armenia and Syria, and its story is that of the children of these devastated regions, whose experiences have been among the most tragic in the history of persecution. China is calling with pathetic insistence for help from the rest of the world, and it is the childhood of that stricken land that appears to the informed imagination in the attitude of pitiable entreaty for aid.

The ancient tradition affirmed that a pilgrim came upon a little child waiting at one of the fords of Jordan for someone to help him over. Though carrying his own burden, he lifted the child and bore him across. Then to his astonished gaze the little one took on the form of the Christ Child, and in the calendar of the church that pilgrim has evermore been known as St. Christopher, the bearer of the supreme Child of the ages. And St. Christopher has become a symbol for all mankind, for those who help to make childhood more wholesome and happy are bearers of the Christ himself.

The surest guarantee of a healthy and efficient citizenship for the future is a happy and nourished childhood today. And one of the dangers that threaten such a future for the nation is the prevalence and increase of child-labor. The little children of America, of all lands, have an inalienable right to be well born, properly nourished, comfortably housed, sufficiently educated, and given the leisure which offers opportunity for vigorous and happy play. They have the right to their great inheritances from the past—political, social, intellectual, moral and religious. Yet tens of thousands of American children go almost directly from the cradle to the mines, the factories or the fields, for such forms of work and such hours of toil as make health and happiness quite impossible.

The pictures of the dwarfed bodies and the joyless faces of little children to be found by the thousands in industrial centers where lax child-labor laws prevail, or better laws are evaded, are depressing and alarming. They form a sinister prophecy of the sort of people who are to be the fathers and mothers of the next generation, even if they survive to the age of parentage. Child-labor is one of the problems which the nation must face with resolution and insight. It is pitiful that millions of children will starve unavoidably this year through the tragic calamity of famine, in spite of all that we can do. It is vastly worse that thousands of our own American children should starve both intellectually and physically, through the draining of vital energies by needless and criminal child-labor practices.

It is a satisfaction that the National Child Labor Committee is urging the observance of Child Labor Sunday on January 23. No theme is more vital to the nation's health and welfare. We are rightly taking the gospel of the Christ Child to the non-Christian lands where childhood is so teemingly increased and so recklessly wasted. It has been one of the satisfactions of the missionary to point out the difference between the childhood of the Christian Bethlehem or Nazareth and the Moslem Hebron or Nablous; between the safeguarded and cherished children of Christendom and the stunted and neglected children of most of the non-Christian world. But a better record must be made in the case of our own child labor slaves if the comparison is not to be a mockery.

The gospel of Christ is a gospel of childhood. The Master set a little child in the midst of the group of his disciples one day, and told them that of such he made up the citizenship of his new society. To that place of central importance the child has evermore the right in a Christian civilization. For the children of rightly ordered families there need be no anxiety on the score of care and opportunity. It is the other children that must be guaranteed their rights. It is not enough that the children of the resourceful have proper attention. All children in the community and in all communities are rightly the children of all good fathers and mothers. A woman who had lost her only child remarked recently: "I have learned through this experience that no woman has the right to be the mother of her own children alone."

The Question of Hours

SINCE Judge Gary and the Steel Corporation have given wide circulation to the address of Rev. E. Victor Bigelow of Boston, that document in criticism of the Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike of 1919 takes on a significance more important than the personal opinion of its minister author could give it. One reads the address with the feeling that the clergyman "doth protest too much," and if, as Mr. Bigelow charges, the Interchurch Report was tainted with the spirit and language of special advocacy, it is unfortunate that his own utterance is so flagrant an exhibition of the same spirit of partisanship. The Interchurch Report, whatever its faults, was at least very definite in its statements regarding working hours, wages and working conditions. The impartial student would welcome a plain simple statement of facts in rebuttal, if there are such to present. Pending the arrival of such a statement one is hardly able to disabuse one's mind of the notion that there must be considerable fire where there is so much smoke, so long as the strictures of the Interchurch Report are met with abuse and rhetoric, or with statistics that are mere generalizations, rather than with detailed evidence on the matters at issue. The villification of Mr. Foster, just or undeserved, by no means implies the vindication of Mr. Gary and the corporation of which he is the head. Nor is the issue merely that of the justification or condemnation of the strike, the conditions under which it was waged, and the methods by which it was conducted. Two wrongs do not make a right. The average citizen may be very much inclined to cry: "A plague on both your houses!" Yet back of the episode of the strike are the permanent facts and conditions. These all men want to know.

Back of the questions of control in industry and the larger question of social amelioration, all of us want to know whether men are working unduly long hours, or receiving inadequate wages, or being housed under unhealthy and squalid conditions. One particular value of the Interchurch Report was its amassing of information of this sort, on a basis of wide and detailed investigation. Mr. Bigelow's address deals with some matters which in their interest and bearing lie quite outside of the strike controversies. One of them is the matter of hours of labor. Mr. Bigelow is very contemptuous of the Interchurch Report's advocacy of the eight-hour day, and pours scorn upon what he calls the "heresy" of the Federal Council of Churches in the inclusion in its industrial creed of the principle of "reducing the hours of labor to the lowest practicable point." Mr. Bigelow is rather too scornful. If he had read some such book as Kropatkin's "Fields, Factories and Workshops," dealing with the possibilities of better organization and more efficient methods, he would understand the sheer nonsense of saying regarding the eight-hour day, that "man's needs are so many that it is physically impossible to produce what we need in these hours." And, if he had looked into William Morris' "Useful Work Versus Useless Toil," he would have learned from a glorified craftsman the spiritual and social maleficence of the spending of a single hour more than is necessary in routine labor.

If Mr. Bigelow means merely to point to the dignity and spiritual usefulness of work, he has chosen a most unfortunate context in which to sound his eulogy. We all believe in the gospel of work, even of hard work, at long hours, if it be work of the right sort, properly appealing to man, and properly expressing his spirit. But to defend the long working-day of modern mechanical industry by a reference to the sacred words of Christ: "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," is little short of blasphemy. God, after all, is probably not hurt by blasphemy; but the chains of men are drawn a little tighter by such words, and there is such a thing as blasphemy against the holy spirit of man. When one realizes from observation and intimate contact with "workingmen" what long hours of labor have meant in their individual lives and homes, it is hard to be patient, or courteous, toward such diatribes in the name of religion. It is a perversion of the holy gospel of work to base uses, and one could only wish that Mr. Bigelow, and all who write so lightly of what is veritable life-tragedy to so many of their fellows, could look on those whom they have pierced.

Look on a picture of what a long working-day actually means. For many years the standard workingday was a day of ten hours. Under simple and rural conditions that was probably not excessive, but it means something quite different under modern city conditions. One may leave aside, for the moment, the artistic or spiritual considerations involved and confine one's observation to the superficial facts. The ten-hour day has usually meant from seven a. m. to six p. m. The worker must be on hand to begin work at seven. He is fortunate if he can reach work, on a crowded street-car, in less than one-half to three-quarters of an hour, and in many cases it will require longer than that. He cannot get home for dinner, and it requires the same length of time, or probably longer, owing to the rush hours, for him to get home at night, as it did for him to go to work in the morning. Suppose he is a man with a family. He leaves home in the morning before his children are out of bed, and if they go to bed at the hour that is customary in well-regulated families, unless he is very favorably situated, he barely sees them at night. He has Sunday, unless Sunday, too, happens to be taken away from him—and the enthusiasts for long hours of labor have never been conspicuous by their enthusiasms for Sabbath observance.

This means that the average man who works ten hours a day, in a modern industrial city, does not get even a reasonable chance to know his family. How men do conspire in the face of hard conditions, and such lack of opportunity, to become really good husbands and fathers, is a matter of amazement; but in a vast number of cases, perhaps in the majority, the bread-winner is a comparative stranger to the home and family which he supports. A ten-hour work day involves the sheer destruction of opportunity for life's satisfactions in relation to the higher type of home and family.

Judged from this standpoint, the emergence of the eight-hour day is much more than a gain of two hours. That two hours spells all the difference between opportunity and lack of opportunity. A man who quits work at five has a chance for a quiet evening with his family, or to go out somewhere in the evening with his wife, whereas a ten-hour-a-day man has little such opportunity. How many people who work ten hours a day ever get to a church or social supper or neighborhood entertainment? The fact is that a great range of enjoyments and opportunities possible for people who consider themselves hard workers are inevitably shut off from those who follow the deadly routine of a ten-hour day. Even a nine-hour day effects great possibilities.

Mr. Bigelow seems to have a glimpse of the real truth, when he says: "The ordinary man who works eight hours in paid employment puts in several more hours in making his home." That is cold fact. Nothing, unless it be the abolition of the saloon, has done more for the improvement of the outward environment of home-life than the winning by great numbers of workers of shorter hours of labor. Only those who have an eight-hour day could possibly put in "several" hours more in home-making. Can it be possible that Mr. Bigelow does not believe in home-making, and that it is only work in steel and other industries that is to be encouraged by the divine example? It is most amazing that one can appreciate the right use that many eight-hour-a-day people have made of their leisure, and yet be an apologist for a twelve-hour working day. The only explanation would seem to be that Mr. Bigelow has been swept by his special advocacy into loose and extravagant expression, and does not mean what he says. Surely there is utter perversity in his attempt to show that the movement for the reduction of the hours of wage-labor to a minimum is at variance with the gospel of work as a factor in the upbuilding of homes and characters, and above all with the performance of the sort of work that Jesus referred to, when he said: "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day."

The fact is that if the work of Christ is going to be done in the world, there must be time found for it. To spend the vast part of one's time in commercial and industrial toil, either by compulsion of circumstance in the case of the ordinary laborer, or by ambition and choice as in the case of many business-men, so that there is no time for worship and service in connection with the church, or for participation in the higher arts and fellowships of life, is not Christian; and the sooner the church sees and declares the fact, the better.

Few things are militating against progress toward a better world so much as over-work in commerce and industry. The laborer and his family are not the only ones who are suffering. Workers in the higher walks of life, if they could be brought to realize it, are deliberately starving intellect and soul, and the community is suffering. Men who, by nature and equipment, are competent to do much to solve the great problems of society and industry, have not time to study facts and situations, and the result is that their energies and great powers, in so far as they bear upon social issues, are directed by prejudice and self-interest. We are paying a tremendous price for the ignorance of the average American business man of everything outside the range of his own business pursuits and ambitions. The average business man is rather contemptuous of the average professor and minister, whom he regards as "impractical" and "visionary." Probably a fair proportion of professors and ministers do lack "horse-sense," and good business judgment; but the business man fails to realize that of the remainder many are men of sound sense and clear judgment, who would have been successful in any career they might have chosen, and that their so-called visionary and impractical notions are based upon careful consideration of a wide survey of facts and information, such as the average business man does not take time to acquire.

A Church Program

MANY churches go through the year and through the years with no program of activities, no goal of accomplishment. They trust for advancement to incidental circumstances, such as the special popularity of a particular pastor, or the curiosity roused in new circles by the advent of a well-known evangelist, and apart from such incidents are content to let Sunday and mid-week services go on as they have gone on for forty years.

A church program, formed at the beginning of the year through the best thought of pastor and workers, and held to with a steady insistence that each part be carried to completion, is a great means of unification in work and of multiplication of forces. The minds of all the members, or at least of all the really interested members, are centered at the same place, and the efforts of all are contributory to a definite end.

A church in a small village, where the community is dependent upon this one congregation for religious and social leadership, has for years followed its annual program with considerable care, and with fairly satisfactory results. The program has varied somewhat from year to year, but the essential points are the same. September is Stewardship Month. During this month the financial obligations of Christians are presented, the general program of church benevolences is given, the budget carefully reviewed and adopted, and the every-member canvass made. October is Organization Month. At this time every organization, from the official board to the children's mission band, is brought into working order and its work for the year outlined. November is Church Attendance

Month. Members of the church are urged to loyalty in church going for their own sakes and for the sake of others, and an effort is made, through calls and announcements, to bring in new hearers. December is Sociability Month, and is for the whole community. Social gatherings are held in different parts of the town, and all of the people are urged to call upon strangers and shut-ins. Although these visits are entirely voluntary, sometimes hundreds of such calls are made. The month ends with a general celebration at the church, such as an indoor picnic, with games in which young and old join. January is Devotional Month. A program of daily Bible readings—usually certain books to be read in course—is given out, and each Sunday afternoon a special devotional meeting is held at the church. February is Evangelistic Month. The simultaneous Bible readings are continued through the Book of Acts, and a short series of decision meetings is held. March is Missionary Month. The missionary enterprise is reviewed and often there are visits from missionaries and secretaries. April is Religious Education Month, and plans which have been forming through the year for the enlargement of the Sunday School are put into operation. May, and running into the time of commencement in June, is a Life Service period, when the young men and young women are asked to consider the claims of various fields of religious activity. The summer months have no such sharply outlined program, but attention is given to outdoor recreations, especially those of the Boy and Girl Scouts.

Any church program must of course adapt itself to local needs. For instance, a city church would almost surely wish to stress the Sunday school work in the fall rather than in the spring. The point is not the value of a particular program. It is the value of a program. True, this must often be modified and extended. There will come unexpected opportunities and blessings, but they will come in largest measure to those who are working in unity at the task as it is clearly seen. Special outpourings of power are oftenest for those who are with one accord in one place.

The Ravenous Beast in the Cellar

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE came unto me one of the sons of the prophets, and he bowed low before me as young men bow before their elders when they have need of wisdom and know it. And that is not always, but sometimes.

And he said unto me, O Safed, live forever. Thou art a venerable man and one who is wise.

And I said unto him, So far as the passage of years is concerned, thou speakest truly. As to Wisdom, we shall know better when I learn what advice thou dost desire, and whether it be something about which I have knowledge.

And he said, O Safed, I went forth from the School of the Prophets no great time ago, and I am the Minister of a Dear Little Church.

And I said, See that thou love it well, and continue to love it, even when the years shall come that find thee in one that is larger. For there is no Church so small but it deserveth a Minister better than any of us.

And he said, Thou speakest truly. And now, behold, the people of God in that place have dealt kindly with me and with my wife. And they pay us our Stipend on the last day of every month. And in many ways have they shown us affection. But, O Safed, a year ago they built us a Parsonage, and it is a Lovely House.

And I said, Thou art in Great Luck, for the Housing Problem is Some Problem to those who are not thus provided.

And he said, It is even so. But in the cellar of that house is a Ravenous Beast, and the hunger of that Beast is Something Fierce.

And I inquired of him the name and manner of the Beast.

And he said, The name of it is a Furnace. And last Winter it Devoured Coal to the total cost of an hundred and thirty and eight shekels. And my stipend is but twelve hundred shekels. And I have food and books and other things to buy, and the Lord hath spoken kindly unto us with the promise that there will come to us a Little Child, and we do greatly rejoice. But we think of the coming of Winter, and of the great beast with the Wide-Open Red Throat that crieth for Coal. And we know not what to do. For we love our people and they love us. But it cost us much to furnish the lovely new house, and we are in Debt. And we fain would owe no man anything but to love one another.

And I said, I will write a Parable concerning this same Beast, and I will remind the people of God in every place, that the Good Old Summer Time is past, and that in every parsonage there is a Ravenous Beast that crieth for Coal. And I will speak kindly unto them, saying, Hear me, O ye people of God, and let me thank you for your kindness to all ministers, both old and young. For this may the Lord reward you. And now, behold, consider whether it be not possible to add to your kindnesses this one beside that ye Endow the Beast in the Cellar of the Parsonage, that the Minister freeze not, and that he and his wife and the baby may warm themselves in comfort, and bless you for your kindness.

Sanctuary

THERE is a place within my heart,
Where lovely shadows lie;
I go to seek God's peace amid
Its radiant mystery.
There is an altar where I kneel
To hear great music rise—
And all my little joys bow down
To hide their streaming eyes.

ELIZABETH ZULAUF.

The Music of the Church

By Lloyd C. Douglas

THE minister who has persuaded himself that it matters little what manner of music is customarily rendered in his Sunday services may spare himself the trouble of seeking further for an explanation of the fact that his church treasurer is always blue over a bank-balance that is always red. Nor need this good man quest an ampler reason for the habitual listlessness of his congregation on the first day of the week, if it is listless, or for the diminutive size thereof, if it is small. Of course, there may be other excellent reasons, but this one will do quite nicely.

Our young brother in the second balcony heckles us to state a few of these other reasons. We dislike to be interrupted, but the question is fair. Well—for instance—something may be wrong with the preacher's sermons. Their dimensions may be at fault—too long, too deep, too narrow. They may be blighted with a chronic pessimism. Weekly information to the effect that the world is going, if not already gone, to the dogs; and that the whole of nature groaneth and travaileth to the exclusion of any other lawful pursuit, gets to be an old and not very attractive theme, after a while. And people get tired of hearing, constantly, that they are miserable sinners—a fact too obvious to demand such frequent repetition. When they have enough, they quit. That is one reason; and a mighty good one.

POLLYANNA PREACHERS

Only slightly less unalluring are the sermons that reek of the vapid tosh known as Pollyannaism. The "just be glad" preacher gets to be as great a public nuisance as his colleague in the next block who knows the city deserves to be blown to perdition—and now a worm has chewed up his gourd-vine. Again, the preacher's sermons may be so profound as to be incomprehensible to all but the self-confessed intellectuals of the neighborhood, or as light as the chaff which the wind driveth away.

It is just possible that something may be wrong with his pastoral activities. He may have acquired a trick of wearing a chip on his shoulder, precariously poised, and frequently being brushed off by careless passers-by, to his perpetual discomfort and irritation; or, he may have been built, temperamentally, by the rules which obtain in plane and solid geometry, with right angles and the apexes of triangles sticking out all over him, upon which rugged corners and sharp spikes people keep bumping themselves and moving off rubbing their hurts and muttering that he is what—most unfortunately—he is. Or, again, he may have so poor a head for anything like organization or executive leadership that his board of deacons is as glum, in session, as a coroner's inquest, and his board of trustees haggle with him over the suggested appropriation of four dollars and fifteen cents wherewith to buy the janitor some new brooms and a coal-shovel, while his Sunday school hasn't half enough teachers, and his women's society is up to its ears in a brawl. These are some of the reasons. They are all good ones. Without doubt, these brethren have a bad time of it, each in his own way.

NOT MAKING IT GO

But one's full sympathy goes out to the minister who knows that he is not making a go of it—not failing for any of the reasons indicated above—and with brutal candor—but because he has never taken into serious account the importance of that supreme feature of Christian worship—the music of the church!

He may be an able preacher; but he can't preach past bad music! He may be a tactful and beloved pastor; but he can't win and hold people to his Sunday services with that execrable choir! He may be no end of a statesman in his deft manipulation of his multitudinous auxiliary societies, boards, cabinets, bureaus, and what-nots; but the feeble organist will see to it that the S. R. O. sign is never put out. Sometimes he is entirely unaware that this is so.

Not infrequently one hears a preacher saying that he knows nothing about music, at all—church music, or any other kind—saying it nonchalantly, as he might admit ignorance of the tapestries peculiar to the Ming dynasty—apparently oblivious to the fact that his confession is equivalent to a carpenter's casual remark that he never could saw a board straight or drive a nail without pounding his thumb. No more rarely one hears a preacher saying that he has "no ear for music"—saying it with a smile that clearly means he is too much occupied with serious matters to give attention to anything so trivial. We are to understand that it is just a pleasant little joke that he has on himself. By no means is it a joke! It is exactly as if a painter should confess to color-blindness! For so large a place does music rightfully hold in Christian worship that whoever accepts responsibility for the religious education and devotional inspiration of a church can never hope to teach his congregation how to sense the Divine Presence unless he is not only in love with music but fairly conversant with its history, its functions, and the proper manner of its execution.

UNDERRATING PUBLIC TASTE

It can easily be proved that most discouraged preachers have consistently underrated the public taste. They have harangued their congregations about the increasing godlessness of this generation as a reason why their churches are failing to attract, when the real reason may reside in the increasing unattractiveness of their services, due to the more exacting nature of the public taste. In no field has this development of taste proceeded with more rapidity, of late, than in this matter that is before the house just now. The public has recently achieved new agencies for the cultivation and satisfaction of its heart-hunger for good music. The phonograph which has become almost as common and indispensable to the American home as the wash-boiler, reproduces the music of the masters, executed by the best known of contemporaneous artists. True, the jazz record brays its abominable yawp more often than "Gloria a Te" raises its majestic praise; but the family that is likely to take any interest in the church at all, owns a few first class records, and plays them with delight, of a Sunday afternoon.

More people know good music when they hear it than we suspect. It should be repeated—the preacher is always tempted to underrate the public taste! Because they don't talk back, he thinks his puny little essay, on Sunday morning was a wonder. Because nobody stayed after church to ask him where he got his figures when he said that one-third of the inmates of Sing Sing are college graduates, he thinks they believe it. Because they don't call him up Monday morning to tell him that the music yesterday was the most awful thing they had ever heard on land or sea, he imagines the music will do. Not so extremely good, perhaps; but it will do. Ah, no; the public isn't such a dull ass as some would have us believe.

SPECIALISTS IN POOR MUSIC

Unfortunately too many churches have been specializing in poor music. The reasons for it are legion. Two or three of them will bear mentioning. The trouble may lie, for example, with the choir leader. Not to speak too abstractly, permit me to present Sister Iontha Place. Miss Place began directing the choir at the tender age of twenty-two, just after her return from the year she spent at the Tophole Conservatory. That was in the early summer of 1901. Because she has been at it so long, and also because her brother is the heavy contributor, Miss Place must be retained. By virtue of her position, she may sing solos if she wishes so to do. And she wishes so to do—almost every Sunday. Miss Place flats abominably. There is only one satisfying tone taken in the whole of her performance—the final syllable of "Amen." There are ten persons in her choir—the sort that could be expected to become and remain party to such an enterprise. Every Sunday there is a sugary little anthem about "Behind the Beyond is Somewhere," or "His Old Mother's Rockingchair." And other stuff like that.

Now, Rev. R. H. Pepper, a real preacher with a real message, has become aware that he can never make anything of his church so long as this state of things persists. He wants to know what he is to do. For, as has been said, Miss Place is the esteemed sister of Deacon G. Rowling Place, and in most excellent health. Your duty is plain, Pepper. It is not a pleasant job; but—somehow—you must contrive to displace the misplaced Miss Place (begging a thousand pardons!). Nobody envies you the task; for this kind comes out only by prayer and fasting. But you can't preach against that music. You must either change matters, at that point, or be resigned, or resign!

Have another? Well; meet our good friend, Mr. Onestop, the genial organist who has been playing for nothing (a just wage for services rendered) during the past thirteen years. Whenever the suggestion has come up to the board of trustees that Brother Onestop be given a big birthday dinner in celebration of his retirement as organist, somebody has remembered that Onestop really has been doing the best he could—which even the frenzied admit—and absolutely without recompense. This latter is to be kept carefully in mind. A new organist will add another annoying item to the budget; and the board's pet motto is, "Budge not the budget!"

These well meaning people do not realize that they would be doing Percy Onestop a kindness by shielding him from any further rough criticism and contumely behind his back. And, as to the economics involved, Onestop's gratuitous service at the organ is the most expensive item in their whole blessed and unbudgeable budget! If there are any tears to fall, let them be shed in behalf of our brother, the preacher, who has become the ungrateful legatee of such a bequest as Onestop. What shall he do? In the midnight watches, he asks himself, "What shall I do?" He must get rid of Onestop. It would be positively wrong for him to poison the fellow; but he can easily request the rendition of certain musical numbers which are quite out of Onestop's reach. If the man has any sense at all he will see the point. If not, it can be explained to him by the aid of a map and lucid footnotes. But, Onestop must go!

GOOD MUSIC OR NONE

If the preacher is careless whether or not his church ever commands any attention and respect, let him put up with what he has had vouchsafed unto him. But if he hopes to make something of his church, he must deal with his music problem very firmly. He must boldly announce that his church will have good music, or none! Far better to have no music at all than what passes for the same in far too many of our Protestant churches. And where does the responsibility rest, at last? With the choir? Not at all! With the music committee? Not a bit of it! It resides with the manager of the whole institution—the preacher. When the music is bad, the congregation is depleted; when that happens, who gets the blame? The choir? The music committee? Not for a minute.

No; it is the preacher's business, after all. He may pretend to wash his hands of it, and lay the responsibility elsewhere; but verily he has his reward (which, likely as not, involves a move to some other locality where he stands a good chance of swapping the worst chorus-choir on the face of the earth for the awfullest quartet that ever jangled discords).

Here shows up the importance of the preacher's knowing something about music himself. He should be in a position to speak to his choir in a tone of authority. It is not enough that he should be vaguely conscious that the noise behind him, on Sunday, is raucous and infuriating: he should know exactly what the trouble is, and spare no pains to mend it.

This demands of the preacher that he should have acquired some musical training. It is not very important that he should be a "practical musician." Indeed, it has happened that a preacher's ability to sit down on the organ bench and demonstrate precisely how he would like to have a certain passage rendered, has earned him an enemy guaranteed to hate him and his to the third and fourth generation. If the preacher is a good organist, he can well afford to keep this one candle of his under a bushel. And if he has a trained voice, he had better use it to talk with. The preacher-soloist, who steps from the pulpit to the choir and back again, had better take a day off and decide which of these two very excellent callings is his—and put all of his time on the vocation he decides to retain.

But it will never be against him, in the opinion of the choir, if he reveals the fact that he knows good music from trash. How many preachers like to draw a chuckle from the choir by deprecating their complete ignorance of the devotional and inspirational music of the church—as if it were something to grin about! Just about as funny as if the doctor should remark that he had never taken any interest in clinical thermometers!—and all this foolishness of asepsis in surgery! Of course the preacher intends this pleasantly as a pretty little compliment to the choir for knowing so very much about something concerning which even he knows nothing; but it's a poor joke, any way you take it.

BEST MUSIC NOT DIFFICULT

If the minister will give some attention to this matter, in his study, and in conference with good musicians, he will discover, perhaps to his surprise, that a great deal of the strictly high class music of Christianity is not difficult of execution. He should find out what these anthems and solos are, if his choir is composed of persons who lack the talent and training to adventure with more complicated scores. It may be with the best intent in the world that he proposes to the choir that it attempt the "Hallelujah Chorus" which is, as he says, a very wonderful thing. But unless his chorus is made up of trained vocalists, he has placed his friends in a position from which it will be quite difficult to escape with credit to themselves and the cause they would like to serve. He should know exactly what grade of music his choir can successfully negotiate, and see to it that the musical library of his church is supplied with the best there is of that grade. He should have a complete list of the titles of these numbers in his study. When he plans a service he should inform the choir director what special music is demanded by his sermon theme.

How little coordination there is in most of our churches, of the sermon and the music? Sometimes the choir director doesn't have the faintest idea what the sermon is about, and the preacher doesn't know (or care) what the choir is going to sing. He picks his hymns at random, without regard to their fitness or tunefulness. Occasionally he does this at the last minute. The choir has no notion what hymns are to be sung. No rehearsal of them has been had. And then this fellow will get up and babble about a wicked world that will not come out to church! Why should it? What is he doing to make the church more attractive? Complains about the size of his salary. In what other business could he earn more, if he went at it in the same way that he prepares for Sunday?

THE CHOIR ANTHEMS

Now there are a few facts that every preacher really ought to know about choir anthems. First, the choir must never attempt anything that is too difficult to be rendered well. It is much better that the quartet should spend two hours trying to get together on "Jesus, Keep Me Near the Cross,"—and then sing it with an eye single to one purpose—than to invest an equal amount of time on "The Radiant Morn"—and tote it to the shambles. Every quartet wants to sing "The Radiant Morn." There are about a dozen church quartets on the Western Hemisphere that have any warrant for making the adventure. It is much more effective for the choir to learn "Hark, Hark, My Soul," so that it can sing it with good interpretation, than to butcher Tchaikowsky's "Oh Come, Let Us Worship," or Gounod's "Sanctus."

In the next place, the choir should not attempt to present a new anthem every Sunday. That means nothing else than that the piece has been given only brief rehearsal. Possibly all that these loyal folk have achieved, in that one rehearsal, is a scrappy knowledge of the harmony. As to its interpretation, they have had no chance to attend to that. They just grind it out—happy if they all contrive to get through at the same time. It is much better if the choir should plan to present one new anthem each month, and repeat old ones, frequently. The best choirs do it. If the piece is good it will bear repetition. If it is not it should never have been done in the first place. Quite to the contrary is the repeated sermon! Any sermon that the parson can repeat with a feeling of assurance that his congregation will not recall it never was worth preaching. Is that not a fact? When you preach an old sermon do you pick one of the big ones—that made everybody sit up? You do not? We are right, then, about this, as usual. It is not so of the anthem. The congregation likes an old anthem, if it is well done; just as it likes a well-remembered Scripture reading, if it is well done. Preachers who are poor readers of the Scripture Lesson should select obscure passages. The people have heard the familiar ones done well, and cannot forget about it.

HYMNS AND HYMNS

It goes without saying that the preacher should have a fair working knowledge of hymnology. It is somewhat important that he should be able to read New Testament Greek; but far more important to his job than Greek is a fine sense of discrimination in the selection of hymns. He ought to know whether it is more uplifting for his congregation to sing "Pull for the Shore, Sailor," or "Lead on, Oh King Eternal." It ought to make a difference to him whether his people sing "Brighten Your Corner" or "Lead, Kindly Light." He should understand the relative values of "Will There Be Any Stars in My Crown?" and "Jerusalem the Golden."

And he must keep close to that choir! He must attend rehearsals, and lend encouragement to all worthy effort. He must dare to administer tactful and constructive criticism. The fact—for it is a fact—must be kept constantly before that choir that its service is of signal importance to the life of the church. Some preachers pray for the choir, just before the service begins. That is as it should be. Most choirs need it. But, whatever means the minister employs to teach his musicians the significance of their task, they should be made aware of it as a solemn obligation. Are your Sunday services lifeless, and poorly attended? Look behind you!

The Freudian Theory and Preaching

By Douglas Horton

EXPERIMENTAL psychology is slowly accumulating evidence and concepts which sustain and confirm our Christian conviction as to the abiding necessity for preaching. In the doctrine of the subconscious wish, with its associated ideas, is the basis of a scientific apologetic for the practice of that art which more powerfully than any other agency is competent to make real the life of God in the hearts of men.

As everyone knows, people often act unconsciously. When the hand, hanging inert at the side, comes in contact with a heated stove, it is withdrawn unconsciously. If its possessor had to "stop and think" whether or not he would contract such muscles as would rescue the member from pain, he would be burned. There is evidently a nervous center which supervises such experiences and directs reaction without waiting for deliberate and conscious violation.

The whole range of phenomena of the order of dreams, hypnosis, and multiple personality bears out the hypothesis of the presence of this "subconscious mind" in human nature. The evidences adduced are overwhelmingly convincing that this mind beneath the limen of consciousness operates over a much wider field than any have previously been willing to admit. Indeed, the subconscious wish may operate upon sensory matter in no less degree than conscious desire itself. The amazing successes of Christian Science, Spiritualism, and the other thaumaturgic faiths as well as many of the miracles of Jesus are illuminated by this fact. But the now classical proof is the cure of the nervous disease commonly called "shell shock."

WHAT IS "SHELL SHOCK?"

The symptoms of this disorder are that the soldier, on reaching the war area, discovers that amidst the excruciating surroundings part of his physical system has ceased to function: he loses his sight, his hearing, the use of his arm or some other member. This he and his comrades attribute to "shell shock," or a shattering of the nerves through shell fire, but this is now believed to be an erroneous conclusion. The psychological elements are similar to those in the movement of the hand from the heated surface. The scorifying and unbearable experiences of the battlefield are comparable to the unpleasant associations of the heated stove. In both cases there is a subconscious wish to have done with pain. In both, the wish may fulfil itself by acting upon the muscles, in the latter instance, to compel them to contract, in the former, to constrain them to cease acting. In both, the muscular action tends to relieve the person from undesirable circumstances. On the battlefield the thought, "If I were not physically fit, I would not be here," which had fluttered through the mind and was then forgotten by consciousness, was, as it were, seized upon by the subconscious self and used to motivate the paralysis of the organ. It is noteworthy that it is usually the right or trigger arm which becomes devitalized. The useless arm brings the soldier into the safety zone behind the lines as surely as the contracting muscles withdraw the hand from the stove and the man from pain.

That this romance of modern psychology is no phantasy is attested by the fact that in the early part of the war before the army surgeons were converted to this theory and "shell shock" was believed to be due to a mechanical disarrangement of nerves, patients were usually returned home for such non-combatant duty as they could perform. Witness the thousands of the crippled, the maimed, the deaf and the blind who now go their painful ways along the city streets and country lanes of Britain, France and Germany. In the American army, however, there was a psychiatrists' unit, and there, where the theory was tried out, the number of cases returned, not to service-of-supply duty but to the front line, was no less than ninety-one per cent! There will never be another army in any civilized nation without such a unit, nor another surgeon-general who discredits the theory of the subconscious wish.

COMPLEX OF SUBMERGED WISHES

But this knowledge is not a military secret. Indeed, if it had not been for the invasion of civiliamdom into the khaki hegemony it is doubtful if this modern attitude would have received acceptance there as soon as it did. Thanks to this interpretation of the human mind, the institutions for the care and cure of the insane are numbering their convalescents by scores where previously they numbered them by tens. And yet it is not in this abnormal mentality where the new exegesis of psychology makes its most significant contribution. The paranoiac tendency, that is, the unconscious coloring of one's thinking by a complex of submerged wishes, is not foreign to any one of us. Many Irishmen today who think that England should withdraw her control from Ireland point for their reason to the recent political blunders of Downing Street, whereas, if their minds could be anatomized, beneath what they believe to be free thought would be discovered an antipathy engendered in their childhood of which even they themselves are unaware. There is only one key to our amazing national consciousness of last winter which swept a majority of our one hundred millions into arguing seriously about a political experiment called "Bolshevism" concerning which they had almost no definite information: namely, a latent suspicion that American business prosperity was threatened. It has often been noted that it is the under dog who elaborates argument for alterations in the status quo, and the comfortably situated who has studied reasons for preserving the social order. How happy the man who has no unconscious prepossessions—and how solitary!

SIN A SUBLIMINAL COMPLEX

The preacher who does not realize that his congregation is a multiplicity of minds, each tending in the direction of unexpressed predilections, plows the sand. Sin itself is such a subconscious complex of evil desires. It has been the custom of a flaccid universalism which blurred the outlines of concise thought to transfer the responsibility for sin from human souls to the agencies of heredity and environment. But here is science itself devising a doctrine of sin as rigid as Calvinism, describing the sinful soul as differing from the righteous by as diametrical a contrast as subsists between insanity and sanity. In the most common type of insanity the mind cannot think accurately because it is perverted by a hidden complex. Thus also a soul's vision of God is warped or obscured by a complex of wrong desires. Sanity is the ability properly to interpret sense environment. Godliness is the ability properly to interpret spiritual environment. Sin, in Freudian terms, is a subconscious wish which inhibits a full and free appreciation of the presence of God. Jesus understood that it is only the pure in heart who can see God.

That this viewpoint is confirmed by real experience every minister will testify. When a person refuses to accept the Lordship of Christ and enter upon the service of God, he invariably presents some respectable reason for this recusancy, and he believes his reason to be a sincere one. It will be a theological divergence or an argument against the local church personnel or polity. For these considerations, though he admits the perfection of the Christian ethic, he cannot professedly enter the kingdom of God. Then amidst auspicious surroundings he is perhaps persuaded to look in upon himself: his subconscious mentality is flooded with light and seen by his own eyes: he uncovers the little nest of desire which has distorted his thinking. The substance of his aversion to Christ was not the doctrine of the virgin birth, as he thought, nor the number of hypocrites in the church; it was his own hidden wish to continue a certain habit then made vivid to him which unconsciously he knew Christ would not tolerate. This he suddenly sees—is genuinely surprised at it; and the phenomenon of conversion occurs. It is the soul's bursting into spiritual sanity occasioned by the disparting of the sin-complex which had previously restricted it.

The cure for the subconscious wish which perverts the higher mental life is thus simply revelation and explanation. In the army a young man stone-deaf from shell shock was brought to the surgeon. An examination proved that the mechanical equipment of the ear was still intact. In the man's presence the doctor said to his orderly: "There is a letter from home for this young man. In five minutes you may get it and read it to him." In five minutes the deaf man turned to the orderly and said: "Let me see—I have a kind of recollection that the doctor said that there was a letter for me." "Yes," said the orderly. "Please get it," said the man. But the orderly got the surgeon, who, after explaining the case to the man himself, was able to send him back to the trenches after a fortnight in the rest camp. The man had been getting the sounds but the nerves had been refusing to pass them up into consciousness. They finally found their way there only as a hazy memory which by its pleasant associations eluded the blockade.

A woman who was confined to her bed with organic trouble put to rout every form of medical treatment. Finally a nervous specialist diagnosed the situation. He learned that shortly before the illness came on, the husband's sister had come to live in the home. To the amazement of every one he began his treatment by sending this woman to live in another state. He then told his invalid that she had a subconscious though natural wish to be the mistress of her own household; that the sister, a domineering person, had gradually wrested from her hands the entire responsibility of the menage and that she herself had unconsciously found no way of winning back the attention and direction of her family save by falling sick and drawing upon their sympathies. From the hour of the explanation the woman began to mend. Such illustrations could be infinitely multiplied.

THE SECRET OF CONVERSION

Note that the first confession the Christian Science healer insists upon her patient making is that the disease is really an illusion, being the natural result of a want of faith. Note also that Jesus held the words, "Thy sins be forgiven thee," to be more cogent than the demand, "Arise, and take up thy bed and walk." The story of the sick of the palsy was repeated a score of times in Flanders.

Conversion thus occurs when men become self-convicted of sin. When the tangle of evil desire is cut, then Christian verities become as acceptable as sunlight and the presence of God as real as one's own personality. Anima naturaliter Christiana: the healthy soul is as aware of its spiritual environment as the sane mind is of its physical surroundings. The way to bring about this health is to explain a man's sin to him. Let the light penetrate the cellars of his consciousness and you rid him of the vermin which spread poison and batten on darkness.

For this service of explanation, preaching, whether to a congregation of one or a thousand, is the potent instrument. Of all the agencies designed to acquaint the soul with God preaching lends itself most readily to the art of explanation. Prayer is the transcendent act of worship, uniting hearts by chains of gold to the throne of grace; but unless all subconscious barricades are shattered by a preaching which aims at the hidden complex of corrupt desire, prayer is vapid and foreign. Praise may encircle worship with a golden halo; but unless a revealing sermon has taught the heart to sing, the hymn is sounding brass or a tinkling symbol. The reading of the Scripture is the expression of the race's highest thought couched in its most sublime prose; but only the eye of the untrammelled soul can see the black and white of the printed page take on a richness of color such as that which bathes the gray nave of a cathedral when the sunlight streams through its storied windows. Ritual, whether of the ultramontane magnificence of the Mediterranean cults or of the quiet simplicity of the Society of Friends, is made intelligent by the sermon which causes men to search their souls.

Though literature also explains, it is not so trenchant as the sermon, for whereas the former is written for the unknown reader, the latter is preached to a congregation where reaction to each word is immediately evident to the speaker. If his sympathy with his audience is subtle enough, the speaker may press the emphasis where it is most needed and probe the hearts of his hearers.

THE PREACHER'S POWER

Preaching is the facile instrument which may be used to destroy that nidus of selfishness which the saints of old and scientists of today unite to call sin. It is not fortuitous that religious reawakenings have never been precipitated by priests but always by prophet-preachers. Paul, bringer of the morning of Christian history, who, like the Phoebus he contended against, drove his chariot of light over the whole circle of lands, was a preacher. John Chrysostom, who from his pulpit in Antioch carried his generation into heights of spiritual vision the world had not dreamed of, was a preacher. Bernard of Clairvaux, under whose leadership the church of the Middle Ages let its light shine before men with the lustre of heaven, was a preacher. John Calvin, who held the city of Geneva and the destiny of Protestantism in the hollow of his hand, was a preacher. John Wesley, whose faith has in these later days revived the continents, was a preacher. The sermon in the hands of such men as these was the key which unlocked the magic casement and flung before the souls of men not only the hidden realities of their own souls but the glory of the divine law of righteousness.

The possibilities which lie in utterance must bring ministers and all others who at any time are called upon to speak the Word to sober and humble reflection. Only he who is free from the morbid wish can hope to deliver his neighbor from a like burden. Only the person with an unembarrassed and deep sympathy can speak peace to another heart. In truth, the subconscious malady of many on both sides of the altar rail is the inclination to be a leader at the expense of being a brother; but only he who is willing to bear the sins and carry the sorrows of others can be worthy to preach Jesus' gospel of liberation.

The profession of the Christian ministry is the highest of callings because it entails the infinitely delicate and awful responsibility of setting hearts free from the sin which shuts out the presence of God.

VERSE

The Church

THE temples of the flesh are reared, and fall;
Our sanctuaries crumble stone by stone.

And yet, in life triumphant over all,

Through age on age increasing, thou alone,
Intangible, and so from worm and time
Immune, dost bear to us the Theme Sublime.

What if men tear thy robes of faith apart

(By such rare portions blinded to the whole Still past conception of the mortal heart),

And with but partial truth would warm the soul?
Thou art the Christ's, and even hosts of hell
Thy final sovereignty may not quell.

Heaven's beloved! Reign Queen, Messiah's Bride,

Bought with His pain, anointed by His blood.

Arise! To all His children open wide

Thy portals—like the arms of motherhood;

Redeem within thyself His love-sealed vow:

The fainting world awaits its revelation now!

EDNA MARIE LE NART.

Derelicts

HE stood one day beside a maiden's couch
And bade the hysteric mourners spare their grief;
For though her form was cold, and though her eyes,
Like the dull windows of an empty house,
Flashed back no answer to their questioning,
But knew them not, and mocked them—Jesus knew God's power and faithfulness.

"Weep not," he said:

"She is not dead, but sleepeth."

And today

Those sad and smiling eyes look into eyes

Where men see only ashes of dead hopes,

And dust of crumbled courage, and bare walls,

Where once was faith and innocence and love

And virtue and the throbbing Life of life.

And when men sigh, "Too late!" he answers them

Again: ". . . not dead, but sleeping."

God Stoops

AS children gather flowers,
So fain is God to gather
The fragrant flowers that blossom
In His garden.

The little prayers that brush His garment's hem,
God stoops to gather them.

The Child Worker

SINCE Jesus warned men that they had better be sunk in the sea with mill-stones about their necks than to give offense to a little child, there has never been a time when society was so vitally interested in the welfare of its children as today. Under the influence of Christian ideals there has come to be a social crusade in behalf of childhood. In non-Christian lands children are the property of their fathers and may be tenderly cared for under the parental roof or within the family group, but they are hapless indeed if they have neither. Even in a Christian civilization the age-long prejudice against the weakness and dependence of the child in favor of the possessive rights of the father have yielded slowly to the Christian principle of the divine right of even the smallest and least of human beings to its own life.

It was only a few generations ago that Lord Shaftsbury wrought with heroic toil and in disappointment to redeem the children of the working classes in England from mine and mill with their torturing long hours and barrack-like living quarters and pittance of wage. All the powers of the day in state and business and church were against him, but the growing democracy of Britain was able to do something, and slowly the child's estate was bettered by law. The advance was slow indeed, and the maw of industry has been a veritable modern Moloch for the children of the poor. It was only a few years ago that a wealthy churchman and cotton maker from North Carolina haughtily answered a congressional query as to his responsibility for the child workers in his mill by saying, "I am responsible only for good cotton cloth a full yard wide." And within the last decade certain southern state legislators voted against child labor laws because industry argued that cotton cloth could not be profitably made without child labor. The same had been done in years gone in the North when Illinois and Pennsylvania had given the same answer in regard to bottle-toters in the glass factories and breaker-boys in the coal mines. We have been very tender with our own and very hard with those who had no one to protect them.

Before the Legislatures of 1921

Forty-four state legislatures and the national Congress meet this year, and women have the vote. The success of the crusade for child labor regulation and compulsory school laws to supplement it has been cumulative. Much more was gained in the last biennium than in any five years before, and with women voting and momentum up more can be done this winter than in any five year period hitherto. January 21 has been set apart as Child Welfare Day in the churches. No influence, apart from that of the mothers, can do more than the churches to secure adequate protective legislation. Here and there certain churches have always spoken in defence of childhood's rights before the law, but until recent years the policy of the church as an organization has been one of silence and of opposition on the part of many of its leading laymen. In late years religious conventions have passed resolutions, but none have sent lobbyists, as the women's clubs and social organizations are doing. Men have rested so completely under the presuppositions of laissez faire that they have refused to interfere even on behalf of the child whom misfortune drove to labor for a wage.

The National Child Labor Committee has persistently kept the facts before the public and has conducted a vigorous campaign for many years. It reminds us today that the federal law reaches not more than 15 per cent of the 2,000,000 children engaged in gainful occupations. Legislation of the past decade should have reduced the number of tender little wage earners and it is believed the 1920 census will reveal that it has done so, but in previous decades there was a constant increase. In 1870, one in seven of our American children under sixteen was working for wages. In 1900 it had increased to one in five and by 1910 it was one in four. Fifteen states report that the number of children leaving school for work during the first half of 1920 was from three to twenty per cent. In New Jersey the average has been 20,000 per year for the past four years. Child labor is not confined to mining and manufacturing; it reaches into the beet fields and the cotton fields also, and the street trades of the greater cities bring one of its most difficult problems.

Wage Labor Versus Wholesome Work

The advocates of laws to prohibit or at least to govern child wage labor discriminate clearly between useful work and labor under a deleterious wage system. They make no protest against wholesome work on farm or in home or shop under parental direction. They believe in the gospel of work as well as in the gospel of play, but they protest against the slavery—I use the word advisedly—of a wage system applied to tender children. It is a slavery because it makes them bondsmen to a system that impairs child life and that without any ability on the child's part to choose or to contract or to exercise any personal discretion on his own behalf. The protest is not against work but against wage labor.

The National Child Labor Committee has collected many facts in regard to the bearing of premature labor of this systematic and grinding, machine-like kind upon the health and mentality of the immature laborers. Observations have shown that children of fourteen at work suffer twice the amount of illness suffered by others. The accident rate is treble, even though most states forbid children's employment in dangerous trades. The United States Industrial Relations Commission drew from New York City officials in the health department the judgment that sixteen should be the minimum age for wage employment, as the child of fourteen, the average minimum age allowed under child labor legislation, is not physically fit for the kind of toil to which wage labor submits him.

Wage earning is a very different problem from home chores. The "boss" is very dissimilar to the oversight and direction of parents. The factory crowd and regimen are full of menace as compared to the home group with whom work can and should be done. The grind of the machine has an effect upon child life, the very opposite of that which inheres in the variety and creative interest of cooperative household work.

The Idle Child

Therefore all charges that well meaning folk may sin against youth by prohibiting useful employment and breeding idleness are false. Such talk is only the camouflage by which interested parties attempt to deflect honest judgment. The rural child has plenty to do. In his case our interest lies only in seeing that he is sent to school. The greater illiteracy in America is in the rural districts. Here compulsory school laws are sought in order that our farm boys and girls may be made intelligent citizens and saved from being stunted by isolation and drudgery. In town and city the case is different. The country boy always has the better chance to be a man simply because he does have to work and become one of a cooperative household. The father's business in the town usually has no place for a boy, and the city mother is tempted to excuse her daughter from the routine of household duty and training, so much of which is now done outside the home. When school is out the street calls, and all too often the street becomes a more powerful influence than the home, howsoever earnestly the home strives to be first. Idle hours thus become the devil's opportunity. Here the vacation school, the public playground for the crowded city quarters, and some sort of a job under adequate home direction fill the void and there is fine opportunity also for city churches to do a piece of constructive work in character building.

Play is the key to child training, whether in vocation or morals. No immature child should have to toil at things where the play interest cannot be employed. If he is he grows up stunted in mind and body, undeveloped in imagination and creative energy and perhaps a victim of an appetite for stimulant. Work and play go together by right. Work is play made serious with purpose. But labor in a mill or at any monotonous toil destroys what play at work builds up. "If we could grapple with the whole child situation for one generation, our public health, our economic efficiency, the moral character, sanity and stability of our people would advance three generations in one," says Herbert Hoover.

A COMMUNICATION

Rights of Religious and Racial Minorities

ONE of the grave problems of the present day concerns the rights of religious and racial minorities. We had hoped that the struggle for religious liberty had been won among civilized nations; that the world recognized that the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's conscience is among the most precious rights of man; that the adherents of any and every faith should have unchallenged freedom to endeavor to win converts by persuasion; that every man has a right voluntarily to change his faith; and that any constraint by either church or state upon those who prefer their own faith is repugnant to every sane and enlightened mind. The Peace Conference at Paris expressly sought to guard the rights of religious minorities and articles for their protection were incorporated in the treaties.

Among the disappointing conditions that have followed the war, however, is the recrudescence of persecution in a disturbing number of countries. The changes of frontiers have sometimes united separated members of the same nationality or creed into a new state. In other cases these changes of frontiers have broken old ties. Minority groups have arisen which are separated by creed, language or by nationality from the majority of the people in the state to which they now belong. The protective clauses of recent treaties are, in many instances, being disregarded, and minority groups are being subjected to tyranny and oppression ranging all the way from petty annoyances to the most atrocious cruelties. In some cases, those whose rights are being restricted are Protestants, in other cases Roman Catholics, and in still others Jews; although in certain lands all three are the objects of persecution.

America and Great Britain, of all lands, are the ones where neither religious nor racial enmities might be expected to exist, for they have prided themselves upon their civil and religious liberty. While, however, we were engaged in studying the rights of religious minorities in other countries we were startled and humiliated by the outbreak of propaganda against the Jews in England and the United States. Inflammatory and abusive articles, pamphlets, and newspapers are being diligently circulated among public officials, editors, teachers, clergymen, and many others. A determined effort is apparently being made to poison the minds of those who make and enforce our laws and who mould public opinion. The scale upon which propaganda is being conducted indicates a liberally financed organization. The crux of the charge is that "there has been for a century a hidden conspiracy of Jews to produce revolution, communism, and anarchy by means of which they hope to arrive at the hegemony of the world"; that "this is really a conspiracy against civilization"; and that the revolutionary Bolshevik movement in many lands, and the innumerable strikes of workingmen (from the day of the armistice until today not a single week has passed without a strike, we are told) has been directly due to "this conspiracy." No matter where trouble has occurred, in Russia, Poland, Hungary, Austria, Portugal, France, Great Britain, or America, it is all charged back upon these arch conspirators. Disturbances everywhere, even the Turkish revolution, are said to be the work of this "Jewish conspiracy."

One's first feeling towards this propaganda is contemptuous

indifference. It seems incredible that such palpable bigotry should be taken seriously. But we should not underestimate the influence of constantly reiterated charges upon uninformed minds; nor should we imagine that the appeal to racial and religious fanaticism can no longer arouse the passions of the mob. The editor of the London Daily Chronicle rightly observes that, "in the case of a few comparatively overstrung people, the war strain has produced a species of quasi-insanity. Men, some of whom formerly had qualities fitting them for responsible positions, have been worked into a condition where their minds run amuck. They suffer from war hysteria. They are a prey to violent and groundless obsessions which they do their utmost to convey to others, and in the excitement of their effort they are apt to leave the most ordinary scruples behind."

We freely recognize that there are Jews who are prominent in some movements that are dangerous to society and government, but it should also be recognized that Jews are prominent in most beneficial movements; that Jews are among the most intelligent, patriotic and philanthropic citizens of our country; and that all dangerous movements include non-Jews. Jews, like other people, are good, bad, or indifferent, and they have no monopoly in any one class. Americans may well remember with shame that some of the Bolsheviks, whose hatred of our organization of society we justly reprobate, were formerly resident for a time in America, and that their experiences in the slums of New York, the mines of Pennsylvania, and the stockyards of Chicago were not calculated to lessen their hatred. A mistreated immigrant today may, like Trotzky, become a world menace tomorrow. Americans did not make and cannot tolerate destructive ideas, but they can and they should create an atmosphere in which such ideas will not thrive.

In this time of world unrest, when the minds of men are still torn by the passions of war, when suspicion, jealousy and fear deeply permeate the public thought, and when special and solemn responsibility rests upon the American people to help heal the world's wounds, we appeal to all people of goodwill to condemn every effort to arouse divisive passion against any of our fellow countrymen; to aid in eradicating racial prejudice and religious fanaticism; and to create a just and humane public sentiment that shall recognize the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and shall demand that no men shall be denied the inalienable rights of freedom of conscience and worship because they belong to another race or profess a different faith.

"Dangerous Doctrine"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In a recent issue Mr. Lumley has an article on "Who Is a Church Member?" If he were only an individual I should feel that his article should go unnoticed. But unquestionably his views are those of a growing group among the Disciples of Christ. Whether this is a confession, a lament or a boast all informed men will admit that it is true.

Mr. Lumley accepts the statement that "The good citizen is not he who obeys the laws, but he who has an active sense of being an integral part of the state." Applying this principle to the Kingdom of God he says, "Therefore membership is effected by believing, feeling and working in characteristic ways."

To him the oath of allegiance to state, and obedience to the ordinances of Christ are "crutches," needed only by the "lame." Not accepting that all men are lame he denies the universal need of these crutches.

Sir, I believe this to be a dangerous doctrine and I beg the privilege of relieving myself of saying so and giving my reasons for so doing.

First, it exalts the individual above the institution.

No man can be a "good citizen" of any country who denies that country the right to enforce conditions of citizenship. No man can be a good member of the church who denies the head of the church the right to name the terms of admission. I am aware that "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath."

Man was not created to exalt the institution; the institution was ordained to serve man's good.

But it cannot be said that it is for man's good that he arbitrarily disobeys Christ's ordinances. He exalts his privileges above the rights of the church and its head. Counting oneself a "cripple" and limping in on "crutches" offered by divine grace is certainly more in keeping with Christ's teaching than to believe himself to be whole, strong, able to jump over the fence or "climb up some other way."

Second, this theory destroys all semblance of law.

The state that admits a man to citizenship on his own arbitrary whims must, logically, let him live as he pleases. If a man can dictate to Christ's church how he shall enter he can dictate how he shall live.

Christ, who claimed to have "all authority in heaven and earth" is left without authority. Is not this akin to or a part of the "lawlessness" of "anti-Christ?"

Was the church of Christ established aright on Pentecost? Or have learned men of today discovered truth that the apostles as a whole were not aware of? Under the teaching and guidance of the "twelve" "they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls. . . . And the Lord added to the church daily such as were being saved."

Unless there is today a "twelve" who can prove a wisdom and authority above that of the "twelve" publicly and formally appointed by the Christ, the head of the church, then the church is safe only as it follows the example of that first church established under the direction of the apostles. To follow that we must teach and preach, baptizing those that gladly receive the word and let the Lord add them to his church. No stretch of the imagination can "add unto them" on the day of Pentecost any save those who "gladly received the word and were baptized."

Must we be a "club of snobs" if we today "count noses" on the same basis that they were counted by the inspired founders, under Christ, of the church?

Certainly all courtesy must be shown to all men, especially those who are "friendly aliens." But where the gospel is preached and baptisteries are not allowed to dry-crack the church will grow.

A "roll book" or a card index becomes a necessity for the purposes of pastoral oversight.

Unless we deny the authority of Christ and his early church we will write on that roll the names of those who "gladly received the word" and "were baptized." To do away with the roll is only thrusting the head in the sand, or disposing of sin by denying it. The roll is inconsequential except as a pastoral aid. Perhaps they did not have one on Pentecost, for they said "about three thousand" instead of running up the figures in the column.

But the counting they did was upon the basis of formal obedience to the command of Christ and we are not authorized to change the method. "Good citizens" and "good members" will see in the formal only a surrender to a higher authority. The one will proceed to "live the life of a good citizen," the other will "arise to walk in newness of life." Neither will cast away the prescribed "bucket" and say, "I only want the water."

Thank you. I feel better. I pray earnestly that I have helped some soul to exalt the authority of Christ.

Ireland and George Washington

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As to Washington and the cause of the freedom of Ireland, may I reply to your correspondent of December 23 by frankly stating that I quoted the statement spoken of from a publication of The Friends of Irish Freedom, but not directly attributing it to the pen of Washington, quoting the place and time (Mount Vernon, 1788), and calling it an "exhortation." Indirectly, on account of its noble sentiments which I believe we all who are unprejudiced Americans indorse, and on account of the time and place, it implies Washington, and my critic was right in holding me responsible.

When its authenticity was called in question, I had the matter taken up with the Friends of Irish Freedom, the National Secretary of which body replied at once. A part of his letter I hereby submit:

"On St. Patrick's day, 1916, Senator Martine of New Jersey, made a short speech in the Senate, saying that he was sure that on that day all had their Irish friends in mind, and asked to have three letters from George Washington to the Irish people read from the desk, which was done. The letteers follow:

"'Mount Vernon, July 20, 1788. To Sir Edward Newenham. Dear Sir:: . . . If Ireland were 500 miles distant from Britain, the case with respect to the former would be speedily and materially changed for the better. I have the honor to be, etc., GEORGE WASHINGTON.'

"'Mt. Vernon, January 20, 1784. To the Yankee Club, Stewartstown, County Tyrone, Ireland. Gentlemen:—It is with unfeigned satisfaction that I accept your congratulation on the late happy and glorious revolution. If in the course of our successful contest any good consequences have resulted to the oppressed Kingdom of Ireland, it will afford me a new source of felicitation to all who respect the interests of humanity. I have the honor to be, with due consideration, GEORGE WASHINGTON.'

"'Champions of Liberty! Patriots of Ireland!—Champions of liberty in all lands—be strong in hope! Your cause is identical with mine. You are calumniated in your day; I was misrepresented by the loyalists of my day. I triumphed. Had I failed the scaffold would be my doom. But now my enemies pay me honor. Had I failed I would have deserved the same honor. I stood true to my cause even when victory had fled. In that I merited success. You must act likewise.—WASHINGTON.'

"The above three letters were copied from the Congressional Record, Sixty-fourth Congress, 1st Session, Vol. 3, p. 4275.

"P. S. In the copy which we used in the first instance the words 'I triumphed' were not included."

Back of this whole controversy, Mr. Editor, I find, on talking with many of my fellow Protestants, that they are against Ireland's freedom because the majority of Irishmen happen to belong to the Roman Catholic communion. But is such a stand on a possibility of sectarian persecution worthy of the best spirit of Protestantism? The best spirit of Protestant Christianity wrote, "We hold these truths to be self evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inherent and inalienable rights; that among those are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

I hope for Ireland freedom and happiness, irrespective of its being Catholic or Protestant, not because England may not have the larger armies, and a huge navy, and will freely use them to terrorize Irish men, women and children, but because the spirit of God and the spirit of humanity are on the side of the freedom of peoples who have caught the vision of liberty. Both Protestant and Catholic Irishmen have caught this heavenly vision for Ireland, and some of them have devotedly sacrificed their lives. God speed the right, and may we help.

Is This An Order?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR; Ever since I began to receive your weekly I have been intending to write to you of my appreciation of the excellence which The Christian Century evidences. Being taught to expect only that which is of genuine worth, I am eagerly awaiting the proposed series on: "Are the Ideals of Jesus Practicable Today?"

I suppose I would have postponed writing this letter until after a few of those articles had been read, had it not been for the feeling that I must thank you immediately for one department in particular. The department to which I allude is that of Correspondence. After one has read the more serious parts of your weekly which go far toward clearing out the hostilities that have crept between the different bodies making up the church of our Lord Jesus Christ, it is necessary that one should have some mental relaxation. That is doubtless the reason why the Literary Digest has its column of jokes, and why the New Republic has its "Band Wagon" topics. The Christian Century apparently supplies this deficiency by interspersing its more serious letters with humorous touches such as the letter under the caption: "A Discord from Harmony." I am somewhat like your other correspondent, Mr. Doyle, in that I have not read your book, "The Meaning of Baptism," but I will make so bold as to hope that you will defer agreement with his request to withdraw it from circulation until I have been able to secure a copy, since I have heard so many of my friends praise it so highly.

Not to Be Ministered Unto *

BABIES need attention. There is nothing in the world quite as helpless as a baby. Young parents find this out. Before the arrival of this despot they could run here and there and know no restriction, and then came the baby and the world seemed to be run on different lines. Day or night his imperative voice was absolute command. His regal bath was an event that filled an entire forenoon and for his wakeful evening hours some amusement had to be contrived. He took a lot of looking after, that youngster; he had to be ministered unto—because he was a baby. But there came a day when he insisted upon putting on his own clothes and cutting his own meat and walking along without anyone holding him by the hand. He was learning to take care of himself. This process went on until one day he could vote, pay his own way and paddle his own canoe. He had become a man.

Now there are three possible situations in which one may be found: (1) Unable to care for himself and therefore an object for the ministry of others, (2) just able to take care of himself and that is all—not an ounce of brain or energy to spare, and (3) able not only to care for himself but for others. There are many dependents in the world. They must be ministered unto—babies—kings—subnormal—rich young rulers! There are some people who drag through their days with no plus element—just enough physical and mental strength to keep alive—poor, broken creatures. There are thousands of people who have life and to spare who can take care of others. There was Muller, who filled his house with orphans and then built great homes for hundreds of them. There was Wesley's mother who cared for nineteen children in her own home, and how she cared for them! There was Zinzendorf who filled his vast estates with religious refugees and carried the world on his heart. There was St. Francis, perhaps the purest type of saint, who forgot himself in tending the sick and the poor. There was Beecher lifting his great congregation and carrying them forward. "The measure of a man," said Kant, "is his ability to lift the world. Judged by that standard Jesus is the greatest person who ever lived." If you want to know how great you are ask yourself how many people are dependent upon you. Here is a man who lives all alone, with the exception of a servant, in an elegant apartment. Not a chick nor a child looks to him for care. Not one penny does he give for missions. He refuses to teach a Sunday school class of boys (which is fortunate for the boys!). He has one fixed rule of living—how can I get the maximum ease and pleasure out of each day. Coal miners dig his coal, printers prepare his paper, actors provide his entertainment, cooks toil to get his food ready, janitors keep his apartment neat and clean, tailors make his clothes, railroad men make possible his trips; in fact, ten thousand people work to make life enjoyable for him. He is ministered unto but he never ministers. St. Peter will need a microscope to find him on the Judgment day.

But the Son of Man came to minister. Servants? No, he served. Did he grab? No, he gave. How different he was! How generous! Beginning by healing, teaching, inspiring, loving, he ended by giving his very life for men. Never a thought for his own comfort; foxes and birds had homes, but he had none. And great, ah how can we measure that sublime life? The very mention of his name kindles all the good within us. He ministered.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Catholic Protestantism in England

There are some violent swings of the theological pendulum in some men's lives and this is nowhere better illustrated than in the life of Dr. Orchard, pastor of King's Weigh House in England. Dr. Orchard was at one time greatly interested in the New Theology movement in England along with Dr. R. J. Campbell. With the collapse of that movement he became, in his own phrase, "violently orthodox." This phrase is to be taken with a grain of salt, for it is only by adapting and interpreting old doctrines and practices that Dr. Orchard is orthodox at all. He has early communion in his church, changes vestments a number of times in the service, uses candles and incense, and recently had a requiem for the soul of his departed wife. He advocates the founding of a religious colony to live in the country and practice the rural arts, much like a monastic society. All of this goes on in connection with the work of the Congregational church. Naturally the program arouses some resentment which is beginning to manifest itself, and Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon, an old-time Congregational minister, asserted recently that these practices of Dr. Orchard "roused the Luther in him."

Bishop Speaks in a Methodist Church

Since the Lambeth Conference there is less opposition in the Episcopal church to interchange of ministerial courtesies with other denominations. Recently Bishop Shaylor, an Episcopal bishop, occupied the pulpit of First Methodist Church in Omaha, speaking upon the subject of "Christian Unity." Previous to this three non-episcopal pastors had spoken in the cathedral.

Interchurch Will Speedily Disappear

A meeting was held in New York recently of representatives of the Federal Council, the Home Missions Council, the Foreign Missions Conference, the Women's Foreign Missions Federation, the Women's Home Mission Council, the Sunday School Council and the Council of Church Education Boards. This meeting of representative interests advised the Interchurch to wind up its affairs speedily and turn over its survey material to the organizations which can make best use of them.

Episcopalians Will Go to Milwaukee

The National Conference for Social Work will be held in Milwaukee the last week in June. It is the largest meeting of its kind held anywhere in the world. At this meeting the people that actually do the social work are present. Denominational organizations are beginning to see the advantage of keeping in touch with this great organization and already announcement is made of a meeting of the National Conference of Social Workers of the Episcopal Church in connection with the larger meeting. The very greatest figures of the Episcopal denomination are just now engaged in the formation of the plans for the Episcopalian meeting. The chairman of the committee of arrangements is Bishop Gailor, the presiding bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church.

Chimes for Plymouth Church

The oldest church in America is located at Plymouth and has a continuous history of three hundred years. It is the church founded by those who sailed to America in the Mayflower. Many of the descendants of the Pilgrims have desired to commemorate the three hundredth anniversary in a fitting way and these have joined together to install at Plymouth a set of chimes. It is planned to make these chimes the finest to be found in the country. Contributions are coming in from various parts of America to this end. Several of the near-by churches were born out of the Plymouth church and at one time it seemed as though Plymouth church would have to close its doors. Happily this was not done and it now has a record of continuous service not equaled by many churches even in England.

Memorial Services for A. McLean

The next issue of World Call, the missionary magazine of the Disciples of Christ, will be a memorial number in which will be printed the tributes of hundreds of the friends of Rev. A. McLean, for a generation the missionary leader of the Disciples. The formal funeral addresses will be used, but the greater part of the space will be devoted to the briefer personal tributes. The first Sunday in March has for a generation been foreign mission day among the Disciples. This year it will be used as memorial Sunday and in hundreds of pulpits there will be tributes to the spiritual influence of the departed leader.

Denominations Recognize Needs of Ministers

While the Interchurch World Movement set forth a good many facts indicating the needs of the ministry, it did not put up a practical plan for helping. Certain of the denominational organizations have actually done something to lift the burden at the manse. The Baptists of England recently raised a quarter of a million pounds sterling and a hundred thousand of this is set apart to be used in raising the salaries of Baptist ministers in England. The Unitarians of America have recently completed a fund of two and a quarter million dollars and a considerable part of their fund will be used in the same way. Ecclesiastical leaders are beginning to see that the minister is the "doughboy" of the Lord's army.

Unless his morale is kept up, the big paper schemes for religious progress come to naught.

Methodists Make Money in Publishing Business

When the Methodist Book Concern was organized over a hundred years ago, it employed just one man who performed all functions. Now it has over eight hundred employees. Last year the net profits of the concern were $400,000 and this money is being used as formerly in adding to the pensions of retired ministers. Its Sunday school publications are the largest single source of income. There is a large book business, and nine different church weeklies are published.

Lent Will Be Well Observed in Boston

Preparations are already being made in Boston for the observance of Lent. Early in January all of the ministers' meetings of Boston will gather in the Church of the New Jerusalem and Bishop Lawrence will address the men of the cloth on "The Inner Story of the Lambeth Conference." Later Dr. C. L. Goodell, secretary of the Federal Council Commission on Evangelism, will come up from New York and conduct an institute on parish evangelism. It is planned to induce every church in Boston to present the claims of the gospel in the lives of its people.

Funeral of Bishop Burch

The funeral of Bishop Charles Sumner Burch, of New York, was held in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Dec. 23. The service was quite simple in character, though attended by a large number of the dignitaries of New York. The procession of the clergy numbered three hundred men, including not only the Episcopal clergy, but large numbers of ministers of the various Protestant churches. Four of the dignitaries of the Orthodox church were in the procession. The governor of the state and the mayor of the city were in the congregation with their staffs. Handel's Dead March in Saul was played during the procession and the hymns used were two of the bishop's favorites. These were "There is a Happy Home" and "Ancient of Days." The tribute to the bishop was delivered by Dean Robbins of the cathedral who said of him: "One of the questions in the office for the consecration of bishops is this: 'Will you show yourself gentle, and be merciful for Christ's sake for poor and needy people, and to all strangers destitute of help?' Bishop Burch answered that question not only with his lips but with his life; it was the dominating motive in his brief episcopate." Bishop Lloyd has been invited to act as bishop of New York during the coming three months including the confirmation season, but he has not yet signified his acceptance of this appointment. Bishop Lloyd resigned as president of the Board of Missions of the Episcopal church this past year to take up the duties of rector in a small new congregation. He became bishop in the state of Virginia many years ago.

Church Colonization

The strongly centralized religious organizations are able to handle their people in ways not known to bodies with congregational polity. When the Roman Catholics in Chicago or any other city wish to build a new church, they just go ahead and build it and then tell the Catholics of a certain district to go there. The Roman Catholics are at the present time colonizing certain districts of Vermont with French Canadians. Mormonism is the most striking example of the colonizing power of a religious organization. In West Wyoming vast tracts of land are now held by the Mormon church, and settlers are being placed upon this land. The Mormon church has the largest percentage of growth of any religious body during the past ten years, the census showing that they have increased from 215,000 to 403,000.

Pope Enumerates the Evils of Present Time

The Sacred College at Rome extended greetings to the Pope at Christmas and in responding to these greetings, the Pope has analyzed the ills of the present time. "The world is afflicted today by five great plagues," he said. These were defined to be "the negation of authority, hatred among brothers, thirst for pleasure, disgust with work and forgetfulness of the supernatural objects of life." In this analysis of modern ills there is much that any man, Catholic or Protestant, might ponder.

Church Repairs Tornado Damage

Last spring a destructive tornado tore through northern Illinois at the noon hour on a Sunday. In Elgin, the steeple of the First Congregational Church was carried away, and great damage done to the building otherwise. Announcement is now made that this damage has been made good at an expense of fifty thousand dollars. Few of the buildings demolished by the tornado had any tornado insurance.

Episcopal Editor Takes Clergy to Task

The responsibility for the divided state of Christendom is definitely laid at the door of the clergy by the editor of the Churchman, a leading Episcopal organ. This journal says editorially: "We shall never get church unity from the parsons. We speak with Chestertonian dogmatism. We shall get it, if at all, from the laymen. It is because laymen are so delightfully ignorant of church history that there is hope of their understanding Christianity. Not that we are prejudiced against learning. We believe in scholarship as a first aid to religion. But it is the lack of learning in those who think they have it that makes most of the trouble. Nothing would be finer for the Christian Church than a knowledge of church history, if such could be had. The difficulty is that most of the church history which is taught isn't history at all. It is dogma. And until this lack of history is supplied, the layman's ignorance is less dangerous, perhaps, than the confidence, undismayed by its want of facts, upon which the dogmatism of some of the clergy rests."

Election of Bishop of New York on Jan. 26

The standing committee of the diocese of New York has sent out a notice that a bishop would be elected at a diocesan convention to be held on January 26. The convention will be held in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The position to be filled is one of the most eminent in the gift of the church and there will be wide interest outside the Episcopal communion in the choice of a successor to Bishop Burch.

Disciple Missionary Attacked by Anarchists

Being a missionary in Chicago has dangers connected with it perhaps greater than those that go with missionary work in China. John Johnson is a Disciple missionary in the Russian colony. He came to America with an unpronounce-

Sunday Laws Taking Form

THE discussion of the Sabbath question throughout the nation has been treated cynically by some who have believed that the matter was one of mere talk. It is interesting to note, however, that at least in two states there is definite legislation which will be considered in the near future. Christian organizations will compel legislators to act upon the protection of the Christian rest day. A study of the proposed laws indicates to what extent the framers of the new legislation have considered the underlying ethical, social and religious questions of the Christian rest-day.

In New Hampshire the governor has had a commission out studying the question. In this state there are two rival organizations, both claiming church support, and these two organizations will clash upon the floor of the state legislature during the coming year. The Lord's Day League of New England wishes a retention of the present law in New Hampshire, and urges the case upon religious grounds. A newer organization is the Sabbath Conference of New England which is urging a tentative revision of the present code whose objective is stated in these words: "This law shall be so interpreted as to provide one day's rest in seven, to prevent commercializing of the Lord's Day, to protect the rights of those who worship, and to secure the moral and religious training essential to citizenship." The present law in New Hampshire came near being repealed at the last session of the legislature. The Seventh Day Adventists are agitating strongly against the present law on the ground that they are religious laws and are therefore unconstitutional. The next event in this controversy will be the report of the governor's commission some time in January.

In Tennessee likewise the Sabbath question has become one of legal interest. The Supreme Court in deciding a case in 1919 involving the matter of Sunday baseball found certain defects in the Tennessee law. Consequently the Tennessee conference of southern Methodists the same year took action looking toward a revision of the law. A committee composed of Noah H. Cooper, Dr. E. B. Chappell and ex-Senator W. R. Webb have prepared a bill to introduce into the next legislature. The bill cannot be reproduced here entire but certain portions of special interest are given. These are:

"1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, the public welfare requiring it, that hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person, corporation, or company to work or carry on his or its ordinary vocation or business on Sunday, and this is meant to include and prohibit the playing of all professional baseball or other like ball games on Sunday; the operation of all freight and passenger trains on Sunday; the operation of all theaters and moving picture shows on Sunday; the printing, publishing, delivering, advertising in and sale and circulation of all papers or publications published on Sunday or purporting to be published on Sunday; all buying and selling or trading on Sunday, including soft drink or soda water Sunday stores, excepting, however, instances of real charity and necessity, such as taking the ox out of the ditch and supplying medicines and necessities for those overtaken by distressing conditions that could not be provided against before Sunday; but this exception is not meant to allow any of the things above specifically prohibited, nor shall this be taken to allow drug stores or other stores to keep open or do any business on Sunday, saving only to supply such needed medicines as above indicated.

"5. The purpose of this act is to express the determination of the people of Tennessee to honor the Sabbath and keep it holy as God commands, and thereby secure for all that opportunity for spiritual and bodily refreshment decreed by our Lord for the happiness of mankind and the safety of all nations."

The various Negro denominations are cooperating strongly for the passage of the bill as are the Methodists and the W. C. T. U. One notes certain conspicuous omissions from the list of cooperating denominations, however.

It is evident that both in Tennessee and in New Hampshire much ground is likely to be lost for the Christian cause through a failure of the Christian forces to understand each other and to come to some ground on which they can stand together.

able name, and so completely has he anglicized it that he now has the handicap of resting under suspicion of being an alien in the Russian colony itself. He has been preaching the Christian doctrine in the new Brotherhood House which was opened on Fourteenth Street. One night a group of drink crazed anarchists came into the place and began breaking up the furniture. The missionary offered no physical retaliation, but stood his ground and faced his assailants. A small table was raised over his head, but at the critical moment the anarchist lost his nerve and failed to bring it down on the head of Mr. Johnson. Thus the exponents of free speech came in, and interrupted free speech for a Christian organization one night. But that is not the end of the story. The word went about the colony of the brave stand taken by the missionary, and of his courage, and since then the community has insisted upon his right to be heard. Some of the anarchists have been noticed in the audience giving respectful attention to the preaching of the gospel of Christ.

Community House Offered for Class Attendance

The Disciples Sunday school at Fullerton, Cal., has a strong men's class. Mr. C. C. Chapman, the "orange king" of southern California, has made an offer to the class that if it will maintain an attendance of over one hundred for two months, he will give twenty thousand dollars towards a new community house. On the last Sunday from which reports have been received there was an attendance of 156. The pastor of the church is Rev. J. T. Houser.

Churches Will Help Feed the Starving

The call for relief in the Near East and in central Europe has enlisted the active interest of Christian people all over the land. Philanthropy is kept alive by the churches, in the preaching of the gospel. This is well illustrated by the action of the various churches of Van Buren county, Mich. They have elected Rev. H. H. Anderson, pastor of the Disciples church at Paw Paw as county chairman and they will seek to raise in a single day a quota of $8,525. This money will be divided between the two relief funds.

Seek to Interest the Young People

The problem of interesting the young people in the churches is a distressing one in many communities. Pastors with large congregations may find, to their dismay not a half dozen young people in the whole audience. Rev. Fred G. Bulgin is pastor of Walnut Street Presbyterian Church at Bath, Pa. He has been working on the problem of the young people and has organized a junior choir in which there has been manifested considerable interest. Four young men take the morning offering. The publicity work of the church is carried on by young men. In the evening service there is abundant use of the moving picture machine and the stereopticon. Songs are sung from the screen. The working principle of Mr. Bulgin's method seems to be to enlist the interest of the young people through definite duties. Loyalties are built up through service.

Moody Institute Calls a Meeting in February

Moody Institute has called a meeting of religious workers for the first week in February. It is announced that the meeting will be for the purpose not so much of teaching as of prayer for the blessing of the Holy Spirit. Dr. James M. Gray has issued the call, and the prayer leader will be Mr. Thomas E. Stevens.

Difficult to Get Into Congo Church

While joining church in America has been made easier all the time until now it is accomplished in many congregations by signing a card, in the Congo country the missionaries have seen the advisability of making the conditions rigid and thus raising the standards of membership. A number of the leading Scripture passages must be committed to memory, according to the Christian. These are Psalms 23, 32, 37 and 51, the sermon on the mount, John 3 and 14, Romans 12 and First Corinthians 13. In addition to this knowledge of the Scripture, the new convert must show a consistent Christian life for three months before being received.

Methodists Are Not Paying Up

During the past year the Methodist Episcopal church received the magnificent sum of $15,489,762 from their centenary funds. The bishops are not as happy as these figures might suggest, however. They are anxious over the fact that only 72 per cent of the money that should have been paid in has been paid. As payments on long time pledges tend to become more and more delinquent, they feel apprehensive with regard to the coming years. The full amount of centenary pledges according to the latest information, is $106,000,000, the payments on

Southern Preachers Oppose New Ku Klux Klan

THERE has been a revival of the Ku Klux Klan in the south with four avowed purposes. These are defined as being: Absolute and undying devotion to the government of the United States and strengthening all the laws of the land from the Constitution of the United States down to the ordinances of the smallest country community in the nation; perpetual maintenance in America of white supremacy in all things social, political, and commercial; the complete and absolute separation of church and state; and the protection of woman's honor and preservation of the sanctity of the home."

This movement was launched a few years ago by a teacher of Lanier University at Macon, Ga. He now signs himself as Imperial Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan. The organization wages war not only on Negroes, but on Jews and on the Roman Catholic church. Public meetings are held and parades conducted in which figures appear dressed in the costume used fifty years ago. Warning letters are sent to intended victims and the aims and purposes of the organization are furthered by the wholesale use of intimidation.

Naturally the Negroes of the south have been greatly excited by the appearance of this new menace. It has been like dropping a spark into the magazine of racial hatred. Governors have seen that the new movement was a menace and Governor Bickett of North Carolina and Governor Hugh M. Dorsey of Georgia have both asserted that the state had no need of private and secret organizations in the enforcement of the law.

The opposition of the southern preachers is perhaps the most potent influence against the new movement, for in the southland the minister is an authoritative figure in the community life, and wields correspondingly more power than in the north. One notes with approval the attitude of Dr. Bowie of Richmond, Va. He has been outspoken in the criticism of the Ku Klux Klan.

In this connection he has voiced an attitude toward the Negro which is not essentially different from that of intelligent preachers in the north. He has said: "There are certain things in regard to the race situation which all conscientious men and women should make unmistakable. Unmistakable is the insistence in the first place upon such race separateness as shall maintain the integrity of the white race and of the Negro race, too. But equally unmistakable should be the determination that the Negro as a part of the civilization which involves us all should be assured of justice, a sympathy and a cooperation in his legitimate desires for improvement which no violence and no secret organization shall endanger."

Dr. Bowie was born in Richmond and received his training at Harvard and at Union Theological Seminary. Since 1911 he has been rector of St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church of Richmond. He and many other strong southern preachers have done much to stem the tide of racial hatred.

Meanwhile the Ku Klux Klan is extending its operations to the northward and it is already announced that it will be organized in New York. In the metropolis there is a different crowd mind and perhaps the grotesque leaders of this belated movement will be laughed out of New York as Dowie was a generation ago. In Chicago, too, there is a fertile soil for the agitator, but in this city the Church Federation has already built up strong sentiment among church people in favor of the rights of the Negro people to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

which are to be spread over a period of five years.

Methodist Editors Travel on Slow Train in Arkansas

The editors of the various journals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, got together at Hot Springs not long since for a discussion of common problems. Their report of travel conditions in the much-maligned state of Arkansas is quite congratulatory. Dr. A. J. Weeks of the Texas Christian Advocate spoke on "The Function of a Religious Newspaper." The meeting was a love feast in every way and the spirit of competition which the general public ascribes to religious editors was quite lacking. It is believed that the new organization which was formed will greatly promote religious journalism in the south.

New Editorial Staff for the Baptist

The Baptist is the official organ of the Northern Baptist Convention with a history of a little more than a year. Dr. Crandall, the editor, resigned recently to go back into the pastorate, and the conduct of the journal was placed in the hands of a committee, headed by Rev. Jas. M. Stiffler of Evanston, Ill. Beginning with the first of January a new editorial staff begins its duties. Arthur W. Cleaves will be the editor and Edgar L. Killam will be business manager. These will serve until the Des Moines convention in June. The new editorial staff have announced that the paper is to be made as democratic as possible and editorial material is solicited from the rank and file of the denomination. The Open Forum for the discussion of denominational problems has been a feature of the journal the past year.

Much Opposed to Concordat

At the recent church congress a number of Episcopal priests spoke earnestly against the proposed concordat with the Congregationalists. The opponents of the concordat were answered by Dr. McComb, who began life among the Presbyterians. The point of view of the opposition to the concordat was most explicitly stated by a layman of the high church persuasion who said: "The nobility of Christian unity as a purpose is undisputed. There is one purpose and only one superior to it, and that is fidelity to Christian truth. Facts cannot be denied or overlooked to accommodate unity, without disloyalty to truth. There are at least four facts of catholic and apostolic faith and order involved in the Concordat issue. (1) That Jesus Christ is God. The Congregational churches have been and are very tolerant of the denial of this. (2) That the Words of Institution express a fact and not a metaphor; express Real Presence and not the mere commemoration of an event. Congregationalism stands for the commemoration only. (3) That the episcopate is an episcopate of apostolic succession. This Congregationalism denies. (4) That the priesthood is something more than the ministry of the Word, and that ordination imparts a unique office and function. This Congregationalism denies."

Great English Baptist Has Serious Illness

Dr. J. H. Shakespeare is one of the leading Baptists of England. In recent years he has been over-working, in spite of the remonstrance of his friends. The other day he was taken suddenly ill at the Baptist Church House in London and it will be a long time before he will be able to appear in public again. He is not only denied to callers, but his physician will not even allow him to receive letters.

Death of Dr. Guttery

After a struggle, through a long and painful illness patiently borne, Rev. A. T. Guttery, D.D., of Liverpool, passed away on Friday, December 17, at the age of fifty-eight. During the war, in company with Bishop Gore, he made an extensive tour in the United States on a mission of propaganda for the British government, and was received by the President at the White House. When he returned to England he could only speak in a whisper—his voice had gone. He underwent one operation after another, and for a time his health improved, but finally he succumbed. Son of the most famous orator of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, the Rev. Thomas Guttery, he was himself a very eloquent preacher and most effective platform speaker. A statesman once remarked, "So-and-So does not matter, but Guttery has to be reckoned with—he has a following." He was born in Birmingham in 1862 and his early years were spent in Toronto. He began his ministry in Newcastle-on-Tyne, and at the time of his death was pastor of Prince's Avenue Church, Liverpool. He was an ex-president of the Primitive Methodist Connexion and of the National Free Church Council. He leaves a widow and six children.

Dr. Garvie Attacks the Prime Minister

English evangelicals have through the years stood by David Lloyd George, but there are some signs of a weakening of this loyalty in recent times. A meeting was held recently in Kingsway Hall at which Mr. Arthur Henderson and Dr. E. A. Garvie spoke. The meeting was a protest against the government policy in Ireland. While Mr. Henderson dealt with the question in a very quiet and considerate way, the aged theologian spoke bitterly about the premier. One sentence from his speech was cheered to the echo by the audience present. It was, "I'd rather be the hundredth part of a Gladstone than the whole of Mr. Lloyd-George."

Dan Crawford Visits Livingstone Grave

Every student of missionary history knows that while the body of David Livingstone lies in Westminster Abbey, his heart is buried in a wild and inaccessible spot in Africa. Recently Dan Crawford, the great missionary who immortalized himself by writing "Thinking Black," set out on a journey to find the spot where the heart of Livingstone is buried. After a laborious search it was found and many small mementoes of the life of Livingstone were recovered. Near by the great missionary heart lies the body of the black man who served as a kind of man Friday to Livingstone. Livingstone had hoped that his body might lie in Africa when his work was done. This privilege was denied him, but his heart is still buried where his faithful black friends placed it, though there is no longer even a path to this sacred spot.

Annual Meeting of National Lutheran Council

Several of the national organizations of Lutherans are now banded together in the National Lutheran Council for the specific purpose of relieving suffering in Europe. The second annual meeting of the organization was held in Chicago in December. The Council now federates the efforts of more than two million Lutherans. Already European headquarters have been established, these being located in Copenhagen. Every country in Europe which has any considerable number of Lutherans has already received some measure of assistance. In charge of the Copenhagen office is Dr. John A. Morehead, formerly president of Roanoke College. Three hundred thousand Lutherans who had been exiled from Poland began to come back from Siberia a year ago, and those people have made large drafts upon the sympathy of the National Lutheran Council. At first they asked for New Testaments, and later they asked for loans of money with which to rehabilitate their fortunes in the villages from which they had been taken. Large numbers of these have been aided in sufficient amount that they are now recovering somewhat from the effects of the war. The American Lutherans have been touched by the fact that much of the Lutheran mission work of central Europe was interrupted by the war. In order that this should not be a total loss the Council has appropriated $166,000 to aid in these missionary operations. Perhaps the greatest single achievement of the Council has been to arrange for a world council of Lutherans to be held in 1922. It is not yet announced where this world council will be held, but when it comes together it will represent the religious interests of 81,500,000 souls. Lutheranism has become greatly differentiated in various countries and the various varieties in America have had difficulty in setting up cooperation, Missouri Synod Lutherans, being particularly difficult. If the Lutheran hosts should really come to exercise their power as one people, it would have a significant effect in the life of the world. The president of the Council is Dr. Lauritz Larsen of New York.

December 13, 1920.

IF any visitor to these shores were to inquire into the present relation of the churches to each other, the answer he received would depend entirely upon the people amongst whom he found himself. The most important question he should put in order to place his informant is thus—"Pray how old are you?" If he is over fifty, he may be put—speaking generally—into one group; under fifty, into another. The Overs would probably give a picture not too hopeful of the future; they might report that reunion was receding. The Unders would face the problems with entirely different data. Dr. Gore has said of the problem of religious education that it is a pity it cannot be left now to the men under fifty who were not involved in the last pitched battle of 1902. What is true of this problem, is true of Reunion. To which score the balance of trustworthiness dips, it is not easy to determine. There does appear to be a reaction in certain quarters among the older people; they are afraid that things vital may be sacrificed in the eagerness of the younger generation for a closer fellowship; they suspect ambushes. The older people in the nature of things have control largely of the ecclesiastical policies; they are at the wheels of the ships; and they are cautious, afraid of betraying a trust committed to them—prepared to hold fast what they have. What becomes of young reformers—where are the red ties of their youth?

But there is one fact which has changed the problem for the younger ministers and others: they have grown up in an atmosphere of close fellowship with members of other churches. Thanks to the student movement, and other kindred societies, they know each other; and the Free Church minister and his Anglican neighbor are on different teams when they have ragged together in a summer camp. Even a bishop may become different if he is known still by the friendly nickname of "Billy." But the fellowship between the younger Free Churchmen and their Anglican contemporaries is more than a pleasant social affair.

They have thought together, and prayed together; and they have written books together. It is this new comradeship which is changing the temperature of religious controversy.

Last week, to take one instance, the United Council of Missionary Education met for its annual sessions; there were present representatives of every great missionary society; in fellowship they planned books and reviewed the entire problem of missionary education. In such companies the preliminary difficulty which must be solved before reunion is possible, has already been solved; there is unbroken confidence, and love banishes suspicion and touchiness. Already this council in its short history has sold a million books, and it is common in this country for Anglican study circles to use books written by Free Churchmen and for Free Churchmen to study the world, as it needs Christ, through the eyes of Anglicans. The thing has become so much a matter of course that no one notices it. Perhaps to American readers this will seem too much a matter of course to deserve comment, but for those who know the church in these islands, even a quarter of a century ago, it is a remarkable and significant fact, rich in promise.

At present reunion has not passed out of books into practical expression; but fellowship is growing and without it reunion would be a poor and ineffective device. Books, too, are doing much clearing of the ground. Dr. Headlam, the Regius Professor of Divinity in Oxford, has marked a new stage in the historical discussion by his Bampton Lectures, in which he lays great stress upon the intention of the churches; and states the position of the Church of England not as though it were a complete church to which others must surrender, but as a church, itself incomplete and needing what others, also incomplete, have to give. There can be no reunion except of churches all of them humbled by failure. Dr. Charles Gore is the leader now of those high churchmen who hold the doctrine of apostolic succession, which Dr. Headlam rejects. Dr. Gore, who has a great and deserved name among us, has criticized the Oxford lecturer, but Dr. Headlam holds his ground stubbornly. Meanwhile the Roman Catholic church is busy; several books of a gracious and peaceable tone have been published, setting forth the Roman claims. One in particular is by six Oxford men. "God and the Supernatural" is a singularly able and impressive answer to the question, "What does Rome believe?"; and though on the problem of reunion Rome cannot give place one inch—it must demand surrender—it can show its understanding of the others and its charity. It is something to have a Roman apologist confess that he has little but gratitude for the older evangelicalism.

The sum of the matter lies here: so far as official action is concerned, there is much removal of stumbling blocks to be finished first: There are ways to be explored; and prejudices removed; above all, the leaders must be sure of their followers. But all the while there is a practice of fellowship which is slowly but certainly leading the scattered members of Christ nearer to each other. That fellowship is strong in scholarship, which after all must speak the last word in purely historical matters. It is strong among the leaders of the foreign missionary enterprise; face to face with the darkness of heathendom abroad and at home, they are driven together. It is a living reality in the student movement, and this life of fellowship enjoyed and loved by youth will not fail to have its visible effects. That is why it is important always to consider the personal equation of the speakers who report on reunion. Are they thinking of the church assemblies, or of the practice of fellowship by those who are seeking the kingdom of God? Are they on this side of fifty or that?

In former days bishops were appointed out of the ranks of scholars who had been headmasters or had edited Greek plays. The new bishop of Manchester, Dr. William Temple, is the president of the Workers' Educational Association, and a member of the Labor party. The W. E. A. is a society which carries to the door of the studious artisan the best teaching which the universities can provide; it has already made a difference in the social forces, which are shaping the new order; in many places there are artisans trained in the careful and well-planned methods of this society; they are versed in economics and history; they are often scholars by temperament and the W. E. A. has given to them the one thing needful. It has not aimed at crowds; it has fixed its attention on the few who are ready to enter for a prolonged course of study with a tutor; for him they write essays; he guides their reading, and becomes the interpreter for them of the human scene. When the lovers of every age but their own praise the book-loving artisan of the days when Kingsley wrote, it is well to let them know of these groups of men and women, who are studying under the W. E. A. This society owes a great debt to two men, Mr. Albert Mansbridge and the new Bishop of Manchester.

* * *

If there is predestination in things ecclesiastical, Dr. Temple was called to be a bishop. He has served many apprenticeships: as Oxford lecturer on philosophy, headmaster of Repton, editor of The Challenge, canon of Westminster; founder of The Life and Liberty Movement; he has done much and touched nothing which he has not adorned. When in addition to these tasks, it is remembered that the new bishop has written several small books and one large treatise, Mens Creatrix, it will be admitted that he has made diligent use of his years; but his friends look for greater things from this vivid and gifted personality.

The drive has not been hitherto a method much employed in British churches; but the Baptists have used it with signal success in their victory week. They set out to raise a quarter of a million pounds, and they did this and more. As a rule the churches on this side prefer to spread their giving for special funds over a longer period. Like the people of a certain southern county, their motto is, "We won't be druv." But perhaps the idea of the drive is finding a place in our ecclesiastical mind. Dr. J. H. Shake-

Spurgeon, the secretary of the Baptist Union, is a master of organization, as well as a pioneer of union among the Free Churches. While he is working for the federation of all the Free Churches, he does not forget his own people, and he reports that the raising of this 250,000 pounds has been the occasion for a spiritual revival among many of the Baptist churches. This has not always been the experience of religious societies. Sometimes the promoters of big funds have hoped that when the money is all in and the buildings reared, the revival will follow; and it has not followed.

The publication of a new life of Spurgeon has revived many of the former attempts to analyze his gifts, and account for him. The older journalists have brushed up their recollections of the preacher whom all visitors to London loved to hear. Some have repeated the old and singularly shallow criticism that Spurgeon was a man of little intellect and small reading. But others, notably Mr. Augustine Birrell, have made effective answers to these charges. Mr. Spurgeon was indeed a man with a mighty religious experience, but he had at his service a mind quick and well stored. The controversies of his life have for most men an old-world air; it was not by virtue of these that he won the ear of his generation. With the discussion of the older giants of the pulpit there has been linked a scepticism concerning their successors: "There are no Spurgeons now." They are saying: "The pulpit has lost its power; the day of the press has come." It would be easy to show how unsupported are these laments. There are not wanting preachers in London still with a power to move the hearts of men, and to change the spiritual direction of countless lives. To name only a few, there are preaching today in London men as widely apart theologically as the Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Orchard, Dr. Horton, Dr. Gore; Mr. Chilvers of the Metropolitan Tabernacle; but they are alike in their power to make the pulpit dynamic—a place where things are not only said but done, and they count still. It may well be that the public today is less inclined than ever to pay attention to a speaker simply because he is in a pulpit. But they have no objection to the pulpit as such, if the person within it has a message. In fact the average Briton dearly loves a sermon, though he often dissembles his love by his fierce attacks on certain preachers and their sermons. Lord Fisher delighted in hearing preachers; and in this as in so many other things, he was a representative of his people.

Friends of Dr. Clifford—and there must be crowds of them everywhere—will hear with regret of the accident which has put him out of action for a while. "Dr. Clifford is a good man to have with you in a fight," Mr. W. T. Stead once remarked. "He is not always looking out for a way of retreat." Apart from all that he has done—and it has been a great work—this veteran has served the churches and his country even more by what he has been, a single-minded, disinterested, fearless, Christian man. How he has enjoyed and still enjoys life! It makes younger men ashamed of their fears and despairs, when they see this old man rejoicing in hope.

What and Where Is God?

A Human Answer to the Deep
Religious Cry of the Modern Soul

By

Richard LaRue Swain, Ph. D.

Charles Clayton Morrison,

Editor The Christian Century, says:

"I could wish that every uncertain and troubled mind might know that there is such a book as this. It makes God intelligible to men of modern world view. It shows how science prepares the way for a far better, more vital, more spiritual, more personal God than was possible under the older forms of thinking. The author is one of those psychologists—and alas! all too few is their number—who have gone into the technique of psychology and thought their way through it into real life again. He speaks with authority. His book will have the approval of technical scholarship, but it is intended for the lay mind. I know that if any person reads the book on my recommendation he will divide with me a small portion of the enthusiastic gratitude which he will surely feel toward the author. In my judgment it is far and away the most important book on religion that is appearing this year."

Douglas C. MacIntosh,

Professor of Theology in Yale University, says:

"What and Where is God? draws a clearly defined picture of God, man, and the universe to take the place of the fading picture that is becoming such a menace to religious faith. Dr. Swain has produced what will undoubtedly prove to be one of the most notable religious books of the year. It contains descriptions of religious experiences which rival in interest anything to be found in William James's 'Varieties of Religious Experience' or Harold Begbie's 'Twice-born Men.' But its most valuable feature is its simple, vivid, original, and attractive presentation of the most important elements of modern constructive thought. A better book to put into the hands of the religiously perplexed and doubting has not been written for many a day. It is a book that will live."

The Christian Century's GREAT NEW YEAR

LIKE the motif of a symphony, one theme will run through the wide range of discussion in The Christian Century during 1921. This theme will be a consideration of the basic question:

DO THE IDEALS OF JESUS FIT TODAY'S LIFE?

A vital question it is—the most searching question that anyone can ask, and it is the question which everybody is asking. Some are asking it in strident and cynical voices; others wistfully and with baffled minds; others hopefully; and still others ask, unconscious that they are asking. But all men and women are raising the question as to the place we can rationally give to Jesus of Galilee in the society of the Twentieth Century.

Our discussion of this crucial question will be conducted in the most thorough-going fashion. Many types of writers will participate, ranging all the way from enlightened orthodoxy to constructive radicalism. The theme itself is conceived so as to cover all aspects of modern life—industry, politics, art, business, philosophy, science, theology, international relations, the church, etc., etc.

We offer our readers not so much a series of articles as a serial discussion in which minds of outstanding authority will lead, and all of us—readers, contributors and editors—will have a part. This unique conception is characteristic of the type of journalistic intimacy and unity which The Christian Century has succeeded in creating between itself and its great body of readers and contributors. The discussion will last

and will begin about February 1.

Some Typical Names From Our WHO'S WHO

MORE than two score of the nation's most influential thinkers chosen both from within the church and from without will declare their convictions on various aspects of the great theme. We are able at this date to set down a partial list of the names of those who have accepted a place in the discussion.

MR. ROGER BABSON, famous statistician, the nation's leading interpreter of industrial and economic conditions, will write on "Jesus and the Competitive System."

PROFESSOR HARRY F. WARD, Professor of Social Ethics in Union Theological Seminary, radical in his views and passionately Christian in his temper, will also write on "Jesus and the Competitive System."

PROFESSOR CHARLES A. ELLWOOD, sociologist of the University of Missouri, will write on "Is Civilization Christian?"

DR. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, preacher and author of many vital books, and BISHOP FRANCIS J. McCONNELL, Methodism's valiant champion of progress, will both write on "Is the Christian Church Christian?"

DEAN SHAILER MATHEWS, of the University of Chicago, editor, teacher, publicist, will write on "Is Modern Theology Christian?"

DR. JOSEPH FORT NEWTON, a favorite with all Christian Century readers, will write on "Is Modern Literature Christless?"

DR. WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN, of Union Theological Seminary, himself author of a book on our discussion subject, has chosen a theme which will probably open the whole series. He will consider "What Must a Religion Be to Be Practicable?"

DR. JOHN M. COULTER, world-famous botanist, will write on some phase of the relation of scientific evolution to Christianity.

DR. LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, author and preacher, will write on "Can Science Be Christian?"

DR. ROBERT E. SPEER, probably the most influential spiritual leader in the American church, will write on "Can Our Social Customs Be Christianized?"

DR. ALBERT PARKER FITCH, of Amherst, author of "Can the Church Survive?" will write on "Do the Churches Really Believe in Jesus?"

Other writers have been asked to participate, among them such leaders as:

DR. JOHN KELMAN	MR. JOHN SPARGO
DR. RICHARD L. SWAIN	MISS JANE ADDAMS
DEAN CHARLES R. BROWN	DR. HARRY E. FOSDICK

And many others.

All aspects of the great question will be treated with authority. This discussion will be the

in the religious journalism of our times.

We Desire The Names Of 25,000 THINKING PERSONS

who are interested in religious progress and discussion, and who will be particularly interested in the great series of articles during 1921 on the subject:

DO THE IDEALS OF JESUS FIT TODAY'S LIFE?

OUR present readers are the folks to get these names for us. And we desire to reciprocate their kindness by a cash credit on their own subscription whenever their renewals fall due. This arrangement is an act of trust in our subscribers' absolute good faith in choosing names for their lists. The offer is made to our subscribers only, and will not be honored otherwise. Let every reader now put on his thinking cap. That thoughtful layman or lay woman in yonder pew; that liberal minded minister across the way, or in some other city, of your own or another denomination; that intelligent Sunday school superintendent or teacher; that judge, that high school principal, that physician, that missionary minded woman, that social minded business man whose conversation recently impressed you for its intelligent interest in things religious and ethical—speak or write to them about The Christian Century and send us their names if you think our prospect of winning them is hopeful. Here is the great opportunity of the season to draw together the more generous minded leaders of religious activities in all the churches into a compact body of understanding. Manifestly the hour has struck in the American church for a mighty expansion of the influence of those ideals which make The Christian Century an inspiration to its present reading constituency. We do not ask you to get the subscriptions. We only ask you to prepare the way for us to get them.

One Dollar FOR FIVE NAMES

THE cooperation we ask of our subscribers during the present month of January is of a sort that cannot be paid for. Your influence, your time, your friendship we cannot compensate with pay. We could not hope for your aid except as we know the quality of your loyalty to Christian Century Ideals. Nevertheless we wish to demonstrate our appreciation in a certain way. So, for the five names you send in we will enter a credit of $1.00 to apply on your own subscription renewal. The credit will be acknowledged by the symbol (Cr.) in the address on the wrapper and when bill for renewal is sent one dollar will be deducted from regular subscription price. No credit will be given for less than five names. More than five names may be sent if the subscriber will undertake to communicate as below with each one, but we cannot give more than one dollar in credit. All lists of names must reach us before the end of January.

(Please use this form in sending names, and please write very plainly).

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY,
1408 So. Wabash Ave.
Chicago.

Dear Sirs:

As a friendly reader, I would like to have you send several copies of The Christian Century to the five names listed below. They are thoughtful persons, interested in religious progress and discussion, and I feel sure would relish the untrammelled and constructive treatment of vital issues, that characteristic of The Christian Century which your readers greatly prize. I have personally either spoken or written to each of these persons commending The Christian Century, and particularly calling attention to the forthcoming series on "The Ideals of Jesus in Today's Life." I think I have opened the way for a favorable consideration of whatever communication you may send. It is my belief that the right approach by your circulation department will win their subscriptions.

By H. G. Wells

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY is unique in the modern literature of the world. It is doubtful whether there is another writer living who could even have approached the subject with anything like the breadth of mind, the knowledge, the judgment, and the enthusiasm with which H. G. Wells is equipped. A scientist trained under Huxley, teacher and educational critic of practical experience, author not only of romances, novels and essays, but of a Text-Book of Biology that a recent traveller found being used as a text-book in a Chinese University,—it is no wonder that Henry James said of Mr. Wells years ago: "Mr. Wells' documented or saturated state in respect to a particular matter at hand is but one of the faces of his generally informed condition, of his extraordinary mass of gathered and assimilated knowledge . . . He is a novelist very much as Lord Bacon was a philosopher, who affects us as taking all knowledge for his province."

That is exactly what Mr. Wells has at length done. He has taken all history for his province. He has been preaching for years that history properly taught is the backbone of education. And now he gives his version of history properly taught, as one vast panorama not of "reigns and pedigrees and campaigns" of ordinary history, but of "ages and races and nations," brought within the "normal limitations of time and energy set to the reading and energy of an ordinary citizen." Beginning with primal star-dust, through the making of the planet and the birth of amoeba and reptile and mammal, through the slow evolution of that Neanderthal being that has always so curiously intrigued Mr. Wells, through the dawn and early light of recorded history, Sumerian, Assyrian, Mongolian, Egyptian, Greek, Hebrew, Roman, Teutonic, down to the Great War and the present, runs the tremendous record. Astronomy, geology, biology, anthropology,—all contribute data to this most encyclopedic of histories.

The book is profusely illustrated with Maps, Time Diagrams and Drawings by J. F. HORRABIN.

COMMENTS OF THE PRESS.

"If the New Republic had to choose now a single modern work to which it might direct its readers for that saner understanding of men's collective life which this weekly was established to promote, it would be willing to choose THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY by H. G. WELLS."—Editors, The New Republic.

"The whole History of the World fused into one epical story. A clear, luminous and concentrated story of mankind written by a story teller. Mr. Wells has had the assistance of our greatest living historians and scientific writers with the object of obtaining accuracy in every detail."—Spectator (London).

Of Dr. Joseph Fort Newton the American Journal of Theology says: "It is a striking fact that from a town of the Central West, whose very name is unknown to England, a preacher should have been called to the City Temple, London, a pulpit made famous by Joseph Parker and Dr. Campbell. Mr. Newton is a mystic, but of a different type. He goes back of the long line of doctrinal and ecclesiastical development to Jesus of the Gospels, to the ideal human life in whom God dwelt and through whom God revealed his redemptive love, the divine Saviour and Master of men. This life of the living Christ, touching every life, the soul of every redemptive movement, actually working in men and with men for the world's salvation. His sermons speak especially to cultivated minds, yet through their simplicity and naturalness and humanness, they make the universal appeal. Here is the real power. They do not speak the language of the church, but the language of humanity. They are real sermons of a warm, spiritual, enthusiastic manhood."

Dr. Newton is one of the favorite contributors to The Christian Century, and his books are particularly popular among our book-loving constituency.

God's Faith in Man

By Frederick F. Shannon

ONE of the outstanding religious prophets of today is Dr. Shannon, until recently of Brooklyn, now successor to Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus at Central Church, Chicago.

The Biblical World says of him: "Seldom can the much abused word 'brilliant' be correctly applied to a living preacher; but in the case of Dr. Shannon no other term is appropriate. He is radiant and glittering and surprising and illuminating."

This is Dr. Shannon's Latest Book of Sermons

Price of the book, $1.25, plus 12 cents postage.

A Prayer for a Vigilant Spirit

EVER waking and working God, whose untiring purpose sustains all righteous causes, without whose unsleeping care our world would fall into confusion, we stand penitent before Thee because of the inconstant service we give to Thy holy work. How unsteady are our wills. How capricious is our loyalty. How easily satisfied are we with partial victory. How many are the enterprises of righteousness which we let fail because we fall asleep after winning initial success. We confess our indolence of purpose, our childish weakness under responsibility, our variableness of impulse and our love of sleep.

O Thou who watchest over Israel, impart to us in our human degree something of Thy spirit of unresting devotion, of unflagging zeal, of sleepless vigilance. Great causes for which men have wrought and suffered through many generations have in our day come to incredible success. We are overcome with joy at victories we hardly hoped to live to see. We give Thee praise for these wondrous tokens of Thine undiminished power and Thy living presence. Forbid, O Lord, that our foolish hearts should be tempted into sleep, as though our work were done. Dispel the listless mood of evening-time and smite our eyes with the light of noon, that we may see the tasks and dangers which challenge and defy our powers.

We observe our Master at his work. Unhurried and unwearied, he stops not save to take fresh drafts of power at the fountain of prayer. May we keep company with him, working as he worked, watching as he watched, praying as he prayed. Give us the divine shrewdness that was in him which made him inaccessible to the soothing wiles of the evil one. Waken us, O Lord! May we be instant in season and out of season. And having done all, may the spirit of vigilance be so truly our own that we shall not want to sleep, but, having done all, to stand. Amen.

A "Christian" Daily Newspaper

IN making a judgment on the character of the new Christian newspaper, The American Daily Standard, recently launched in Chicago, one has to deplore a certain ultra conservative bias in the religious emphasis which appears in its pages. So far the editorial staff and list of contributors to the religious side of the paper seem to be drawn exclusively from the ranks of those who show no particular awareness of distinctively modern developments of religious conviction and effort. The social note as a religious note is conspicuously silent. The orthodoxy of the paper in the old-time sense of orthodoxy, is not likely to be called in question. These considerations, however, important as they are, must not be allowed unduly to warp the judgment of the venture as a whole. Clear in typography, conservative in make-up, the Standard makes a definite and pleasing appeal to those who have grown disgusted with the disproportionate featuring of oftentimes inconsequential news in the headlines. The paper has in it too little of Chicago news to make it a competitor in any formidable degree of the great dailies of the metropolis. The news is selected on much the same principle as the Christian Science Monitor and will be interesting to people throughout the Mississippi Valley. The problem of financing it is the one at which experienced newspaper men shake their heads. It begins to appear that the response in subscriptions and street sales is a sad disappointment to the promoters. A distressful letter expressing this disappointment and calling for help has been sent to ministers of all churches in the Chicago area. Ministers are beseeched to make the paper's cause the subject of pulpit appeal. This frenzied appeal, coming only two weeks after the launching of the paper, is unfortunate as it will be taken to indicate that the financial basis is by no means sufficiently strong to uphold the paper until it can grow its constituency. We do not discuss here the question whether such a journalistic venture is sound in principle. Much as our secular journalism needs cleaning up, it is seriously to be doubted that the church, as a church, affords either an exploitable point of view or a leverage for carrying out such an enterprise.

Journalistic Signs of the Times

MEANWHILE there are other efforts looking toward clean journalism in Chicago. Almost simultaneously with the appearance of the "Christian" daily the Journal of Commerce made its first appearance on the newsstands. It is in the hands of experienced newspaper men, one of whom was long in the service of the Hearst interests. The ethical, not to say the aesthetic, elasticity of the newspaper profession is strikingly illustrated in the fact that the same man who made the Hearst morning daily the extreme in journalistic abomination has succeeded in producing a paper whose restraint, conservatism and proportion are at quite the opposite end of the scale. The Journal of Commerce is, of course, capitalistic in its social bias, but in sailing under the name it frankly carries at the mast head its propaganda is peculiarly legitimate. Many admirable features invest the new paper with promise. The Chicago Evening Post, owned by Mr. John C. Schaefer, a prominent Methodist layman of Chicago, though claiming no special commission at the hands of the church, has recently added to its characteristically sturdy ethical quality some new religious features, among them the religious editorial. The other kind of newspaper would do well to read the signs of the times. These three papers would not be bidding for the support of the citizens of Chicago were there not in this city and the middle west a genuine demand for honest and responsible journalism. Probably we have too many good dailies appearing on the scene all at once for all of them to survive, but their appearance will be a significant force in raising the standards of journalism in this city.

The Debit and the Credit of Civilization

NEVER has the necessity of safeguarding the advance of civilization with Christian influences been more significantly shown than in those regions of the earth where weak races have been subjected to the touch of the materialistic, self-seeking spirit of the commercial West without the counterbalance of Christianity. In some of the islands of the Pacific, for example, the coming of the white men with their grasping avarice and their vices brought on disintegration of morals and racial stamina.

The missionaries, who made their way to such places as soon as they were able, found their task difficult if not impossible. In his recent book on the South Seas, Mr. Frederick O'Brien, a man of the world in many senses, makes this clear beyond all misunderstanding. He says, speaking particularly of the Marquesas Islands: "Non-Christians may laugh at the missionaries and their efforts among the heathen. But the missionaries are the only influence for good in the islands, the only white men seeking to mitigate the misery and the ruin wrought by the white man's system of trade. The extension of civilized commerce has crushed every natural impulse of brotherliness, kindness and generosity, destroyed every good and clean custom of these children of nature. Traders and sailors, whalers and soldiers, have been their enemies. Whatever the errors of the men of God, they have given their lives day by day in unrelenting, self-sacrificing toil, suffering much to share with these despoiled people the light of their faith in a better world hereafter." It will be impossible for the best of the Christian peoples, working through generations to come, to undo the damage that some of the worst of their representatives have wrought. This is one of the many reasons for a self-denying effort to repair the ruin that so-called civilization has worked in more than one portion of the world.

Motion Pictures for the Churches

MANY pastors and church workers interested in the use of motion pictures both as a means of education and of social work, have been awaiting the development of the International Church Film Corporation. That company is now able to announce the successful filming and exhibition of "Blind Bartimeus," a one-reel Bible story based upon the faithful beggar and "The Call of Samuel," a one-reel film covering the story of the life of the lad of biblical narrative. "The Little Shepherd" is not so strictly a biblical story but a sort of parallel tale that exhibits the costumes and scenes of biblical life. In addition there are now ready for distribution some scenics and several films of the more conventional type built, of course, on the moral basis that churches desire. These they propose for the mid-week social and community gatherings in churches. "The Patch Work Girl of Oz" is an example of the kind of films designed for children's gatherings. The First Christian Church of Springfield, Ill., the Warren Street Methodist church of Brooklyn and many others are cited as having made the experiment with satisfaction and success. Churches have usually been able to make the exhibition pay for itself, and many speak highly of the results in terms of increased audiences, profitable entertainment, improved method of instruction and a means for wholesome moral education to many not reached before. The eye gate is widest open, and the human interest that takes some six to eight millions to the movie theaters every day furnishes a basis for religious study and program. William A. Pinkerton is quoted in the New York World as saying that automobiles and movies are largely responsible for the crime wave. Why then do we condemn the movie in a wholesale manner and spare the auto? Both can be set to work for good as well as for evil if the forces of righteousness will make use of them as do the forces of evil. They are not the causes but the instruments of evil doing.

Are There Two Standards of Ethics?

LONG centuries have been employed in the erection of an ethical standard for individuals. There is still question in some minds as to whether the standard is the same for men as for women. But within wide areas there is little difficulty in reaching definitions. It is taken for granted that the common virtues of honesty, truthfulness, humanity, sympathy and neighborliness are obligatory. And those who violate these simple rules with impunity establish for themselves unenviable and disadvantageous reputations. To what extent is there the same standard of conduct for nations and for classes? Is there one ethic for people as units in the social order, and another for them collectively? That is the question which the post-war period has forced upon the world in a most urgent manner. The man who deals with his fellows in a selfish, unneighborly way wins for himself only disesteem and contempt. Has a nation, particularly one dowered with all the advantages of wealth and unimpaired resources, the right to isolate itself from the sufferings of the world, whether they be physical or moral sufferings? To ask the question is to answer it. The nation has the same obligations to friendliness and solicitude regarding its weaker sisters that the individual has toward his neighbors. That is both good ethics and common sense Christianity.

American Farmers to the Rescue of Europe

THE 35 per cent of the folks who live out in the open country and produce the food of the world issue a magnificent challenge to the other 65 per cent of us when they say that no child in all the world need perish for lack of food. The farmers propose to give the food if the rest of us will only transport it from the country shipping stations to the mouths of the starving in Europe, China, or the Near East. Surely the farmers' challenge will be accepted at face value. If those who worked early and late out in the sun and wind and rain to produce the food can afford to give it, the non-producers can transport it. The offer of the great gift was dramatic and unexpected. At the annual meeting of the Illinois Agricultural Association in Chicago last week, the president of the American Farm Bureau Federation,—one James R. Howard of Clemons P. O., Iowa—at the conclusion of his speech, which dealt with such economic questions as marketing, railroads, tariff, international credit, etc., asked: "Are we our brothers' keepers? Shall we do to others as we would have them do to us? The world is out of joint when millions are starving in Europe and China and we on our farms have cribs overflowing with corn for which we are offered far less than it cost us to produce, because they say we worked too hard and raised too much. Why not, out of our bumper crop, pledge as a free-will offering enough to save these starving 'invisible guests,' provided that not a bushel is sold on our markets further to depress the price, and provided that the non-agricultural folks will transport it?" Mr. Howard ended his speech amid a storm of applause. A young farmer from Stronghurst, Ill., named Bob Clarke, mounted the rostrum and coined a phrase of living flame when he said: "God has been good to us. Let us market our surplus in Relief and take our pay in Love. Whiteside county pledges the first carload of corn." Whereupon the delegates clamored for the opportunity of pledging corn until five minutes yielded 70,500 bushels. Telegrams were sent to the farm bureau federations in other cornbelt states and they all came back at once with pledges of closest cooperation.

Farmers' Losses and Problems

THE farmer is under no illusions. Ask him about the gift magnificent and he would disclaim generosity. Nevertheless, it is magnificent generosity, because every pound of free food that leaves his farm to feed the hungry displaces a pound that the world would have had to buy from him for the purpose. But he would tell you that he raised 500,000,000 bushels more corn last year than his average crop for the past ten years; that the lowest estimate submitted from careful studies by his agricultural economists is that it cost him 93 cents per bushel to produce that corn. Yet the cash market in Chicago is some 65 cents per bushel for corn, and he claims that in the country he is not offered nearly that much. Evidently, he believes that he is not being fairly treated in the present method of distribution and he has a committee representing all the various agricultural interests involved in the problem—the Farmers' Grain Marketing Committee of Seventeen—at work upon the problem. Dispatches from Washington of hearings before the House Committee on Agriculture as to whether or not "futures" and "short selling" should be legislated out of existence, show the layman something of the conflict which is going on. The public waits with interest the farmer's own solution of the great problem of distribution. Meanwhile, the farmer says that none need starve; he will furnish the food. It would seem that even one who does not know corn would be glad to sample a little corn meal mush in order to avoid starvation. It is up to the rest of us to meet the farmers' challenge and carry over to Christ's suffering little ones the great gift that is thus put at our feet.

The Hunger Strike As An Evangelistic Agency

FOR a wife to refuse food until her reculant husband professes the Christian faith, is a new method of evangelistic influence. The whole country has its eyes turned at this time toward Danville, Ill., where a wife not only demands conversion, but also insists that her butcher husband shall become a missionary. The husband insists he wouldn't be dealing fairly with the Almighty if he professed something he did not believe. He claims to live according to the ten commandments and the golden rule. In such a phenomenon we witness the belated effects of the old time evangelistic hysteria. A hunger-striking woman is no more irrational than were the sermons upon which her soul was fed. The basis of Jesus' religion is rational. No man's reason may be forced. There may be faith without proof, but there can be no faith against proof. Such faith becomes blind superstition, the suicide of the intellect. The butcher who refuses to join the church because of his reverence for the Almighty, and who accepts both the ten commandments and the golden rule is not far from the Kingdom. Abraham Lincoln said he would join the church if there existed any church that would take him upon such a profession of faith. There are several millions like this in America. They are too sturdy and honest in their intellectual life to be moved by vain threats of hell. Some are honest enough to go to hell rather than to try to get into heaven by hypocrisy. They will respond to an ethical and spiritual presentation of the gospel of Christ. Not hunger strikes, but rational enlightenment is what will win them.

IT is only a commonplace, familiar to everyone at all acquainted with the history of instruction in the Bible and the related disciplines of character-making, that the entire field and content of religious education has shifted within the past ten years. The agencies that carry on this service have had a revised evaluation in the light of experience. Many fresh activities have come into being. Formerly their enumeration was simple. Now it is a somewhat complex task even to call the list of such institutions and organizations. All this means that discontent with the standards of the past is the note of the hour, and vigorous inquiry into the nature of the problems of education and the best means of projecting an acceptable program of religious instruction is the serious task of the time.

In the area of church educational activity the Sunday school has had the right of way. Its story of inception and achievement is one of interest. Responding to the demand for some coordinating organization to supervise and promote the work in a uniform manner, the International Sunday School Association came into being, and has performed admirable service through many years. Its chief defects have been two. It was in no vital sense the leader in the development of modern and efficient religious pedagogy, but trailed slowly and reluctantly in the wake of educational progress. But even more serious was the fact that it was a volunteer organization, self-perpetuating in structure, and representative of nothing in particular except the body of people who took part in its loosely constructed activities.

These defects, basic and far reaching in their character, led to the organization of the Council of Sunday School Boards, a body springing directly and logically from the denominational bodies, responsible to them, and authorized to speak for them. This was a long step in advance. But of course it was natural for the older body to resent and oppose the birth of a rival, and a period of friction supervened. This led to the effort to unite the two agencies, which is now in contemplation. Some friends of the movement affirm that it has already taken place. Formal action looking to that end has indeed been taken. But the effectual realization of such a plan of amalgamation is far from accomplished, and there are grave reasons to suspect that it never can be brought to pass in an efficient manner.

The two groups of interested people are too dissimilar in training and ideals to work together with harmony. The older one represents popular and largely outgrown methods of Sunday school propaganda, depending chiefly upon public gatherings and exceptional features such as field days to stimulate interest in its work. It has attempted to raise large sums of money to promote its work, but latterly with only moderate success. The churches are less and less inclined to accept a superimposed program, and prefer to function through a body of their own choosing and direction in the most vital area of their activity. These advantages are supplied by the Council of Sunday School Boards. Its leadership is representative of a trained type of educational service. It speaks with coherence and authority for the churches. It depends less upon spectacular propaganda and world circling convention itineraries than upon quiet, constructive study of the problems, and adjustment to their successful solution.

If the Council could absorb or in some other manner supersede the Sunday School Association it might hope for general and approving recognition. There is a deep yearning in the world of religious education for a sort of leadership that is dependable and progressive. Such an agency might properly receive the approval of the Federal Council of Churches as its authorized Commission on Christian Education. Such designation the present amorphous combination is in no way competent to demand or receive. It cannot walk on feet of iron and clay. It is impossible to expect efficient leadership from an agency that is not coherent or authoritative.

Conferences are in progress to meet these difficulties. The leaders in all the churches recognize the problem, and hope for some satisfactory solution. If the Council of Sunday School Boards cannot disengage itself from its present unhappy and illogical connection, then the Federal Council or some other interdenominational agency will need to create a body to perform the service which cries aloud for performance. It must assume real leadership in the all-important field of Christian education in the churches and other institutions set for the promotion of the vocational and practical ministries of the church. It must also coordinate the agencies of education in related areas.

where organizations like the Y. M. C. A. are busy. The time for an aggressive and well directed campaign, under competent leadership, has arrived, and the churches are minded to insist upon its early appearance.

Mortal Mind Bothers Mrs. Eddy's Followers

THE affairs of the national organization of the Christian Scientists are still in the courts and perhaps will be for some time. A schism in the organization threatens to widen as time goes on, the prize being the enormous profits which are made annually from the publishing business. During the lifetime of Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, her will was supreme. At her death she left the direction of the Mother Church to a board of Directors. As all Christian Scientists are members of the Mother Church, a little group of men administered the affairs of the thousands of people who are members of the Christian Science church throughout the United States. These Directors found a fly in the ointment, however. In one particular their will was not supreme. Mrs. Eddy had left her publishing business in the hands of three Trustees. These Trustees refused to admit the supremacy of the directors of the mother church. The position of the trustees is particularly strong. They have the exclusive rights in the publication of Mrs. Eddy's writings. "Science and Health" may be issued only from their presses. The daily, weekly and monthly publications which have been immensely profitable, are in their hands.

Something over a year ago the directors undertook to remove one of the trustees. This action was resisted in court. A Massachusetts court has issued an order restraining the directors from interfering with the work of the trustees. This action has been appealed to the Massachusetts Supreme Court which in this instance is the court of last resort. It will be some time before a decision is secured from this court. Meanwhile the trustees continue the work of publication while a third of the Christian Science congregations refuse to carry the publications of the trustees in their reading rooms.

The effect of the schism upon the publications has been marked. The circulation of the Christian Science Monitor had been as high as 87,000. Very few religious journals in America equaled this record. It was cut in two in a single month. One-fourth of the employes of the Publishing Society resigned in a single day and threw the work of publication into chaos. Since the court decision in favor of the publishing society, the circulation of the various journals is recovering somewhat, but they still face large losses as compared with former figures. The net profits of the publishing business is a half million dollars a year. These profits are the stake in the controversy.

Thus history seems to be repeating itself. The disintegration of Dowieism resulted not from poverty but from great affluence. Money proved the undoing of the "prophet" and brought division and trouble. In Christian Science the care for temporal and material things has usually been denominated "mortal mind." The unbeliever was usually supposed to be afflicted with this malady, but it is curious to note that this spiritual disease has struck a deadly blow to the very organization which first discovered the existence of "mortal mind."

Other divisive tendencies are showing themselves. Mrs. Augusta Stetson of New York, who was instrumental in assembling funds for a building that cost a million and a quarter of dollars, is operating disturbingly. By advertisements in the New York papers she is setting forth her claim to be Mrs. Eddy's successor, claiming to have seen the founder in a sort of resurrection appearance. She evidently would be glad to form an alliance with the trustees of the Publication Society in the event of further trouble within the movement.

Meanwhile the evangelical churches, which have been the recruiting ground of much of the proselyting activity of Christian Science, report a decrease in their losses. Many who have experimented with Christian Science in recent years have found it a vain hope in time of serious illness. Its failure to emphasize the ethical and social phases of Christianity have caused it to be a disappointing system to many. The evangelical churches will do well to ponder the rise and wondrous success of the movement, though it prove to be but short-lived. There have been defects in the evangelical preaching and practice. Parts of the gospel were not preached. These failures gave Christian Science its opportunity.

Clothes and the Choir

IN a day when the garments of supposedly well-dressed women are nowhere of conservative cut or soothing colors, the costumes of young ladies in the average church choir certainly do not minister to the congregation's peace of mind. Purples and reds cry out against each other. Soft pastel shades and blazing oriental colors speak to each in a language unsuited to the sanctuary. Worse still, gowns which would have seemed, a few years ago, to be cut for the "Follies," are worn by sweet and truly pious maidens who grew up too late to know what elderly folk consider proper in Sunday clothes.

Of course, it is the minister who suffers most keenly. He knows very well that many of his best thoughts are lost in the congregational consciousness of the feminine garments in the choir loft. Sometimes he longs for the magisterial authority of the old-time Puritan parson, who would have made short work in dealing with such a situation. A charming elderly lady tells how, when she was a student in Oberlin College, she wore into the choir gallery on Sunday morning her first grown-up dress—a stiff black silk with a very long train. At the close of the service Charles G. Finney, then president of the college and pastor of the church, met her at the foot of the stairs.

"My dear young lady," he said, in kind but inexorable tones, "go straight home and take off that ridiculous gown and never wear it into the house of the Lord again!" No wonder that President Finney was considered a man of dauntless courage! No minister of our time would go so far. But what can be done? Is there no way out of the difficulty?

Of course, the one decisive and final solution is the vested choir. Here is an end of all clashes of color, all anachronisms and absurdities of style, all surveys and comparisons, approving and disapproving, on the part of the congregation. The choir is scarcely looked at—it becomes a stationary part of the church interior. We cease to speak of "the girl in the pink hat." She has become merely a contralto voice, instead of an auburn-haired maiden who probably works in an office and has a "steady."

But there are disadvantages. The surpliced choir, like the surpliced minister or the written sermon, undoubtedly adds a quality of professionalism to the church service. We miss the touch of personality which is one of the real mediums of the gospel.

What else is there? Practical uniformity of dress is required in many churches, the wearing of simple white gowns, or of tailored suits, for example. Such uniformity is difficult to secure. Young women of limited means object to the laundry bills, or complain that their suits grow shabby when worn to business, and that "best things," whatever they happen to be, are more convenient for them. But where this arrangement can be worked out it is usually very satisfactory, at least to the minister and the congregation.

There is a faint hope of a solution which shall be satisfactory to all concerned, and this is that women, in this day of progressive enlightenment, shall learn to apply their intelligence to the subject of dress. But this is an ideal, and we must not expect its speedy realization.

The Self-Starter

THIS have I observed, that the signs of Superiority in one generation become the evidences of Inferiority in the Next. For I can remember the time when a man did wear with pride his Right Arm in a Sling as a Testimony that he had broken this wrist in Cranking his Ford Car. And now every man hath on his car a Self-Starter, and the man whose arm showeth the kick of the back-fire of an antiquated Ford, keepeth in his own Back-yard until the Plaster Cast is off.

I am too rich a man to own a Car, for I have a share in the Cars of all my friends, and as I ride with them I notice how they no longer get out and turn a Crank until they are Red in the Face, but sit in their seat and set their Foot upon the Neck of the Self-Starter. Then doth the Car go forward, and every man doth straightway forget that it was ever otherwise. But I who have never Cranked a Car or had a Car to Crank have Suffered Vicariously much misery in seeing my friends Crank their Cars, and I partly earn my passage by a thankful spirit that there is such a thing as a Self-Starter.

I have lived long, and have many associations with my fellow men. And I serve on many Committees, and I labor in the House of God. And I have done my full share of Cranking. For the world is tolerably full of Cranks, and some of them do not turn easily. And there are many good men who contribute something to the world's speed, to whom it may truthfully be said that the labor that is necessary to Crank them exceedeth the productiveness of their effort.

There was once a man who had to be appointed on any Important Committee, but who, being appointed, was at ease in Zion, until his Minister grew weary of waiting and Cranked him Three Times. And after he had done his work, and gotten his Vote of Thanks, his minister retired behind the scenes and wiped the sweat from his own brow, and nursed his Backache, and gave thanks that his Wrist was uninjured.

And there was another man who was good and reliable and patient and capable of doing good in the world; but he never started until something occurred to start him.

And there was another who, being Cranked, did snort and sputter and vibrate and puff and advertise the fact that he was about to go, and then suddenly go dead on the job, and have to be Cranked all over again.

Now, it is to be remembered that there are some people who have too good a Self-Starter, and who have no Steering-Wheel, and who go amuck down the Pike, colliding with everything in sight. And I say no word of approbation concerning their footless activity.

But there are others, who hearing the Word of God, say, That is a good idea, and I believe that it is true, and I will straightway go and do what is my duty.

And I have the impression that when the good people enter Heaven, the Celestial Traffick Angel will say, All you Self-Starters may go straight in, and keep to the right, and keep moving; for ye will not impede the Traffick. But ye who have had to be Cranked for every blessed thing ye have ever done on earth, may park for a few generations outside the Gate, and we will see what we can do for you after the Rush Hours.

Dream-Travel

IHAVE not wandered far from love and home,
Yet have I traveled much; from Arctic snows
To tropic isles my dreams have carried me;
From quaint Nippon to universal Rome;
Through wide Brazil whose mighty river flows
From lofty mountains to the thirsty sea.
For me Saint Paul lifts high its classic dome;
To please my eyes the Eden garden grows
Again, and there I wander, conscience-free;
No angel sword restrains me. I can roam
Through deserts wild, and fear no waiting foes—
So safe am I beside my native tree!

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

A New Curiosity Shop

By Joseph Fort Newton

“SURELY New York City is the greatest religious Curiosity Shop on the earth,” said the Poet, at a meeting of the Rainbow Club in the home of the beloved Physician. “If you doubt it, just read this page of church notices in the morning World, and you will see what a theological menagerie we have in this town. Besides all the regular varieties of religion, Catholic, Protestant, Hebrew—Trinitarian, Unitarian, Communitarian—we have the most variegated assortment of cults anywhere to be found. Listen and learn: Christian Science, Mental Science, Divine Science, New Thought—”

“Near Thought, is what you ought to call it,” said the Physician, with a fine scorn. “Science, indeed! Fads, freaks, fakes, the whole lot of them. They are no more akin to science than a kangaroo is like an archangel. It makes me tired. These long-haired men and short-haired women run hither and yon, knocking at the doors of dead paganisms and modern theosophies for new gospels which shall unlock the mysteries of life and destiny. Their religion is reduced to a pleasure excursion or an infatuated hunt in the dark continents of the occult. When they do not get lost in the jungles, they come back with nothing better than some grotesque fetich of low-type religion, or some fantastic dogma which runs counter to all the verified facts of science. Some people will swallow any dogma if only it is unreasonable. It is the will to believe gone to seed.”

SOME INTERESTING SAMPLES

“Wait! Hold your horses,” cried the Poet; “let me finish the list. At the League of the New Life you may learn ‘The Use of Color Vibration in Healing,’ and surely that ought to appeal to a man of your profession. In the McAlpin Hotel there is to be a lecture by the President of the College of Divine Metaphysics, after which ‘Audible treatment will be given.’ Here is another man who speaks of himself, with commendable modesty, as ‘the most interesting personality in the twentieth century,’—why miss an opportunity like that?—and his lecture is followed by ‘Classes in Concentration and Prosperity.’ If that is not attractive enough, try ‘The Money Man, Free Lectures on Success,’ and stay for the ‘Success Demonstrations’ at the end. Or if you like deep stuff make note of the following:

‘Bahai Brotherhood, Universal Religion, Universal Peace, Universal Language. Every Sunday morning at the Genealogical Hall.’

‘Vedanta Society, founded by Swami Vivekananda, lecture by his Disciple, Swami Bodhanada, on Inward Man and Inward Life.’

‘Rosaecrucian Mystic Lectures on Three Magic Words, or The Harmonious Consciousness, Amorc Hall.’”

“Have a heart! That is enough and to spare!” said the Physician. “For the honor of God, for the sake of the soul, let us hunt for truth in every age and on every shore. Let us read our Bible by the light of every torch; but this vagrant, hotel religion which is nothing but an intellectual picnic, which is perpetually asking questions of every ship that comes into port; this religion which, the last of every month, pulls out its memorandum-book to write down a new creed—‘ever learning, and never coming to the knowledge of the truth,’ as the apostle said—it is a sham and a shame. What is the matter with the church anyway? Has it gone to pot?”

“Seems to me,” said the Preacher, at whom this last shot was aimed, “that something has gone wrong with the medical profession, too. Else why do so many people go to these new cults to get their corns cured. ‘Audible treatment given,’ I like that touch of unconscious satire. But suppose we investigate; suppose we attend some of these meetings and see what they are like—seriously, I mean, in the effort to discover what may be the meaning of it all—and report at a later meeting of the Club.”

“Agreed; now you are talking sense,” said the Physician, who pricked up his ears at the word investigate. “Since the honors are even as between religion and science, by all means lets us find out the facts—though I dare say it will be like hunting for needles in a hay-stack. Still, I am ready to investigate anything, and a theological Zoo is as good a place to make research as any. Some of the theology the good Preacher dopes out to us would hardly bear investigation—but, as Kipling says, that is another story.”

The reports at the next meeting of the Club were worth going miles to hear, especially the experience of the Physician, whose stories never lose anything in the telling. With a solemn, affidavit face he told how he took his daughter with him to the Ansonia Hotel, where they heard a thin, cadaverous looking person deliver a sermon on “The Religion of the Solar Plexus.” Hitherto he had thought that religion had its home in the human soul, but he had learned a new theology. Another lecture on the Science of Success, followed by a Healing Meeting, had interested him greatly—the more so because some of his patients were in the audience. The Science, as set forth, consisted of a certain formula which, if repeated often enough—like beating a tom tom in the mind—would do the trick, like an incantation. He said it was too much like the process of shaving a pig. There is a lot of noise but no wool. However, any one could see that he was interested, and it turned out before the evening ended that he had been doing some reading betimes.

JUMBLES OF PHILOSOPHY AND SUPERSTITION

As for the Preacher, he had been sorely depressed by his explorations. He found mysticism and occultism all mixed up, whereas the two things are world-far apart. Mysticism seeks to give; occultism tries to get. It was all a jumble, made up of the heel-taps of philosophy and the fag-ends of superstition. Besides, he had found some of his former parishioners at every meeting he attended, and that did not add to his joy. The Poet had been more fortunate. He enjoyed the Rosicrucian lectures, and had been delving into the romantic lore of the Fraternity. Indeed, he had actually joined the Lodge, and had much to say—without betraying any secret—about the beauty of its ritual, suggesting that the church would do well to have a ritual of initiation. He was a little surprised when the Preacher told him that the church, in the early ages, had such a ritual, called "The Discipline of the Secret," after the manner of the Mystery Religions of the Roman Empire. The Physician opened the discussion:

"Ingrowing religion—that is my diagnosis of the case," he said, but it was plain that he had much else in his mind. "Not once did I hear the social note struck. These people set little store, apparently, by charity, pity, or renunciation, and the idea of social service has never entered their heads. No, they think only of their own personal health, or luck, or success, or peace of mind, and the optimism they emphasize—easy, evasive, dishonest—is not compatible with humility of heart. It is a self-centered, wall-eyed optimism which, when it does not blink the hard facts of life, makes men think too much about themselves—as an actor keeps his mind fixed on his face. It is a subtle selfishness trying to wear the robes of mystical faith. Our age of hurry and unrest, when people take up with anything and make a religion of it, gives it vogue. It is the Religion of Jolly, and Stevenson was its prophet."

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON'S OPTIMISM

"There you are wrong, utterly wrong," said the Poet, defending his fellow-singer of the gay and gallant heart. "Stevenson was no teacher of the cheap, impertinent optimism which consists in not looking at the facts of life, but nursing a pleasant mood without reference to them. Far from it. He prayed to be delivered from cheap pleasures, and refused to cheat himself into any blindfold light-heartedness. He saw all the bitter, old, and haggard facts, but he found some good things too, and concentrated on them—a very different matter from the brainless optimism of the blindfolded. When no good could be seen, by sheer grit of faith he believed that

"This world's no blot for us, Nor blank; it means intensely and means good."

"Maybe I do Robert Louis an injustice," the Physician replied: "If so, I take back all I said, and wish I had said more to take back. The fact seems to be that a large body of people have acquired a certain knowledge of physiology and mental science, and have become keenly interested in themselves. They have discovered that soul and body are inseparably bound together on earth, and they must learn to work together in harmony. They learned that the mind has great power over the body for health, for the upbuilding of character, and for the mastery of their moods. They have found that they can change their lives by thinking—can save themselves from many maladies, and attain a brighter, stronger existence. They are receiving their first training in mental and spiritual hygiene."

"So far, good," the Preacher interrupted. "Noah must have known that much when he landed from the Ark. Hope and joy are curative powers; despair and sorrow, when prolonged, will not only lower the vitality but actually produce disease. Worry kills, and happiness gives life. It is nothing new. By laying emphasis on a subordinate aspect of Christianity they form a new religion. New churches are founded and flourish, which doubtless have the worship of God as their great purpose, but their chief purpose, apparently, is the healing of body and mind. They teach people to use God, rather than to be used by Him. Jesus taught us to forget ourselves in the service of others."

"Even so," replied the Physician; "'nor soul helps flesh more, now, than flesh helps soul,' as Browning put it. What if they do use God? Jacob began with a bargain in his prayer at Bethel. We are all living far below the limits of our possible selves, and there are open to us resources of power which will free us for a life of energy and usefulness. The limits of possibility in our daily lives are defined less by the body than by the mind, and the resources of power are psychic rather than physical. These people are seeking personal efficiency through religion, and I think religion ought to help them."

"Right you are," said the Poet, with more enthusiasm than at any time in the discussion. "What these people are seeking is power—power to master the ills that beset and the shadows that becloud their lives; and if religion cannot help them it is no good. In the Mark Twain story of the Yankee at the Court of King Arthur, as you remember, the Yankee saw a saint swaying to and fro in his ecstasy. It seemed to him a waste of power. So, finally, he rigged up a device whereby to harness the saint and use his motions to run a sewing machine. In other words, if our religion has not enough power in it to run a sewing machine, it is not worth much. It seems to me that Christian Science has hold of a big idea."

AS TO CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

"Christian Science, of course, is three things," said the Physician. "First, it is a religion, and I respect it as I do all other religions. Its great achievement is that it fixes attention on God. It is amazing how little people think about God, save as a dim idea or a vague First Cause. When Falstaff was ill and cried out 'God, God,' his friends were alarmed! Christian Science fixes the mind on God, not as far off and long ago, but as a reality here and now. Second, it is a system of metaphysics, and as such it must run the gauntlet of criticism, along with other systems; and I am bound to say that it does not stand the test. Third, it is a method of healing, and here again it must be judged by its results—by its failures no less than by its victories. It draws people away from the churches because it does actually help them to lay hold of God, live in Him, and find refuge, peace, and strength."

"The truth is," he went on, disregarding the signal of the Preacher, "that medical science fails because it is not spiritual enough, and the church fails for lack of what the Catholics call Direction—that is, specific guidance in the details of the spiritual life. The church tells us to pray, but it does not tell us how to pray. Not many people know how to pray. It is a high, hard, serious business, if we are to believe the masters of the spiritual life. It took St. Theresa years to master the art. The physician must not simply tell his patient to be well, he must tell him how to do it. He must tell him how to live—in detail, I mean—what to eat, how to sleep, and all the rest. The church ought to do the same for the moral and spiritual life. There are difficulties of course in handling mental and spiritual hygiene in the pulpit. But people need help—specific instruction—and in their need they are going elsewhere. Urged by a great desire to understand the working of their own souls, and how they can overcome disease and temptation, they go where they are taught these things. No doubt much of the teaching is silly. But it is better than none. The mercenary quacks, the half-baked charlatans flourish because they have so many victims from sheer nerves.”

“Speaking of prayer,” said the Poet, “I got the shock of my life today. William James did it with his theory of the emotions. Hitherto, he said, we have held to this order: We meet a bear, are frightened, and run. We lose our fortune, are sorry, and weep. But the truth is just the reverse. We see a bear, then follows the physical excitement, and that in turn is followed by the emotion. If that be so, then by forcing the body into certain expressions, we may evoke corresponding emotions. By resolute smiling, for example, we may become glad. I do not defend the theory; but I do know that there is not much real prayer unless a man has the will to kneel—actually kneel—before God. It is not enough to sit bolt upright and listen to a prayer, as most of our people do in the churches. We go to church to have our praying, like our singing, done for us. It will not do.”

RELIGION NOT MERE EMOTION

“Too many people,” said the Preacher, “seem to think that in religion it is only enthusiasm, impulse, emotion that count. Religious observance becomes the sport of caprice. They attend church, or they pray, if they feel like it, whereas if we do not feel like going to church that is the time we ought to go. Feeling, alas, is the weather-cock of their religious life. But it is not so in other matters. In business, even in sport, they have system, discipline, method, but religiously they live at haphazard. It is this lack of method in the culture of the spiritual life that accounts for much of the unrest, not to speak of the uncertainty, in such matters. People want the joy and power of religion without paying the price for it. They will not submit to discipline. Asceticism is simply a disciplined effort to gain an end, nothing more. An athlete goes into training and by renunciation, by obeying rigid rules, makes his muscles firm and his nerves taut. When men are willing to do that in order to keep spiritually fit, they will have their reward.”

“At every meeting I attended,” he proceeded, “I found books appointed to be read, so much time to be spent each day in reading. That is a start in the right direction—but such books, bereft of beauty, devoid of insight, with never a glint of genius! Suppose one should study art in that manner, leaving out of account the masters and taking up with some poor dauber. Yet that would not be more pathetic than what these restless, troubled minds are doing today. If there is such merit in method, as there surely is, why not employ it in studying the masters of the spiritual life? Better still, why not devote the hours spent on these poor scribblers to the Bible, which shows us, as in a mirror, what we are and what we ought to be?”

“But, my dear Preacher,” said the Physician, “the Bible is a hard book to read. Few know how to read it at all. It requires years of study in order to know how to read it, much less to interpret it. If people would begin with the life and laws of Jesus, they might get somewhere. My method is to take a scene, or a passage, from His life every day, and ponder it, reproducing all its vivid human color in my imagination, until I can hear the voice of the Master, and see His gesture when He puts forth his hand to heal. At first it was hard work, but it has become a habit. In this way I get back into the atmosphere of Jesus, into the spirit of His mind, and, somehow, He does not seem far away. For, in these matters distance does not count and time does not signify.”

A RELIGION OF THE WILL

“In short,” he added, “what we need is a religion of the Will. Jesus appealed always to the will, and when we obey His laws He can do for us today what He did for men in days of old. The power that was in Him is with us still—abundantly with us, if we have the will to lay hold of it and use it. But we must not use it merely for our own ends, selfishly, else it will be denied us. Jesus was never ill, because He knew how to live. His gospel is not a stick of candy, but a way of life—happy, wholesome, healthy, full-orbed life, radiant and radiating. Some day, taught by Him—science learning equally with theology—we may learn how to master ourselves; learn the way to power, by tapping resources always at our disposal, and make our wicked industrial order a service of fraternity and joy. Perhaps we may even save the church, and make it the center of all the redemptive forces of society.”

“Quite a speech,” cried the Poet; “and when the Physician preaches better than the Preacher it is time to go. Before we break up, however, I must have my say. I rise to tell you the battle of Armageddon is now being fought, and America is the battle-field. It is the battle—old as the world—between mechanism and mysticism, between materialism and spirituality. If America goes religious, the world will be saved. If we are inundated by a tide of materialism—giving way either to the Moloch of Money or the Cult of Comfort—we are lost. It will be a fight to a finish, and every man who loves the things of the spirit must fit himself, train himself, and be a soldier in the Wars of God!”

"Was Christ a Methodist or an Episcopalian?"

By J. Edgar Park

MR. H. G. WELLS begins his "Outline of History" with the words, "The earth in which we live is a spinning globe," and ends it declaring that life now "stretches out its realm amidst the stars." This is a good cosmic framework for a history of human life. The time has come for the mind of man thus to think cosmically. Our race must find itself if it is not to be destroyed by its own inventions.

Two great tasks stand out clearly before us. The first is the freeing of religion from the ecclesiastic, and the second is the reunion of education and religion.

It was said of the head of one of our great educational institutions that he was all right if you got him by himself, he would agree to act on broad and sane lines. But if you let him go home and talk the matter over with his wife, all was up, immediately personal, narrow and bigoted views prevailed over those to which he had before assented. Something like this is true of mankind in its relation to its ecclesiastical leaders. The common man's will is in the main goodwill in all efforts after unity of work for the salvation of our race. But let him be herded with others of his -isms where his ecclesiastical bosses can feed him their half-truths, and he emerges cautious and feeble again. These bosses may be called by many names, ministers, priests, rabbis, readers, bishops, superintendents, secretaries, professors, and many other such names. They represent a sect, they are at home only with those who are committed to their own views.

CHRISTLIKENESS NOT ALWAYS LIKE CHRIST

Now sectarianism is a vain attempt to find a short-cut to Christlikeness apart from being Christlike. It has become plain, however, to most of us that nearness to God is a matter of character. The best church advertising is the character of the members of the church. A creed is apt to become a fence around a company of believers to keep those who have thought about the matter out. Faith has degenerated in meaning and has become for many the correct attitude towards things which must not be investigated lest they might prove not to be true. Hell is the future abode of those who differ from us. Religious movements seem to be becoming more and more flurries caused by the automatic activity of ecclesiastical roll-up desks and type-writers. Reunion becomes the desire of the wolf in each sect to unite with the lambs of all the other sects.

The only power which the ecclesiastic possesses above the ordinary man is in superstition. The superstition that we are more liberal, more orthodox, more historic, more cultured, more enthusiastic, more enlightened, in nearer touch with God, greater favorites with God, possessed of special truth above other sects. Some even go so far as to consider themselves embodiments of finer spiritual graces than other sects.

That all this is mere superstition can be proved by getting the employees in any department store, who know each other well to vote upon the six fairest, kindest, most lovable personalities in the store. It will not be found that all six belong to any one sect. But if one sect does have one exclusive ray of Christlikeness in its keeping, it could not be hid. It would show in business life.

WHAT SECTARIANISM IS

The freeing of sectarianism from superstition would kill all that is bad in the power of the ecclesiastic. Let it be made clear that sectarianism is only a method of meeting different people's needs. If you like your prayers said, I who like them read will not scoff at you. It is well that there should be both kinds of us. I will not stay away from church if some prayers are said and some read. Superstition is always at the base negative, religion is always at the base positive. The only valid sectarian position is this: "I love this form of religious service because it helps me to live better, and I want to show you by my life how much help I get from it, perhaps you may come to love it too."

The other great problem is the reunion of religion and education. This cannot take place till we are ready to sink denominational differences in a common effort to teach the spirit of service. We have been educating our young folk to get a position. We have told them of cases where boys and girls who have followed our instructions are now getting $10,000 a year. As a result we have a race frankly interested in pleasure and profit. Under the external scourge of war they have taken an interest also in service. But when the social pressure, the fear, the romantic sense of adventure of that external power has been withdrawn, there does not seem to be any internal compulsion to take its place and turn their interest into the ways of service.

Religion, our attitude towards those great powers that control our destiny; religion, the finding and following of the will of God, has been divorced from education, the preparation of the individual for the community. Why cannot we bring these two former friends, religion and education, together again?

It is because there is intertwined with religion everywhere another thread which is not religion, ecclesiasticism. In order to get ecclesiasticism out of our schools, it has seemed necessary to put religion out too. Religion is the spirit that recognizes that God is not particularly interested in my private happiness, but that He is interested in the happiness of the whole human family, and that I can only find happiness by sharing God's perspective and finding my own happiness in the happiness of my fellows. Religion is that attitude of life which flowers in service. Ecclesiasticism, on the other hand, is my ability to use your superstition for the purpose of gaining power and prestige for myself or my institution.

We generally think of superstition and ecclesiasticism in others. As a matter of fact it is pretty evenly divided. The word "liberal" has just about as much superstition about it as the word "penance," the Protestant cock-sure sense of superiority contains it as surely as the Roman miracle shrine. Superstition thrives in the hot-house of a self-regarding institution, but dies in the self-forgetful open-air ways of human service.

DISENTANGLING THE SECTS.

It remains to be seen whether the operation which severs the unnatural conjunction of religion and ecclesiasticism is a possible one. It may be that the sects are too inexorably intertwined with ecclesiasticism to survive the attempt to disentangle them. If so in the schools themselves will arise again the true spirit of real religion and the churches will go into the discard. But the hope of all good men must be that the sects will see the light in time to save for religion all that is good in the church as an institution. Every individual church whose members are subscribers to the simple creed of Mr. Campbell's former church in Brighton, England: "This church is founded for the good of the city of Brighton" will help to bring in the new day. Every church which abandons propaganda for service, every church member whose noble creed is in solution in his life, every secretary or bishop or reader or superintendent who stops talking incessantly about loyalty to our church," and begins to talk about the first commandment, that the God of us all is one; and of the second commandment, that we love our neighbors as ourselves—every such former ecclesiastic will be a forerunner of the new day of religious education.

Then our boys and girls will learn not merely how to get living for themselves, but how to find happiness in life by the escape from self. Then religious emotion will be added to intellectual efficiency to produce goodwill. Then the impulse to social devotion and universal service will again be the living force within all education.

VERSE

The Paradox of Time

TIME goes, you say? Ah, no!
Alas! Time stays, we go;
Or else, were this not so,
What need to chain the hours,
For youth were always ours?
Time goes, you say?—ah, no!

Ours is the eyes' deceit
Of men whose flying feet
Lead through some landscape low;

We pass, and think we see
The earth's fixed surface flee;
Alas! Time stays—we go!

Once, in the days of old,
Your locks were curling gold,
And mine had shamed the crow;
Now, in the selfsame stage,
We've reached the silver age;
Time goes, you say?—ah, no!

Once, when my voice was strong,
I filled the woods with song
To praise your "rose" and "snow";
My bird that sung is dead;
Where are your roses fled?
Alas! Time stays—we go!

See in what traversed ways,
What backward fate delays
The hopes we used to know;
Where are the old desires—
Ah! where those vanished fires?
Time goes, you say?—ah, no!

How far, how far, O sweet,
The past behind our feet
Lies in the even-glow!
Now, on the forward way,
Let us fold hands and pray;
Alas! Time stays—we go.

Christ's Church

CREEDS and confessions? High Church or the Low?
I cannot say; but you would vastly please us
If with some pointed Scripture you could show
To which of these belonged the Savior, Jesus.
I think to all, or none. Not curious creeds
Or ordered forms of churchly rule be taught
But soul of love that blossomed into deeds,
With human good and human blessing fraught.
On me nor priest nor presbyter nor pope;
Bishop nor dean, may stamp a party name;
But Jesus, with his largely human scope,
The service of my human life may claim.
Let prideful priests do battle about creeds,
The church is mine that does most Christ-like deeds.

Stigmatising the Steel Report

THE Report of the Interchurch Commission which investigated the Steel Strike has been received with almost universal approval outside of financial and trade journals. With a single exception the religious press has commended it. That exception was a magazine which asserted with more phlegm than argument that because steel workers received a higher average of wages than preachers a commission of religious men should have been ashamed to have discovered it. It is a curious abortion of logic, but there was one editor who was able to perpetrate it. The financial and trade journals have never made an attempt to answer the findings of the Report but only to stigmatise it in various ways. Of course the purpose of all that is to prejudice the minds of those who do not read it with the suggestion that it is radical or lop-sided. Most of these organs have damned the commission with the faint praise due to good men of warm sympathies but no critical or practical acumen—a type of judgment upon ministers and religious leaders that is all too common among men who do not want their business interfered with by considerations of ethics.

It remains for a clergyman to essay an answer to the Report. From Andover, Mass., the Rev. E. Victor Bigelow is by grace of the U. S. Steel Corporation, suddenly made known to thousands of fellow ministers, to editors, legislators and others throughout the length and breadth of the land. He draws a chivalrous sword against the "unjustifiable buccaneering practiced by the A. F. of L. in its attack upon the Steel Corporation" and against a committee of religious men of whom the worst he can say is that they were "afflicted with a heresy about hours of work that may have poisoned their judgment," and who were "far too ready to condemn the Steel Corporation for allowing more than half its men to work beyond the eight and ten hour stint."

The Rev. Mr. Bigelow's Judgment on the Interchurch Commission

The viewpoint of this chivalrous knight who so bravely draws his sword of logic on behalf of the poor abused Steel Corporation is interesting. He sees in the commission "a group of devout and beneficent souls," but guilty of mistakes in this report that "bring shame and dishonor to us." They "assumed the functions of a prosecuting attorney when they were only a commission of inquiry." "They decided at once that the corporation was guilty and then proceeded to find the facts that would prove it." "The result is a book-full of testimony that is untrustworthy and lopsided." "The report is so manifestly unjust that it will rot of its own corruption," therefore the corporation need not present the other side. Why then does its defender draw his saber on the corrupt thing? He finds that the commission, "feeling itself snubbed by Mr. Gary's refusal to deal with the A. F. of L. through them, commenced its study of the steel business with a strong prejudice against this aloofness," and "readily believed a lot of testimony secured from other malcontents who were disappointed at not having the unions recognized." Of course the fact that the investigation was one-half done before the incident referred to occurred must not stand in the way of this unprejudiced logic. They betrayed "the innocence of teasing childhood" and Mr. Gary "humorously toyed with them." "Throughout the book it is their practice to refute or to discount testimony from the corporation and to accept without question quantities of aspersion from disgruntled ones." He will not "say that somebody lied" (referring to a declaration of the commission), but "simply that we cannot depend upon our commission for the facts even though we paid them $10,000 to get the facts." It cost more than that, gentle critic, but no one ever paid "them" a penny. They displayed "such picayunish judgment" that it "ought to bring the blush of shame to us all." In the closing paragraph he charges them "with recreancy from their high principle of defending the unwritten rights of men because they have excused and condoned the uncriminal violence of the American Federation of Labor in their deliberate and unjustifiable Steel strike." Nothing is said anywhere by our crusader about the violence the commission reports it found visited upon strikers, but "in the name of decency the Interchurch Commission Report must be repudiated."

U. S. Steel Versus the A. F. of L.

If the commission was inept and soft and malicious, what of Judge Gary, and the steel trust and the American Federation of Labor? The "labor unions can be of immense value in some cases in gaining rights and privileges against unfair and dull employers, but they can be an unbearable nuisance to a keen and fairminded employer." Judge Gary is the paragon of all employers who "truly consult the interests of the workmen not less but more than the labor union method does." "The Gary method enables the steel workers to get more pay without increasing the costs to the public." "When we can find men like Mr. Gary, who is strong enough to resist all labor union compulsions and can keep his corporation free to adjust wages and labor conditions to the highest standard in the world, while keeping down the cost to the public, he is worth millions to us and we ought to have had an Interchurch Commission clear-eyed enough to see it." The king can do no wrong, and after turning down the request of the President of the United States for conference and six other similar offers, the approach of the commission with a guarantee by the strike leaders to accept any verdict they returned, "must have seemed to him a supremely stupid performance." Before such a throne our humble worshipper says, "I am not surprised that Mr. Gary, in his courteous way, diverted the conversation and almost humorously toyed with them—a man of less grace would have shown his annoyance." The judge's triumphant work of benignity has been his ability "to humanize the finance committee," because "inasmuch as the product is measured by dollars, it is proper and fit that the finance committee should head up the producing control." It was very wicked of the commission to characterize the control as "military" in its character as over against such systems of conference and representation as those used by the Rockefeller and the International Harvester and many other great employing interests. The Gary plan is most benign; it permits fully one-half the men to work twelve hours, gives "them freedom to put in more time" so that their pay is "far ahead" of that in unionized trades, which arbitrarily condemn fathers and husbands to a limit of eight and nine hours on the specious theory that homes and wives and children may need a small portion of their waking hours.

As over against the benignant United States Steel Corporation the American Federation of Labor was guilty of "unjustifiable buccaneering" in its "attack upon the Steel Corporation." "It was deliberately planned that twenty-four different trade unions should join in the campaign and share the booty in the many thousands of members to be gained by unionizing the steel works at $3 per member." How they were to "share the booty" while spending vast sums to conduct the strike is not revealed—charges of this variety are better than argument when a labor union is concerned. It is utterly "false" that men were discharged for joining unions: Judge Gary said there were no such orders and therefore the testimony of hundreds of men on that point is only "the testimony of malcontents," and thousands of union men work in the mills contentedly. It was always for "agitation" and "trouble-making" that men were discharged, and of course "agitation" for the union was never "trouble-making" to the corporation. "The poor workman has no escape from arbitrary treatment under the operation of labor union conference, and the vast majority of the 200,000 employes of the United States Steel Corporation prefer the 'arbitrary' treatment by the corporation rather than the arbitrary treatment by the labor unions." The commission was often told, during the investigation, that the overwhelming majority of the 300,000 men on strike were coerced by fear of violence from the agitators. What a heroic bunch of buccaneers that little group of agitators must have been!

Next week we will analyze Mr. Bigelow's answer, not because it is so important in itself but because it has been put into the hands of thousands who will never read the Report itself and because it carries the suggestion of "radical"—a word that is frantically used to damn all social investigation in our time—and is thus calculated to bias the judgment of thousands of honest, God-fearing ministers.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

London, Dec. 27, 1920.

IN the lull that Christmas brings, it comes easy to believe that the forces of goodwill in the world are stronger than the powers of evil. For a few days we agree to think of the common bonds which bind us together; but the time will soon be over. The nation has many grave problems to solve. It remains to be seen whether when the holiday is over, there will be any new factor brought in from the memories of Christmastide. It has often seemed as though statesmen and other leaders of men were slow to make the most of such sides of the spirit. Man is of one piece; and his guides should be quick to deal with man as he is moved, not only by desire for self-preservation or personal advantage, but by those strange wild ancient impulses of his, which are revealed at such times as Christmas. Why do they not exploit these lapses of ours into the kingdom of Heaven? Why do they not watch for souls?

The shadow of unemployment rests heavily over us; there is a general agreement that temporary measures must be taken, but that more is needed than makeshifts if the country is to ride over the coming year, or years. It is not a problem with us for the first time; but it has become a new thing now that at least 300,000 ex-soldiers are out-of-work; such a plain fact silences the foolish voices which used to put down the ugly fact of unemployment to the "vice and idleness" of the workers. That cannot be said now when so many of the victims are paying twice for the safety and well-being of their fellows, once during the war and now afterwards in the industrial area; and there are signs that the victims are not ready to pay this second price.

Churches Troubled By Industrial Disquiet

The Christian churches are troubled more than at other times by the facts of the industrial situation. The trouble is at their doors. They begin to see that the terrible fact of unemployment with all the dangers which lie hidden within it, is but one symptom of disease. "It is no exaggeration to say," one observer has written, "that the whole world is watching this country to see whether it will find a peaceful solution of its industrial problems or not. The present social order is going; of that there can be little doubt. The question is whether there is to be transformation or catastrophe. Can we change step by step?" In such a time it is a confession of impotence for the churches of Christ to say nothing. If there is anything which they can contribute, it is time, more than time, for them to speak. To plead that the mission of the church has nothing to do with these questions, is a position which few dare set forth. It would be treated with contempt to-day. There are a number of healthy signs that within all the churches minds are awakening to the facts of the present hour. The Industrial Christian Fellowship is showing great activity. It has taken unto itself the Christian Social Union which for many years under the inspiring leadership of Dr. Scott Holland did much to quicken the conscience of churchmen. The new development of the work will be watched with interest and hope. The Fellowship, though Anglican in its basis, is clearly desirous to be in the closest union with the free churches. Its organ, The Torch, shows many signs of life. Its purposes are to bring labor into closer fellowship with the church:

"1. By sending its agents—themselves working men—to present Christ as Saviour, living Master, and King to their brothers in the world of industry—in the factories, foundries, shipyards, and public works.

"2. By appealing to all who make or resist demands for a new and better order to test their attitude, before taking action, by the standard and teaching of Christ, as the only enduring solution of the world's social and industrial unrest.

"3. By arousing the conscience of Christian people to the fact that 75 per cent. of the masses are outside all forms of organized Christianity to-day, largely because of the church's indifference to the evils of the old social and economic system, and the lack of the spirit of fellowship to be found amongst her members."

Christian Leaders Far Ahead of Churchly Followers

Side by side with such a Society is the League of Faith and Labour with Mr. A. Ramage for its admirable secretary. This League has done much to educate the church, and perhaps to show to labor how much it needs faith. There are, moreover, Social Service Committees in all the churches, and under the general direction of a very gifted student of economics, Mr. Will Reason, there is a society which coordinates the work of all those committees. This society, in which all communions from the Unitarian to the Roman Catholic work together upon their common interest, speaks with great authority; and if it is in advance of the rank and file in the churches, it can depend upon the growing weight of the younger members. These are not in the least ready to admit that the industrial system of the 19th century is sacrosanct. But "Lambeth" was quite as emphatic upon this matter as the youthful rebels. The bishops, met in counsel, declared: "An outstanding and pressing duty of the church is to convince its members of the necessity of nothing less than a fundamental change in the spirit and working of our economic life. This change can only be effected by accepting as the basis of industrial relations the principle of co-operation in service for the common good in place of unrestricted competition for private or sectional advantage. All Christian people ought to take an active part in bringing about this change, by which alone we can hope to remove class dissensions and resolve industrial discords." It would be an error to suppose that the greater number of church members have advanced as far as their bishops. One of the real difficulties of the hour comes from the fact that leaders give the word, but the led do not accept it. Conferences upon reunion are often futile because the representatives of churches are not backed by the people for whom they are supposed to speak. It would be a dangerous error to think that all the churches are awake to the fact that the industrial system of the 19th century is sacrosanct. dissolution. But they are beginning to know, or if they do not know, it is not for lack of teaching that the standards and values of Christ must be applied to the whole of life, including industry, and that these mean the assertion of the infinite value of every child of man; and arising from that, the principle of human brotherhood.

The working out of such principles in practice is the task of the whole community; it is becoming clear to most members of the churches, that they have to declare and drive home these principles; and if the existing social order gives the lie to these principles, the social order must change. It is not only the workers who say this; such men as Mr. W. L. Hichens, a great employer of labor, say it with no less energy. "Unless industry is really recognized as primarily a national service, in which each individual is fulfilling his function to the best of his ability for the sake of the community, in which private gain is subordinated to public good, in which in a word we carry out our duty towards our neighbors—unless we build on this foundation, there is no hope of creating the House Beautiful. If each man thinks of making his pile by all the means that economic individualism allows, if class bands itself against class, trade union against employers' federation, firm against firm, to secure the greatest share of the world's goods in unrestricted competition, social life must inevitably break down and anarchy reign supreme." In the presence of this choice there is seen to be much that the churches do and only the churches can do; they are beginning to bring to bear upon our problems the great sanctions and resources of their faith. But there are grave and anxious times ahead.

Open Channels Between Church and Labor

Happily there have always been ways kept open between labor and the churches in these lands. There are the central missions in our great cities; nor can we forget how many of the most trusted leaders in the Labor Party were trained in the churches, and to this hour many of them may be heard on occasion in the pulpit. Mr. Henderson for example and Mr. Lansbury are at home in the pulpit; and not only they but many others owed their inspiration to the churches. It is a slander of incredible folly when the Labor Party in this country is declared to be anti-Christian. There are agnostics and atheists in its ranks; even as there are in other parties, but they do not represent the body of workers. These may not be given much to assembling themselves together in public worship, and their religious ideas are vague, but they have a reverence for Jesus Christ, and chiefly complain with some justice that his disciples are not up to sample. One thing can be said without hesitation: the more thoughtful among the spokesmen of labor are not anxious for the churches to discard their spiritual faith, and "do something useful"; they understand how much that spiritual faith is needed; they do not want the church of Christ to believe less in its Lord, but they want it to go further, and to work out in practical terms what is involved in the incarnation and the atonement and in all the cycle of Christian doctrines. They want us to show what difference these truths ought to make in the industrial order, which is at the heart of our national life.

On Tuesday next the great Conference of the Student Christian Movement begins in Glasgow. It may be my privilege to tell more of this when the next letter is written. The programme is before me now; the general subject is "Christ and Human Need, 1921"; each morning there will be some area of human life surveyed; on January 5th, "The Need and Possibility of a New World" will be the subject, and Viscount Grey of Fallodon will speak; on Jan. 6th "India in Transition," on the 7th "China," and on the 8th "Africa and the Africans." Throughout the week Dr. Temple, the Bishop-Elect of Manchester will lecture on "The Universality of Christ." There is much to be hoped from this conference; everyone who wishes to read the trend of the national mind in the coming days will keep his eyes upon Glasgow in January.

Dr. Guttery's Brave Fight Recalled

After a brave fight for life Dr. A. T. Guttery has passed away before his time. He had filled a conspicuous place on the platforms of militant nonconformity; it was pathetic to listen to him during the last years of his public life, when his voice was almost gone; but he struggled bravely to the end, and even when it became clear that the platform could not be his arena any more, he planned still to use his pen; but that was not to be. His death recalls many struggles upon the heated problem of religious education in public schools; in that fight which waged around the act of 1902, when the denominational schools were put upon the rates. Dr. Guttery played a leading part; he used many fierce words in that bitter fight; but no one afterwards minded that—one in this country has rather a liking for a good fighting man on the other side—and the news was received with a smile but without a shock that Dr. Guttery was to accompany Dr. Gore, the most powerful figure in the high church party, to America during the war. But the death of this protagonist brings home the fact that the religious instruction problem is not settled; the free churchmen who fought the bill of 1902 did a great service so far as our protest was against an unfair settlement; but we were weak on the constructive side. Now the problem presents itself to the younger generation in another form. They desire to have the whole question reconsidered; they agree on all sides that the war revealed our shortcomings in this matter; with all our controversial zeal we had not sent into the service of the nation and of the world men trained in the knowledge of the Christian religion. How then is the child to be led into the truth and joy and strength of the Christian faith? How can the Bible, as it is understood to-day by modern students, be made to yield its gains to the unfolding mind? How can we work together to make the religious instruction

MOFFATT'S Translation of the New Testament

THE author is recognized as one of the most distinguished living scholars of the Greek new Testament. His translation is notable for its apt usage of words as well as for its originality of thought. A new meaning is given to the old version which is supplemented and not supplanted. It is the only version which makes use of the recent discoveries in Egypt and the Holy Land. No Bible student's library is complete without this marvelous translation. It will elucidate difficult passages and call forth expressions of surprise, delight and gratitude. Its every phrase is a new text for the preacher and a new idea for the Christian layman.

What is given to childhood and to youth competent and thorough and entirely worthy to be ranked with the best education given in other subjects? These are the first questions in the view of the younger generation; and it may well be, that in exploring these problems the various schools of thought may find themselves drawn into closer fellowship. Things can never be again as they were in 1902.

Methodists and the Actors

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your article in The Christian Century for December 30, entitled "Methodists Bar The Actor," is somewhat misleading. You have stated that the board of bishops decided formally that actors are not eligible to membership in the church. And your implication is that the Methodist church as a whole in an official manner excludes these persons. I believe this is not to be so construed for the following reasons:

1. The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church and not the board of bishops is the governing body. It is for this General Conference to determine who shall and who shall not become members of the church. Its decisions, which are the law of the church, are embodied in the so-called Discipline. This Discipline contains certain matters regarding amusements; but neither in statement or spirit debars actors from membership.
2. The Judiciary Committee of this General Conference, which is the servant of this sovereign body, has repeatedly rendered an opinion stating that all paragraphs in this Discipline referring to amusements are illegal and should be made null and void.
3. Unless I am in error Bishop Berry's statement reflected his own opinion and I am quite positive that many of his fellow bishops hold differing opinions. The daily press, however, emphasized Bishop Barry's opinion without stating the opinion of other bishops. It did not make clear that the opinion of Bishop Berry or any other bishop was not the law of the Methodist Episcopal church and that these gentlemen had as much right to state their opinions as you or I have to state ours.
4. The Methodist Episcopal church does not brand actors, but on occasions—such as the Centenary Exposition at Columbus, Ohio—hires them and seeks their cooperation in helping the church make clear its message to the world at large. Its thousands of members and many preachers go to good theatres and continue to remain in good standing in the church. In this regard the church faces no "grave problem."

Dear Mr. Editor, there is already a wide enough breach between the churches and the various working and professional classes. There are so many serious dangers that face the church. Is it not better to place the emphasis upon the positive work and thought of Protestantism, especially when an unfriendly daily press so frequently garbles its news that its reports cannot always be taken in whole?

The Methodists love all men and actors are no exception. Actors who try to act like the Lord Jesus are sure to find a welcome in most Methodist Churches—let this be emphasized.

The Church and the Movies

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I was keenly interested in the article on "The Church and the Movies" in a recent issue of The Christian Century. To my mind, there is not the slightest doubt that the movies are here to stay. It is, I think, a fair statement that 90 per cent of the children are being more or less influenced by this form of recreation. Nearly all of them seem to go to the picture houses fairly regularly. Many go "once a week" and "every Saturday." Some have told me they go as many as

"three times a week." The attraction of the ice cream parlors pales beside the movies. "Give me ten cents to see the movies" is the new petition. When the first picture houses were built many people talked of them as "a passing craze." But they were mistaken. For good or ill, the movie has come to stay. Mr. Bernard Shaw has given the opinion that the movie is a more momentous invention than printing, because it is an intellectual leveler. The movie is really a new language. It has been called "the Esperanto of the eye." The illiterate and the educated sit together and hold their silent converse with the unspeakable. Not only is there this leveling of minds, but there is also a curious leveling of morals. The movie industry is international in its range, and to be profitable a film must be capable of pleasing people of different classes and different countries. Films produced in America, England, or Italy travel round the world. It is a fact that all the world is not reading the same books or listening to the same music; but all the world is looking at the same pictures. Many arguments might be advanced showing the good and evil effects of the movies. Blank opposition to the movie is as misguided and futile as the opposition to railways.

There is no cause for suppression, only for safeguard and improvement. Pictures can teach. Christ taught in parables. We have not sufficiently followed his example. We are given the big chance today. With Mr. Johnson in his closing paragraph, I perfectly agree when he says: "I confidently look forward to the day when the church shall recognize the film as a necessary adjunct to the delivery of its message in a way to reach directly the hearts of millions who have missed the story as expressed in the spoken word."

Church Membership—A Baptist's View

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In your issue of Jan. 6, I note with interest and amazement, the letter entitled: "A Truthful Church Record." My experience has not brought me in contact with the Disciples, but in reading the New Testament, I find clearly stated certain marks of a Christian which entitle him to membership in the universal church. In opposing a single local church record of membership, why should anything suggest a triple record. A church record should be what its name implies, not a mongrel assortment as suggested of "confessed believers," "baptized believers," "friendly cooperators," etc., etc." A church roll ought to include only Christians, and a Christian is a confessed, baptized, friendly cooperator. To put upon some new kind of a church roll, the record of names of the various grades of would-be, near and hyphen-Christians, would be compromising with a clean-cut desire to have a single church membership, with one faith, one Lord, one baptism. As is suggested by the previous writer, it is already difficult to keep the local church record correctly; why then involve matters by including other groups of persons also. The task of the Christian church to-day is to simplify, not confuse with more complexity. God likes simplicity, therefore a wayfaring man needn't err in finding certain fundamental Christian obligations such as, repent, believe, and be baptized, then work at it night and day. The devil likes confusion and would aid man in evading obligations of a Christian life and still allow them to claim its privileges. Let us do our best to have a record of simply Christian members of our local group of the church. God will make the necessary corrections on the roll up yonder.

Church Membership—A Disciple's View

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: It may be right and proper for any man to make a fool of himself once in a while—when circumstances make it necessary—but it can hardly be right for all of us who call ourselves New Testament Christians to play the fool all the time. And yet, as I see it, that is what we have been doing for years, to the amusement of those who occupy the grandstand.

We have proclaimed to the world that the Protestant church is practically a unit with respect to all that is contained in the Bible, that endless divisions have been brought about over things not in the Bible, and, that just as soon as these outside matters can be relegated to the junk pile, the result will be a united church. But, while preaching this with all our might we have been rapping each other over the head, have managed to bring reproach upon the cause we profess to love, and have all but divided the brotherhood. And all this over matters as foreign to the Bible as any creed ever made. The wonder of it is that we have any church left at all.

With this situation confronting us, we have been hoping that some prophet would come with a message that could and would bring the discordant elements into harmony. But do we need such a prophet? If so the Lord would have inspired one. But he failed to do it. As it seems to me what we need is not a prophet, but some one with sense enough and might enough to come with a great hammer and smash to atoms the old bugaboo over which the brotherhood has stumbled so long. We still read in our papers about "open membership," "taking membership," "placing our membership," "receiving into membership," and "receiving the pious unimmersed" and all that sort of idle, sordid stuff. What a picnic the devil and his imps must hold over our predicament. We a Bible people? Yes we are, but not. Brethren, how would it do for us to get a grip on ourselves, then sit down and think over the matter soberly, calmly, and seriously? Have we done any sane thinking on this subject? Not that anybody knows of.

But how about our "membership" dilemma? Are we going to snap at one another, insinuate and intimidate, and become the amusement association for the rest of the religious world? Just stop and think awhile. Let us open our Bibles. Where does it say that any man ever "took membership," "placed his membership," "received into membership," "extended the right hand of fellowship on behalf of the church," so far as the church of Christ is concerned? If a preacher has to "extend the right hand of fellowship on behalf of the church" to make Christians who happen to come to the community members of the local congregation, then, to be consistent, he should withdraw the right hand of fellowship in behalf of the church from such people when they again leave the community. But where does the Bible tell of receiving anybody, either immersed or unimmersed into the local congregation? It tells of the Lord receiving some, but no apostle or other inspired man dared thus to presume. Why then do we uphold and fuss over a practice that finds no foundation whatever in the Word of God? Is it not a fact that we have created the very conditions and circumstances which divide the Disciples today? In the name of heaven let us quite it.

The time has come when we must put away all foolish things and act the part of free men and women in Christ. We have done more harm with our "membership" bugaboo than we shall be able to correct in the next fifty years, and right now is the time for us to make a change.

Not so very long ago it was quite the bright idea for an evangelist to report so many "saved by letter." Of course, they must have been lost by letter or they would not have needed saving by letter. But why were they ever lost? Because unwittingly, through a custom established by us, many never considered themselves church members at all until they had united "by letter." And, not being members, they felt themselves free of all restraint and under no obligations to the church. Added to this there was the temptation to "economize a little" by staying out. Isn't this condition of affairs hilarious? And then to think that we are directly responsible for it all. Of course, many people naturally timid shrank from going down the aisle and going through the membership receiving ceremony and are now lost to the church forever.

How do we in this western town "take in" members who come from other places? Our answer is that we do not "take them in." The Lord added them to the church when they accepted him and they do not require any "taking in" on our part. We tell them we are glad they came to the community, invite them to our services, announce their names from the pulpit so the church people may know who they are, and give them to understand that without any delays, or sending for letters, or any ceremonial performance in the pulpit end of the sanctuary, they are a part of the church of Christ, members in full, entitled to all the privileges of the church and responsible just as all other members are responsible.

But, suppose the pious unimmersed should ask to be received into the membership of the church, what would we do? Frankly tell them that we do not receive into this church, not even our own members; that we are one by virtue of faith and practice and not by means of joining and receiving; introduce them to the congregation as members of such or such a church, that they have not been immersed but desire to attend our services, worship with us and assist us in our work. Can we do less? Is this contrary to the teaching of Holy Writ? We do not think so. And in the meantime we preach the gospel to all, immerse the penitent believers into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and do what we can to bring about the evangelization of the world. Is this right? Then let us practice it and remove the stumbling block that is dividing the brotherhood.

Of course, this will diminish the "large numbers added to the church" by many pastors and evangelists, but what of it? He who preaches to glorify self is in the wrong business anyway. But praise the Lord, the majority of our men are satisfied with the sober truth.

A Wasted Sample Copy

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just received a copy of your paper, and wish you would not send any more, as you have a tendency to treat questions on the principle of a retained attorney viewpoint. Your editorial on "The Unseen Companion" reminds me that the Kaiser was alleged to be in partnership with God Almighty, but as Shakespeare would say, "now lies he there and none so poor as do him reverence." Or, as Artemus Ward said of Jeff Davis, "it would have been ten dollars in his pocket if he had never been born." You pretend to be very much worried over the open shop, but I suppose you would hold the coat of a member of the labor trust while he was slugging a willing worker outside of the charmed circle. No, I am not an employer, but I'm living on easy street, as I became financially independent by the sweat of my brow after I was fifty.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

German Philosopher Retires

Professor Eucken of the University of Jena has retired at the age of seventy-four after a teaching career of forty-six years. He is still in splendid health and has an annual literary product of considerable proportions. He has often dealt with the problems of religion and one book in particular has circulated widely in America, "Can We Still be Christians?" In his treatment of Christianity he left behind the formal confessional statements and his teachings have been accepted both by Roman Catholics and Unitarians, which is indeed some achievement. He has recently published a book of memories, and in this book the late war is treated but without any sign of repentance. He speaks of the alleged destruction of the Cathedral of Reims.

W. C. A. Split by Millennialists

The conflict between the millennialists and the modernists in the evangelical camp grows more strenuous each year, and there is a continual effort on the part of the former to manage a schism. In England the believers in the early return of our Lord have separated themselves from the Y. W. C. A. and have formed the Christian Alliance of Women and Girls. These Christians insist that the social program of the Y. W. C. A. is futile since an ideal society can only be set up by the return to earth of Jesus Christ. The new alliance emphasizes "the absolute truth of the whole of Holy Scripture."

War Hurts English Sunday Schools

The Sunday Schools of England, Anglican and nonconformists have lost since 1914 about a million pupils and thousands of teachers. The loss continued even last year in the Anglican communion but the free churches gained twenty thousand pupils. The great loss is attributed to the death and disability of the world war. The loss of competent teachers has discouraged the pupils. Only the building up of an adequate teaching force again will restore Sunday School work to normal.

Community Center No Longer Denominational

The Lincoln Center of Chicago, made famous by the life and labors of Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, was always connected in some loose way with the Unitarian denomination, even though Mr. Jones took the word Unitarian out of the church nomenclature. There has recently been a separation between All Souls' Church and Lincoln Center. Dr. James L. Artman has been called as director of Lincoln Center. He was formerly president of the Y. M. C. A. College of Chicago, and is at present an instructor in religious education in the Divinity

School of the University of Chicago. The churches in this section of the city are all hindered in their work by the encroachments of the Negro district on their territory. Henceforth all of the churches are invited to use the facilities of Lincoln Center. All Souls' church is one of the smallest churches in the district and it will continue to meet in Lincoln Center and function as a "liberal" church, with Dr. John M. Evans as minister.

Forum Movement Comes to Evanston

The Forum movement originated in the east and is less known in the middle west. Recently a group of large churches in Evanston, Illinois, arranged for a "try" at the forum idea. Three great speakers have been engaged for the last three Sundays of January. These are ex-Governor Chase Osborn of Michigan, ex-Senator Albert J. Beveridge of Indiana and Prof. E. A. Steiner of Grinnell College. If these initial Sunday afternoons prove successful the experiment will be continued. The participating churches have had no individual Sunday evening services in years, and for several years have been conducting a union service in the evening on conventional lines.

Paulist Fathers Develop New Method

The Paulist Fathers of the Roman Catholic church devote much of their energies to the conversion of non-Catholics to "the true faith." Two of these priests have been experimenting with a new method of pulpit ministry in New York this winter. Instead of sermons, there have been public dialogues between two priests. One priest gives voice to the objections to catholic doctrine found in the non-Catholic world, and these are answered by the other priest. These priests have been claiming the Roman Catholic church is the mother of civilization and the patron of all true learning.

West Indies Church Formed in New York

The diversity of American life is well illustrated by a perusal of the directory of churches in large cities. Religion organizes itself not only on denominational but on racial lines. There was organized in New York recently a West Indies Lutheran church. Most of the members were people of color from the Virgin Islands which were recently purchased from Denmark. Recently fourteen young people were confirmed, the confirmation service being held in St. Paul's church with robes and ritual.

Great Liberal Leader Passes

Forty years ago a brilliant group of independent minded ministers in the state of Missouri laid the foundations of a liberal theological movement among the Disciples of Christ. In this company one of the most eminent was Rev. Alexander Proctor. The last surviving member of the group, Rev. A. B. Jones, passed away recently at Liberty, Mo. Mr. Jones was a writer and speaker of power and lived to the ripe old age of ninety. Dr. Burris Jenkins of Kansas City, editor of the Post, and pastor of Linwood Boulevard church attended the funeral and spoke a tribute to the memory of the departed leader.

Missionary Secretaries Help Make Great Church

Since the establishment, less than a year ago, of national headquarters for the Disciples of Christ in St. Louis, the great development of recent years in Union Avenue church, of which Dr. George A. Campbell is pastor, has been considerably augmented. The financial receipts of this church the past year increased by 72 per cent, and the new members for the year were 271. The big debt on the building, amounting to about $100,000, which has been carried for a number of years is now all underwritten and the church is planning a great enlargement of its service.

Episcopalians Use Lantern Slides

The use of lantern slides with which to illustrate the work of foreign missions has been highly developed in the Methodist denomination and is now a practice extending rapidly to other denominations. The mission board of the Protestant Episcopal church is now able to announce four sets of slides with others in preparation. The four are on the Southern Mountaineers, Panama, Liberia and "The Church's Battle Line." Rev. Robert Keating is preparing a lecture on Czecho-Slovakia.

Want Cathedral Restored to Christians

The Christians of the orient have never forgiven the Turk for the capture of the sanctuary of St. Sophia in Constantinople. Recently a group of oriental churchmen in New York gathered in the Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine and made a plea in six languages that the ancient place of worship be restored to the Christians. Prelates of the various oriental churches appeared in their brilliant robes. Similar services were held on the same Sunday in St. Louis, Washington, Detroit, Newark, Philadelphia and Chicago. At the service in New York, prayers were said for Cardinal Gibbons of the Roman Catholic Church.

Professors of Church History Meet

Among the theological disciplines the one that seems to touch most vitally the problem of Christian union is the study of church history. The American Society of Church History which meets annually senses this fact, and in their meetings there is an irenic purpose among the members, who come from various religious organizations. At a recent meeting of the society held at Union Theological Seminary during Christmas week Prof. R. H. Nichols, professor of church history at Auburn Seminary presided and spoke on "Aims and Methods of Teaching History." Dr. Peter Ainslie discussed the question whether the denominational school has a distinct place in education or not.

Four Sons in the Ministry

Dr. G. Campbell Morgan recently joined the Ft. Wayne presbytery by a letter of dismissal from the Congregational Union of London. He then participated in the ordination of a son, two other sons having part in the service. He has a fourth son who is a Congregationalist, being pastor of the Congregational church in Terre Haute. Dr. Morgan is engaged in delivering Bible lectures in various parts of the country. His case is interesting as answering the question whether preachers' sons enter the ministry.

John Haynes Holmes Goes on Lecture Tour

Rev. John Haynes Holmes, pastor of the Community Church of New York, is on a tour of the west which will require several weeks. He is speaking in Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, Denver, and in a number of California cities. For the most part he is interpreting the peace movement. In Chicago he spoke before the Fellowship of Reconciliation and at Lincoln Center. He will be in his pulpit in New York again on Feb. 13 when he begins a new series of sermons.

Catholics Admit Religious Needs in Italy

Although the Vatican has been much worked up over the invasion of Italy by the Protestants, there is evidently a lot of work for somebody to do there that is not at present being done by the Roman Catholics. Free religion makes an appeal in every country to a constituency different from that which feeds upon ritual. The following news note in the Catholic weekly, America, would seem to justify the efforts of the Methodists in establishing work in Italy: "In Italy, the percentage of unbaptized children, born of Catholic parents, is appalling. This percentage is growing, especially in the manufacturing regions, where Socialists and types of radicals almost unknown at home, gain the ear of the laborer. In Naples, in many of the large cities, in Rome itself, the Protestant missions provide social service centers, usually well equipped and well managed. These centers care for the physical needs of the light-hearted, irresponsible, children of sunny Italy. Thus is the beginning made. But little and little these children are induced to look upon their religious duties, such as attendance at mass on Sundays, and the regular reception of the sacraments, as of small moment. In too many of the larger cities, no remedy whatever against this leakage is offered. The result is inevitable. If a vista down the ages were presented, showing the ranks of the Church depleted by the grave dangers now menacing the little children, would not the faithful of both France and Italy be at once aroused? Nor would the generous Catholics of America fail to rally to the defense. The danger grows and it is pitifully real. Who will lead in this new crusade?"

Methodist Bishop Refuses Reordination

The Boston Ministers all gathered in the Swedenborgian church recently to hear an address by Bishop Lawrence (Episcopal) on the Lambeth Conference. Bishop Hughes was very outspoken against the plan for reordination. He said: "I would not be reordained in the Episcopal Church for a million dollars. I believe my father, who was a Methodist minister, was as regularly ordained as the archbishop of York. Why, if this thing which Bishop Lawrence is suggesting went into operation, there would be more cleavage than ever in the churches."

Evangelism Without the Dollar Mark

Professional evangelism has had the dollar mark written all over it in the past decade, and fortunes have been made by men who assembled big mass meetings for religious excitement. Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, editor of the Christian Herald, believes that evangelism in crowds is still a workable method, and he is proposing to give himself to some unique campaigns this winter. Without remuneration other than his carfare, he will preach in a number of cities of under fifty thousand inhabitants. There is to be no paid music, no hired halls and no paid advertising. The meeting is to begin in prayer and spread through the community by spiritual influence. How different this all is from the work of a well known evangelist who spends his first two weeks abusing the church people in order to get the sinners coming, is evident.

New Name for Syrian College

In the missionary world, one of the most eminent of the educational institutions is Beirut College. This great school was brought to its present efficiency by the late Dr. Howard A. Bliss. It has been decided to enlarge the scope of the school still further and the name of the institution will be changed once more. It will be the American University of Beirut. This school, in common with American institutions, has acquired a deficit. A campaign is now on to wipe out an accumulated debt of $32,000 and to provide $80,000 for future needs.

Successful Down Town Church

While churches have been on the retreat on the west side in Chicago, many fine edifices being abandoned, a Disciples church has made good. Jackson Boulevard church, of which Rev. Austin Hunter is pastor, has a thousand members on its records, most of whom are in active relation to the church. This church, which is located near Western Avenue, recently decided to buy more property in the present location for the erection of a community house. The community house will also provide for the expansion of the Sunday school which does not have convenient quarters in the church building.

Union in Canada Still Live Theme

The union of the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist churches of Canada is still a live theme. Votes are being taken by local congregations and

How the Denominations Paid the Underwritings

The Baptists are the first denomination to meet in full their obligation to the banks in connection with the Interchurch World Movement underwritings. Part of the money was secured by the Rockefellers paying up a pledge in full, and all of it came from the receipts from Baptist World Movement pledges. The total underwritings of the Baptist denomination amounted to $2,543,766.67. This is a pretty big sum for a religious organization to have to pay out on an unsuccessful experiment and the Baptists have paid it with what grace they could command under pressure of grim necessity. The Methodists will pay their obligations as they fall due at the bank. The Methodist obligation is to be met out of the proceeds of the Centenary Movement. No special appeal has been made for extra funds with which to meet the underwritings. The Presbyterians had a special day on which the churches were asked to meet the Presbyterian obligation of a million dollars. Arrangements are made now for the prompt payment of the Presbyterian obligation. The Disciples alone of the great evangelical bodies are yet without provision for their obligation of $600,000. The second Sunday in December was observed as "Debt of Honor Day" but the receipts up to last report had been quite meager, running a little below fifty thousand dollars. It is thought that a number of churches will yet remit, but it seems quite clear that the Disciples' obligation will not be met by the extra offering. Half of the Disciple money is owed by the United Christian Missionary Society which has assets, and half by the Board of Education, which has no assets.

the Presbyterian congregations are voting in favor of union sixteen to one in recent elections. The other two denominations have been almost unanimous for union from the start. Meanwhile the churches are growing very impatient in the far west. Conditions in western Canada make union imperative.

Minister to Labor Is Appointed

The ministers of Denver aided greatly this past year in the settlement of a street car strike which dragged along through many weary weeks. The experiences of the past year have led to very much closer relations between the church and organized labor. Recently the ministers of the city selected one of their number to represent them in the councils of organized labor. The man selected was Dr. G. S. Lackland, pastor of Grace Methodist church. This minister has long been distinguished for his modern church program. There is a $60,000 community house in connection with the church, and a Sunday afternoon Forum is conducted.

After each address two hours or more will be given for conference and free discussion. The last evening an address will be made in the interest of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America by Prof. Herbert L. Willett of the University of Chicago.

This conference will be unique not only in that it will make a place for the presentation of each denomination's point of view and give wide latitude for discussion, but it also makes a place for the interpretation of various racial and ethical approaches as well as approaches of polity. It is likely to be the most comprehensive presentation of Christian unity that has yet been made, and it will no doubt awaken widespread and deep interest throughout the American church. Ministers and laymen will be in attendance, both men and women.

This conference is unique in that it is strictly a Christian unity conference, being interdenominational, and each party having freedom to discuss the plans presented and the outlook for Christian cooperation. It includes movements for Protestant unity as well as movements for the unity of the whole church—Protestant, Anglican, Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic. It likewise includes theological, ethical and social approaches, as well as approaches by policy.

Ministers in St. Louis, and throughout the Middle West have been asked to preach on Sunday, January 30, on the importance of Christian unity, and the call has gone out for all churches to have special prayers for the work of the conference at the Wednesday evening meeting before, which is January 26.

Mid-West Conference On Christian Unity

A UNIQUE gathering in behalf of Christian unity is to be held in Second Baptist Church, St. Louis, February 2-4. The event promises to be notable in its representative participation, the fraternal character of the auspices under which it is held, and the breadth and pertinency of its program. Projected by the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, a Disciples organization of which Dr. Peter Ainslie is president and Rev. H. C. Armstrong secretary, the meeting will be in the broadest sense an event thoroughly interdenominational in character. The local committee is composed of a representative minister and layman from each of the following bodies: Congregational, Baptist, Disciple, Evangelical, German Methodist, Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal South, Protestant Episcopal, Presbyterian in the U. S. A., Presbyterian in the U. S., United Lutheran and United Presbyterian. This committee has organized itself with the following officers: Rt. Rev. F. F. Johnson, Protestant Episcopal bishop, chairman; Rev. Dr. W. C. Bitting, pastor Second Baptist Church, vice-chairman; Rev. Dr. D. C. MacLeod, pastor of Central Presbyterian Church, secretary; Rev. Dr. A. H. Armstrong, secretary of the St. Louis Church Federation, assistant secretary, and Rev. Dr. George A. Campbell, pastor Union Avenue Christian Church, treasurer.

The gathering is to be quite informal in its make-up, the invitation being extended to churchmen of all fellowships in the middle west who have an interest in the growing spirit of Christian unity. Plans are being made for an attendance of 1,000 persons. The conference opens at 2:30 on February 2 with an address by Dr. Ainslie, outlining the various movements toward unity which now occupy the attention of Christian churches throughout Christendom. Following this address representatives of various denominations will answer the question: "What Does My Denomination Mean by the 'Church' and 'Church Unity'?" Rev. Dr. W. H. Geistweit, pastor Third Baptist Church, St. Louis, will answer for the Baptists; Rev. Dr. S. H. Woodrow, pastor Pilgrim Congregational Church, St. Louis, will answer for the Congregationalists; Rev. Dr. F. W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary Society, St. Louis, will answer for the Disciples; Rev. Dr. C. B. Spencer, editor of the Central Christian Advocate, Kansas City, will answer for the Methodists; Rev. Dr. John S. Bunting, rector Church of the Ascension, St. Louis, will answer for the Protestant Episcopalians; Rev. Dr. B. P. Fullerton, St. Louis, will answer for the Presbyterians; Rev. Dr. John Baltzer, president of the General Evangelical Synod, will answer for the Evangelicals; Rev. Dr. W. E. Wheeler, pastor St. Mark's United Lutheran Church, St. Louis, will answer for the Lutherans; Rev. Dr. J. H. C. Fritz, dean Concordia Seminary, will answer for the Missouri Synod of the Lutheran church.

On the evening of February 2 the Lambeth Appeal, which was formulated last summer at Lambeth Palace by the bishops of the Anglican and Episcopal churches, will be presented by an Episcopal bishop, followed by conference. On February 3, in the morning session, the World Conference on Faith and Order will be presented by Mr. Robert H. Gardiner, secretary of the World Conference and a prominent attorney and banker of Boston. That afternoon the American Council on Organic Union of Evangelical Protestants will be presented by Mr. Henry W. Jessup, distinguished lawyer, son of the well-known missionary educator of that name, born at Beirut, Syria, now professor of law in the New York University and author of a number of books, to whom perhaps more than any other is due the credit of this Protestant plan of union. That evening Christian unity on the mission fields will be presented by Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Brown, for twenty-five years secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

On the morning of February 4 the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship Through the Churches will be presented by Rev. Dr. H. A. Atkinson, secretary of the Carnegie Peace Union and a member of the Executive Committee of the World Alliance. That afternoon the Christian Endeavor movement will be presented by its founder, Rev. Dr. Francis E. Clark of Boston; also that afternoon the Universal Conference of the Church of Christ on Life and Work will be presented by the Rev. Dr. Frederick Lynch, editor of The Christian Work, New York.

By H. G. Wells

THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY is unique in the modern literature of the world. It is doubtful whether there is another writer living who could even have approached the subject with anything like the breadth of mind, the knowledge, the judgment, and the enthusiasm with which H. G. Wells is equipped. A scientist trained under Huxley, teacher and educational critic of practical experience, author not only of romances, novels and essays, but of a Text-Book of Biology that a recent traveller found being used as a text-book in a Chinese University,—it is no wonder that Henry James said of Mr. Wells years ago: "Mr. Wells' documented or saturated state in respect to a particular matter at hand is but one of the faces of his generally informed condition, of his extraordinary mass of gathered and assimilated knowledge . . . He is a novelist very much as Lord Bacon was a philosopher, who affects us as taking all knowledge for his province."

That is exactly what Mr. Wells has at length done. He has taken all history for his province. He has been preaching for years that history properly taught is the backbone of education. And now he gives his version of history properly taught, as one vast panorama not of "reigns and pedigrees and campaigns" of ordinary history, but of "ages and races and nations," brought within the "normal limitations of time and energy set to the reading and energy of an ordinary citizen." Beginning with primal star-dust, through the making of the planet and the birth of amoeba and reptile and mammal, through the slow evolution of that Neanderthal being that has always so curiously intrigued Mr. Wells, through the dawn and early light of recorded history, Sumerian, Assyrian, Mongolian, Egyptian, Greek, Hebrew, Roman, Teutonic, down to the Great War and the present, runs the tremendous record. Astronomy, geology, biology, anthropology,—all contribute data to this most encyclopedic of histories.

The book is profusely illustrated with Maps, Time Diagrams and Drawings by J. F. HORRABIN.

COMMENTS OF THE PRESS.

"If the New Republic had to choose now a single modern work to which it might direct its readers for that saner understanding of men's collective life which this weekly was established to promote, it would be willing to choose THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY by H. G. WELLS."—Editors, The New Republic.

"The whole History of the World fused into one epical story. A clear, luminous and concentrated story of mankind written by a story teller. Mr. Wells has had the assistance of our greatest living historians and scientific writers with the object of obtaining accuracy in every detail."—Spectator (London).

Five Indispensable Books

Recommended by the Editor of The Christian Century (Issue of December 23)

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

Here is the history, not of kings and their wars and land-thefts, but of ages and races and nations. It is truly democratic. It is of greater value to the average man than a whole library of bulky histories of individual nations. Buy this book and save money on encyclopedias!

IN EIGHT BOOKS

The first three books, on "The Making of Our World," "The Making of Man," and "The Dawn of History" are veritable gold-mines of science, and the last book, on "The Next Stage in History" will appeal to all prophetic-minded people.

Two Volumes, $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

What and Where is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN.

Of this book the Editor of The Christian Century says: "I could wish that every perturbed mind might read this book. It would put a new face on nature, on history, on providence, on prayer, on the future life. Aye, and the possession of a deep conviction as to the reality of God would put new radiance upon the face of the reader himself."

$2.50, plus 14 cents postage.

The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War

By ROBERT E. SPEER, WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN and others.

These great leaders indicate that the way out for the distracted world is not by the League of Nations alone, but also by the way of Christian missions. Any minister who would deprive himself of this most timely and prophetic survey would be courting failure for himself in his chosen work of carrying on the tasks which the Master began.

Price $2.00, plus 14 cents postage.

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By ALBERT PARKER FITCH.

Can the church survive? Dr. Fitch holds that that will depend upon the extent of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

80 cents, plus 6 cents postage.

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD S. DOUGLAS.

Not merely a book of methods of the how to fill the pews sort, but a book filled with inspiration for the troubled preacher, and replete with suggestions for practical promotion of the work of the church. Dr. Douglas is one of the most lucid writers, but he is more: he is a man who has succeeded admirably in conducting the work and worship in his own great church in a spirit of devotion, and also with remarkable popular success.

A Prayer for a Heart of Humility

THOU in the hollow of whose hand our lives are held, teach us to think of Thee and the mighty forces at Thy command in a spirit of awe and trust and dependence. Deliver us from all foolish pride and vain self-importance. Reveal to us the true source of whatever strength we seem to have. Show us that all our springs are in Thee, and that but for Thee our little lives would wither and die. May we seek to find our right place in a world in which our will is held in leash of Thy will, and so may we be saved from the excesses of futile self-assertion against the gracious plan which Thou hast made for each one of Thy children. Forbid that we fall into the shallow illusion that life is meant for our comfort and selfish ease, but give us rather the blessing that comes through discipline and defeat and struggle.

Make us willing, O Lord, to face the inexorable events of experience with a humble and inquiring spirit. Confronting sorrow and temptation and stern duty may we not flinch, but wait in prayerful silence for the revealing of Thy will and love. Thrill us with the discovery of our own true freedom in the acceptance of Thy will. In the merging of our puny powers with the conquering energies of God may we discover our own strength. In the yielding of our flickering torch to Thy sunshine's blaze unroll before our feet the path which, unaided, our foreshortened vision could not hope to trace.

Yet, Lord, as Thou dost save us from wilfulness, save us also from weak and nerveless quietude. As Thou revealest Thy plan for our lives in outer event and circumstance, from which we cannot escape, disclose Thy will also in our inner purpose to match each event and circumstance with a militant and courageous heart. Forbid that we should lie down helpless in the presence of any unescapable visitation, but rather may we go forth to meet it with eagerness and hope. Not in dumb resignation nor in soft acquiescence may we lend our will to Thee, but, as partners with Thy will, by working with Thee may we change the forbidding aspect of all events into gracious disclosures of Thy goodness and love. In the name of Christ. Amen.

The Bishop and Books

BISHOP NICHOLSON of the Methodist church is quoted in the secular press as saying that since he has been bishop he has read only two books. Newspaper reporters do not always understand, but the report has some plausibility in view of the actual facts which may be ascertained by a canvass of the reading habits of the official class in some of the denominations. The doctrine is gaining currency that it is not the business of the minister to be a scholar, nor even a student. His chief business is to be an administrator. Hence there are thousands of ministers who will confess without shame that they do not read two books a year. They justify this course on the ground that they are too busy making their churches go to read books. All of which suggests the importance of thinking through just what we ought to mean by making a church go. If we mean keeping up the things that make statistics, that is one thing. The preacher who gets a certain number of new members every year, who keeps the budget of the church up to standard and who can drum up the faithful to fill the pews will probably be called a success in many communities. But he is often a failure. The people who listen to him may be kept by his sort of leadership in a narrow circle of ideas. Attending the church of such a minister may mean no growth in religious ideas and no real growth in piety. The church that seems a success because it keeps the wheels going round and round cumbers the ground and prevents a more spiritual church form succeeding. Jesus did not think he wasted time by spending days alone. Paul spent three years alone in preparation for his great life ministry. The greatest of our modern ministers, the men upon whom thousands wait in the metropolitan cities, are not men who despise books and the intellectual life. Through books they connect themselves with the saints of the past and with the best spirits of modern life. The secretary, bishop, or other official who would encourage the minister to think of himself in the category of a hired man whose chief virtue lies in the successful use of a filing cabinet, has forgotten that the church needs not only methods, but it needs much more the Holy Spirit.

A Prize For Politeness

A GERMAN newspaper for one week gave prizes to those who did kind things, and showed themselves truly courteous. The idea traveled over to New York, and it is now being exploited in Chicago by the Chicago Tribune. There is no more widely read story in the paper than that which tells of the adventures of the reporter who goes about in broad daylight, looking not for an honest man, but for a polite one. His disappointments are many, but here and there the kindly spirit is found and rewarded. Ever since this feature was started there has been a noteworthy difference in the attitude of street car conductors and other public officials. Clerks have been lured on by the prospect of a prize. Not all of them have received fifty dollar bills, but each one has nevertheless received a prize. Politeness is its own reward. It adorns the countenance with beauty, fills the heart with gladness and opens the pathway to ready employment and worldly preferment. Those who have learned the joy of being kind will hardly turn their backs upon this blessed way again. Politeness is only a certain phase of religion in action. There can be no true courtesy which does not spring out of genuine regard for others. The counterfeit is sure to betray itself after awhile. A man might travel around the world and visit all sorts of strange people, being sure that the universal language in manners would be the practice of the Golden Rule. With this blessed law written in the heart, every other defect would be forgiven.

A Non-Sectarian Program at the State University

RELIGIOUS workers at state universities recently held a two day convention in Chicago at which their problems were given a thorough consideration. What shall the denominational representative do at the state university? On this fundamental question there seemed to be the widest variety of opinion. The Disciples have been longest in this field. They have held consistently to the idea that the denominational work at a state university should be in the field of education, that courses in the Bible and in religious doctrine should be given to supplement the teaching of university class rooms. The Presbyterians have been fond of the "student pastor" idea. The student pastor is usually a bustling young fellow who "lines up" the students at the local church every Sunday morning for a Bible class, and for the service of worship. The student pastor is considered necessary since the pastor is too busy with the local community to give much time to the students. The Methodists have developed the denominational dormitory. The state university is accustomed to the idea of fraternities and sororities. A denominational dormitory is another fraternity or sorority, from the student viewpoint. Since people of one house have little to do with students of another house, the denominational group is effectively walled off from participation in general student activities. Prof. Arthur Braden, Disciples representative at the University of Kansas, challenged seriously the whole dormitory idea, and insisted that the state should house its students. He insisted that any accentuation of denominational distinctions at the state university made the task of religious education vastly more difficult. What is now needed, it seems to us, is a coordination of the denominational agencies and schools at the state university, or better, a union of them. Then the students may secure academic credit for the study of religion and this alone will dignify such study in their eyes.

Increasing Possibilities of Racial Trouble

MANY signs indicate that the year ahead will be one marked by racial disturbance unless wise and Christian leadership averts it. A belated reorganization of the Ku Klux Klan has come in the south. This organization is running true to form and now opposes not only Negroes but Jews, and is marked by special antipathy to the Roman Catholic church. It holds public meetings in which sheeted figures sit upon the stage while a southern spell-binder arouses the passions of the mob. It is promised that this organization will invade New York and other northern cities. In cities like Chicago, where the housing congestion is almost unbearable, the agitator can do untold harm. Nor are these ominous portents confined to the white race. Stephen Graham, an Englishman, has been studying the Negro in this country and his observations have been published in a volume called "The Soul of John Brown." A study of this book reveals the smouldering sense of injustice among the colored people. As they develop educated leadership, inevitably some of these talk in radical terms. The Negro manifestly has injustices to complain of. He pays taxes, but the streets of the Negro quarter are not improved. He pays a library tax, but throughout the south he is not admitted to the public library. He pays the same fare on trains as white passengers, but has inferior accommodations. In the north as in the south it is often difficult to find an eating house that will feed him, or a hotel that will house him. Meanwhile there are Negro professional men and Negro capitalists in many large cities. Men of color ride in as good an automobile as any white man can buy. Some Negroes have set themselves to the task of breaking down the white man's tabu. They persistently buy property in the white man's zone, and resist all efforts at buying them out. With situations so pregnant with possibilities of trouble only the most wise and Christian leadership can cope. Without breaking down the racial separateness which is to the interest both of white men and Negro, justice must be done. Equal opportunities of self-development must be given both races.

Child Labor on the Increase

THE enactment of laws is not always a guarantee that a reform has finally been consummated. State and national laws now operate in many communities to prevent the labor of little children, but these are openly violated in other communities. The National Child Labor Committee has called attention to the fact that during the first half of 1920 there was an increase of child labor in fourteen states. The Imperial Valley of California is singled out as a particularly shocking example of the abuse of little children. Children as young as five years work all day long in the cotton fields. An investigator found one father who pleaded to keep his children in the fields a little longer until his new automobile was paid for. In the case of the cotton industry, the children are not exploited by large employers, but are kept out of school by their own parents. It is astonishing to find thousands of parents in the United States in a state of skepticism with regard to the advantages of education. They judge "book larnin'" by strictly utilitarian standards. Even on these grounds the National Child Labor committee insists that the child who stays in school has the advantage. The child who stays in school until eighteen is earning twice as much at twenty-five as the child who leaves school at fourteen. The church in every community can do no less than lend itself as an active ally with those agencies which are fighting the exploitation of little children. The right of the child to play, growth, education and religion is a God-given right which is only taken away by the selfishness of man. The progress of the race depends directly upon the way in which little children are treated.

Fellowship with the Unitarians

ALL over the country the celebration of the tercentenary of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers in this country has been the occasion of the getting together of Unitarians and Congregationalists. In Boston the Congregational and Unitarian clubs held a joint meeting on December 20. In Fresno, Cal., there was a joint meeting of the Unitarian and Congregational churches in the Congregational edifice. Examples like these might be greatly multiplied. It would be possible to exaggerate the meaning of these events. Congregationalists are not becoming Unitarian, nor are Unitarians becoming orthodox. In some places the Congregationalists regard the Unitarians as too conservative to make union possible, for after having advanced a step they have in some communities stagnated. There is a great section of the Unitarian denomination which has become very backward in the matter of social service and very slow in adopting modern methods in religious education. On the other hand there are some Congregational ministers who are ultra-radical in spirit. The man who declares that the work of this generation is to destroy and that of another generation to build again, is an example in point. Any courteous Americans may join together in common aims and purposes without agreement in creed. It need not disturb anyone if evangelical and Unitarian and Roman Catholic money gets all mixed up in feeding the children of central Europe, or if the people of these several churches should all be mixed up in a meeting to consider world peace. On a recent Sunday evening Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Unitarians and evangelicals sat together in a town meeting in Evanston, Illinois, to consider the work of religious education in the public schools. The evangelical tabu against the Unitarian was a foolish and unchristian thing. The man who holds the higher view of the person of Jesus has no need to defend it by any kind of medieval method, but best serves his cause through fellowship and friendship.

Sectarian Opposition to the Smith-Towner Bill

A POWERFUL Roman Catholic society has declared war on the Smith-Towner bill which would create a national department of education with sufficient funds at its disposal to make the department a real factor in education. This opposition springs, of course, from the fear that the work of parish schools would be interfered with. No doubt the operation of the Smith-Towner bill would provide ruthless publicity for any schools in the country that were below modern standards, but Protestants would not expect the Roman Catholic authorities to be frightened by such a possibility. Meanwhile all citizens should be informed as to just what needs this new step in educational progress would supply. The bill would meet the immediate need for Americanization work which was so sadly revealed by the war and which will increase as the new tide of immigration rolls in. It provides also for government aid for those backward states in which there are multitudes of illiterate young people. Particularly the southern mountain states have been cursed with illiteracy and only Federal aid can reach this problem. A department of education would also guarantee the Negro an equal opportunity with children of the white race in securing an elementary education. Meanwhile great fundamental questions in education are waiting for solution. The work of investigation is too expensive for any single state government. It may as well be done for all, and certain educational principles be laid down for the whole republic. The Protestant churches do not compete with the state in elementary education. Their work rests back upon what the state does in education. These churches are interested to secure from the state a reasonable period of time every week for the instruction in religion pending the time when such instruction may be an integral part of education as the state itself administers it. We shall never solve the problem of religious education until a national commission works out for the entire nation a new formulation of educational theory.

More Tokens of Chicago's Literary Primacy

GRADUALLY literature is coming down from its lofty ivory tower where art is created from the stuff dreams are made of, and is entering into the workaday life of striving, sweating, suffering humanity, finding always something that sings right in the "mud and scum of things." Leaders in this earthward movement of literature are such poets as Carl Sandburg and Edgar Lee Masters and such fiction writers as Chicago is just beginning to produce. Louis Untermeyer, the critic and poet of New York City, recently sent a word of greeting to the annual meeting of the Society of Midland Authors, which has its center in Chicago, and the heart of his message was that Chicago is to be especially congratulated upon the fact that it has produced during the past year at least three outstanding novels of genuine American quality. The three novels he named are "Main Street," by Sinclair Lewis, "Poor White," by Sherwood Anderson, and "Moon Calf," by Floyd Dell. There had not yet appeared, at the time of Mr. Untermeyer's statement, Edgar Lee Masters' initial work of fiction, "Mitch Miller." This would undoubtedly take like rank in Mr. Untermeyer's mind with the three books mentioned. For both criticism and the popular taste are already awarding this story of American boy life a place beside Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn and Tom Sawyer. There comes also this year from Mr. Masters another work of poetry, "The Domesday Book," which it is predicted will be treasured, fifty years from now, as the great poem of the War; and Carl Sandburg's new book of verse, "Smoke and Steel," is winning new laurels for this sturdy American singer. This mention of recent Chicago work is not exclusive, for there are other very worthy books, such as Henry Kittell Webster's "Mary Wollaston" which cannot be left out of any account.

These facts are given only to indicate that Mr. H. L. Mencken is apparently to be justified in his statement made last year that Chicago is now or soon will be the literary center of the country. It is reported that he has recently written from the East that he is more than ever assured of the correctness of his estimate of the value of the literary work Chicago is doing.

In keeping with Mr. Mencken's statement is the report that has just come from the Illinois Woman's Press Association as to the present literary standing of this "Hog Butcher for the World," as Mr. Sandburg styles our City by the Lake. This organization recently took upon itself to supply the Chicago Historical Society with data concerning Chicago authors, and the leaders in the investigation now come forward with the enthusiastic report that within the walls of the city of Armour, Nelson Morris and Swift are to be found this year more than seventy novelists and poets; and this was only the beginning of the count, so we are told.

The striking fact about the new fiction that is coming from Chicago is that in practically every book of first rate quality the motif of the story is an individual's idealistic struggle out from the heavy materialism that has almost choked our American life during the past few decades. This is undoubtedly true of the work of Lewis, Anderson, Masters, Sandburg, Webster and Dell. It might be well for the leaders of the church to take a sidelong glance, every once in a while, at these literary prophets of a new age of idealism. It is indeed possible that these poets and novelists may be compelled to take over entirely the reins of idealistic leadership—especially if it is going to take the churches—as some influential thinkers assert it will—a generation or more to thrash out their precious doctrinal differences.

The Ascent to Easter

ALL seasons rank the same with God, but not all adapt themselves with equal facility and congeniality to the work of his Holy Spirit through the church. The difficulties in the way of churchly endeavors in the summer time in our North American latitude have come to be taken for granted—perhaps too much taken for granted—and a certain adjustment of church attitude toward the assumed inevitable "summer slump" has become a habit. With the opening of the schools, the return of vacationists, the passing of the extreme heat and the settling down to a new season's business and family routine, the church too undertakes in the autumn to rally its forces, to renew the allegiance of its membership and to gain the ear of its community. By Christmas and the opening of the new year, church life is normally in full swing, and there stretches ahead a period of several months in which the church comes nearer having the right of way in personal and social interest than in any other space on the calendar.

This seasonal consideration invests the months approaching Easter with singular importance in church life. It is the strategic season. The measure of progress, the level of uplift, achieved by the church in the cycle of the twelve-month is determined more by what is done between Christmas and Easter than by what transpires at any other period. The excitement and distraction and fatigue of the approach to Christmas create difficulties against which church leadership must contend with patience and stern resolution. But the ascent to Easter is by an open way, which not churchly interest alone, but secular customs also, keep fairly free for whatever the church wants to do.

Besides all this, the season approaching Easter contains the memorials of the very substance of our Christian faith and hope. Christmas, Good Friday and Easter—the incarnation, the atonement, the resurrection—here the structural verities of all our Christian thinking and experience are grouped together by means of memorial days which obviously make Easter Sunday the climax of the church year. The inclusion of the last weeks of the life of Jesus in this period, particularly the week of his passion, and the traditional custom over a large portion of Christendom of observing Lent, further contribute to the unique opportunity for Christian work afforded by this stretch of weeks.

In what manner ought the church to use the season of ascent to Easter? Many churches are already engaged, with sound instinct, in recruiting campaigns of an evangelistic order. This is an appropriate and congenial time for urging upon the non-Christian portion of the community the claims of the gospel and of the church. Whether by special meetings for this purpose or by the organization of the Christian forces in a hand to hand, personal approach, the function of evangelism—grossly abused as it has too often been—finds here its most challenging opportunity of the year. It is important, however, that the deeper note be sounded, both in evangelistic effort and in the regular ministries of the church. Merely to set up the evangelistic apparatus for recruiting new members is to fall far short of an adequate use of these pre-Easter days. It is a time not alone for thrusting in the sickle and gathering the sheaves into the garner; it is chiefly a time for spiritual subsoiling, for deepening the moral intelligence of the church itself and for greatening the significance of religion in the lives of all the people.

At no season of the year is the public mood so open to a serious consideration of the claims of Christ. Instruction in the elementary things of the Christian life should characterize the minister's work. Problems of administration should fall into a subordinate place while the essential task of the spiritual monitor and shepherd is attended to. Classes of youth from the Sunday school may be organized for instruction looking toward a decision day on the Sunday following Easter or on Easter Sunday itself. Our younger Protestant denominations, reacting against the ways and traditions of the historic church, have missed much by our failure to keep the essential psychology of the confirmation class, even though we repudiated its theology. The catechetical method is good religious pedagogy, and each pastor is free to project his own course of instruction if he fails to find one at hand that suits him. The important thing is to bring to a definition, in the minds of adolescent young people, the essential elements of Christian faith and churchly responsibility. Without resorting to special revivalistic excitement, this ever emerging body of youth may be brought quietly and intelligently to a decisive crisis and their hearts may be permanently won for the imperial claims of Jesus Christ.

This instructional emphasis should characterize all the work of the minister, not alone in the week day duties of the parish, but in the pulpit also. The service of worship may be made to sound unwonted depths during this season. What minister's imagination does not kindle as he considers the seasonal appropriateness of those three great doctrines, the incarnation, the atonement, and the resurrection? Here is the opportunity for great doctrinal preaching, for a fresh interpretation of the eternal facts which lie behind these historic theological symbols. No dry as dust parroting of what ancient commentators have said will do today. The preacher must have his own soul fertilized with the more recent interpretations. Great new meanings are now discerned in these ancient doctrines. They are being brought down from a realm of abstraction into our actual world of experience. Each of these doctrines is now seen to be dripping with social as well as individualistic implications. The problems of militarism and industry, of race and class relationships, are involved in the principles symbolized in this memorial period between Christmas and Easter.

What is the preacher going to do about it? If he is alert and aware of God's call to him, he will make this a season of study. Books he will have, if he goes without bread. Time to think and to compose his mind and to prepare his message he will take, even if some of the organizations do clamor complainingly for his counsel and attendance. He will stake the success of his ministry on the Sunday services of worship, and he will see to it that he goes into his pulpit burdened and vibrant with a conception of the whole service and sermon in which every detail has been prayerfully anticipated.

He is a wise minister if he unifies his own mind and his people's minds by allowing a single theme to run like a golden thread through all his study and his preaching. The doctrinal motif above referred to would lend itself richly to such use. Modern religion is weak and limp for lack of doctrinal structure. Pastors are not creating conviction in the souls of their people as did the pastors of a former generation. The abuse of creeds as tests and bases of fellowship has caused a revolt against creeds as such, even in their right and necessary use. Now is the time to preach sermons on God, on Christ, on the Bible, on the incarnation, on the atonement, on the resurrection, on human brotherhood, on the Kingdom of God, on providence, on conscience, on sorrow, on drudgery, on temptation,—but where shall one stop? These great first principles of the gospel are the strong meat which unfed church members will accept with grateful appetite.

More attractive to some minds will be a restudy of the life of Christ. The use of the midweek service for an open-forum discussion of the sermon-study on the previous Sunday is a method coming into increasing vogue. With such subject matter as the life of Christ, this method is peculiarly adaptable. The subject is at once familiar and vague to the popular mind. With such books as "By an Unknown Disciple," or Dr. Barton's "Four Hitherto Unpublished Gospels," new insight will be gained both by the minister and by his people.

In a word, the ascent to Easter is both harvest and seed-sowing time in the spiritual psychology of the calendar. It is spring and autumn rolled into one. Blessed is the church whose leadership is aware of the tokens of a peculiarly divine visitation.

Japanese Christians on Japan's Policy

THE peace treaty with its provision concerning Shantung brought to a focus much latent prejudice against Japan. The Korean situation has further alienated the sympathy of the democratic peoples. The agitation in California serves to sharpen prejudices, and the war with Germany brings into the high lights the striking similarity between Japan's form of government and that of our late enemy.

Americans should remember that there are two Japans. One is the old Japan of the Genro who ruled until recent years; the other is the Japan of tomorrow with its commoner-premier and a decided anti-military, democratic party growing up in the realm. The Japanese Federation of Churches, representing, of course, a modest fraction of the population, has issued a declaration that is as significant as it is courageous and clear-sighted. It is sent forth for the purpose of "clearing away misunderstandings and suspicions." The Christians of Japan desire to make their native land "a leader in the civilization of the Orient, a defender of international justice." The declaration is issued in four paragraphs: 1. Korea. They believe there has been much exaggeration in reports that Christians as such have been persecuted, but frankly confess that many things have been done which they cannot approve. They put their faith in the new government established there, hoping "that Japan will guide the Korean people with justice and humanity." 2. China. Regretting the anti-Japanese feeling in China and the sympathy it receives in America because of the belief that Japan will not return Tsingtao, they acknowledge that their government's attitude toward China has not always been impartial, but they have faith that the promises to return the province will be kept, and they "deeply hope" that the rights and feelings of the Chinese people will be so respected that "a neighborly friendship may be welded together in mutual understanding." 3. Militarism. Knowing well the activities of the militaristic party in their native land they call attention to the fact that every nation has such a party. They "unquestionably believe" that a majority of the people and the present national government is for peace and without imperialistic designs. They declare "it is our aim to lead our people to the absolute rejection of militarism and to help bring about a world peace that will endure forever." 4. The League of Nations. They rejoice over the founding of the League of Nations and believe that the Christian religion has made them "rich in international ideas," and given them "the clearest understanding of the great principle of world brotherhood," and they wish "to join with Christian people throughout the world in bringing it to perfection."

The pronouncement is a noble utterance and shows not only that our Japanese brethren are possessed of the noblest of Christian principles but that they are also possessed of the democratic gift of utterance of conviction. If they seem to us to claim a little too much in regard to the oppression of Christians in Korea and of the lack of imperial aims in their government we must remember that none of us is free from a patriotism that slurs over national faults, and that few patriots can wholly objectify the policies of their own country. The gratifying thing is they are able to make such definite declarations of Christian principles at a time like this. English church bodies would do no better in regard to Ireland than these Japanese Christians have done in regard to Korea. Americans did no better in regard to the Philippines back in the late nineties. We may also be reminded of the fact that our church conventions all declared for a League of Nations before the question took partisan form.

Premier Hara, in an article recently contributed to the "Japan Review," expresses great faith in the new policy in Korea and believes the "reconciliation of the two peoples" is a possible attainment. He asks that Japanese do all within their power to forward this purpose by showing "kindness and good-will," by "sympathizing with them in their situation" and "lending them a helping hand as they tread the thorny path of enlightenment."

The Passing of Provincialism

DIALLECT novels and poems are seldom produced in these days. Probably this is because the real curiosities of dialect are rapidly passing away. James Whitcomb Riley used to say that there were five distinct pronunciations of the word "going" in the state of Indiana, and that they were all wrong! Mr. Riley, a careful student of dialect, by the way, and not a mere observer of the speech of his own local neighborhood, declared that, forty years ago, the dialect of Indiana could be determined by county lines; and he criticized most severely those authors who, in their eagerness to produce stories and verse of the then popular order, mixed freely the speech of different parts of the state and characterized it all as "Hoosier." Now, even Mr. Riley himself could scarcely follow the lines of native speech with such accuracy. It is true that in remote mountain sections curiosities of custom and language still remain, but these sections are almost as few as are pieces of old mahogany in New England attics.

It is not hard to find the reason of this change. The railroad, the rural mail delivery, the centralized school, the telephone and the flivver have made even the most remote hamlets acquainted with the world. When a metropolitan newspaper comes into a home the head of the house is bound to know something about the nation's politics and about the world's markets, and his women folks are bound to know something about Paris fashions. When all the members of the family load themselves into an automobile on Saturday afternoon and drive to the nearest trading center, we may be sure that they have entered into a world-consciousness of the high cost of up-to-date living, and that for them the romance of isolated Americanism has no further place. They have ceased to be literary material, becoming producers and sellers and buyers,—part of the world's scheme of things.

To be sure, provincialism, either in the individual or in the community, will not pass without some severe struggles. Isolation has usually meant self-satisfaction, and this is bound to be disturbed when brought into contact with the world. The freshman in college who tells the upperclassmen how "we" played football at "our" high school is probably due for a trip to the pond. But the pond will in most cases prove a means of grace, and our freshman will be, on his emergence, a chastened candidate for citizenship in the wide world.

Religious provincialism is one of the greatest hindrances to Christian union. Those bodies which persist in a practical isolation are, naturally, the most inaccessible to the influences which are bearing together the great body of believers. Contact and cooperation are the remedies for bigotry and self-complacency. The cure for littleness is to see big things. "When I find myself growing conceited, I go out and take a look at the stars." There are two visions which will bring any sincere soul into the longing prayer for a united church,—the vision of the great, unevangelized, ravaged world, and that of the vast but broken army of those who, under different names but with one great, unselfish purpose, are moving to the world's redemption.

The Laundry

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THE Waggon of the Laundryman stopped at the door, and left a Package. And Keturah opened it, and checked up the Contents. And she said, Two of thy Collars are missing, and one Cuff; and thy Pajamas have lost a sleeve.

And I went unto the Telephone, and I said, unto the Maiden at the Laundry, I beseech of thee, send unto me the missing portions of my attire.

And she said unto me, Our manager is out; thou wilt have to see him.

And I went to the Laundry, and I entered it as the Manager entered. And I had in mind to say unto him that his service had grown Intolerable, and that he no longer cleaned Collars but Sharpened them and put Saw Teeth upon the edges of them, and that what Clothes he did not lose, he ruined.

And as the Manager entered, there came unto him one of his Assistants, who said unto him, The man at the factory saith that he cannot put in that Crank-shaft for Two Weeks.

And his Bookkeeper said unto him, The Driver of Number Three hath quit, for he had an opportunity to become a Chauffeur for Old Jones who liveth on the Boulevard; and how shall we deliver the Laundry on his run?

And the Forewoman in the Ironing Room said unto him, Saidee is home sick, and Fanny hath gone to the Movies, and Kitty hath sent word that she must attend her Grandmother's funeral, which is probably the Football Game; and two of the Machines in my room are shut down, and the people are kicking because they have not their clothes.

And the Telephone Girl said, We have complaints from the Families whose names and number I have here, and they desire that thou Call them Up and explain.

And he said, I will call them up, but it shall be some time in the Very Remote Future; I have troubles enough.

And other of his Assistants told him that they were nearly out of Soap, and that the people who sold Starch had sent word that they could not fill the order for ten days.

And I entered the Ironing Room, where many Women worked, and I heard them talking as they worked, and all that I heard them say was, And he said to me, and, And I said to him.

And I looked into the Washing Room, and there was Steam, and Suds and Sweat.

And the Manager greeted me with a Tired Look, as if he were to say, And what hast thou brought to add to my Troubles?

But I said unto him, I came to Complain of certain Lost Garments, but I forbear.

And he said pleasantly, Nevertheless, let me know thy Complaint, and we will endeavor to make it Right.

And we went to the Sorting Room, and I saw how the Girls sorted the Laundry, and I thought if any man did ever get what was coming to him, it would have been by Special Providence. And there was a Pile of Arms from shirts, and Legs from other garments, and many things beside. And I found the Arm of my Pajamas.

And I returned unto Keturah, and I said, I will complain no more concerning the man of the Laundry. He hath troubles enough, and I wonder that he doeth as well as he doth.

And I considered that it might be the same if I knew more of the affairs of other men concerning whom I have been impatient. And it may be that if men could look into the place in which I endeavor to do my part in Cleaning up the World, they would be more patient with me.

These Times

BUSINESS, after an orgy of profiteering, suffers the pains of the morning after. Education, for want of leaders, sags. Statesmanship, handed over to smooth-tongued politicians, disdains the legend of Washington and Lincoln. Religion, eclipsed by denominationalism, takes a back seat and awaits a "spiritual awakening." Art and Literature, losing their native cunning, endeavor to hold the attention of the newspapers by grotesqueries and gab.

In the meantime, the birds mate and sing, the young lambs dance, spring brings dandelions and dawn sprinkles gold.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

The Truth About Bolshevism and the Jew

By John Spargo

ANTI-SEMITISM, like every other form of race prejudice and hatred, is a dangerous menace to democratic institutions. It is a matter for serious concern that in this country, hitherto free from the worst forms of this evil, there should be so many conclusive evidences of a wide-spread organized propaganda of anti-Semitism. Not merely in justice to the Jew, but even more as a patriotic duty, in loyalty to our American institutions and ideals, we are in duty and honor bound to face the issues presented by this propaganda. Wherever and whenever anti-Semitism has appeared, it has been associated with reaction and oppression.

I.

In England and in this country the propagandists of anti-Semitism have revived the charge that there exists, and has existed for centuries, a world-wide secret conspiracy against Christian civilization. It is charged that the entire Jewish population of the world is organized, under the leadership of the ablest and astutest men of the Jewish race and faith, to bring about the destruction of all non-Jewish governments and the establishment of a Jewish World Government. It is alleged that Bolshevism, which we have regarded as a spontaneous outburst of despairing and desperate masses of men, is in reality neither more nor less than a part of this deliberate plan of the Jews to bring about the destruction of non-Jewish civilization and to erect a world-wide Jewish government, headed by a dynasty selected by an aristocratic Sanhedrin.

Fantastic and incredible as it is, this theory is implicitly believed in by a large number of people, both in this country and in England. Powerful newspapers in both countries are assiduously promulgating it; eminent preachers in the Christian church are preaching it from their pulpits; at least one of our multimillionaire industrial capitalists is backing the theory, and the propaganda of which it is part.

The principal "evidence" offered in support of the theory is a collection of documents of mysterious origin and more than dubious history. These documents, published under the title Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, are alleged to be parts of a report made in 1896, at a secret conference of Zionist Jews. I have said that the documents are of "mysterious origin and more than dubious history," and in justification of that characterization I submit the following facts: The documents were first published in Russia in the year 1905, in a book by a writer whose identity is unknown, but who signed himself as Professor Sergei Nilus. Who is Professor Sergei Nilus? Is that the real name of a responsible and credible writer, or is it the pseudonym of an anonymous coward, perhaps even of one of the "Agents Provocateurs" of the infamous Secret Police Department of the Government of the late Czar Nicholas II? We have a mysterious person to deal with; no responsible person in or out of Russia, has yet come forward to vouch for the bona fides of Professor Sergei Nilus.

WHO IS NILUS?

Nilus gives a brief autobiographic account of himself in the second edition of his work—1905. He says that he was born in 1862, of Russian parents who held liberal opinions, and that his family was well-known in Moscow, for its members were educated people who were firm in their allegiance to the Czar and the Greek church—which is not quite what a Russian means by holding "liberal opinions." He claims to have been graduated from Moscow University and to have held a number of civil service posts, all, so far as the specifications go, connected with the administration of the police and judicial systems. He went to the Government of Orel, where he became a landowner and a sort of petty noble. He entered the Troitsky-Sergevsky Monastery, near Moscow, he says. Although numerous efforts have been made in Russia to find this Sergei Nilus, none has succeeded. A number of persons have testified to the existence of Sergei Nilus, in each case referring to a different person, though the name is not Russian. I learned of two men, father and son, each bearing this uncommon name. First information led to the belief that the mysterious author of the protocols had at last been discovered. The father was about the right age, and was said to be a writer. Further inquiry elicited the information that he died in 1910, whereas our Sergei Nilus issued a new book (or a greatly enlarged version of the old one) in 1911 and repeated the performance in 1917. The anonymous editor of an edition of the protocols issued in New York toward the end of 1920 says: "A returning traveler from Siberia in August, 1919, was positive that Nilus was in Irkutsk in June of that year." Nothing is said to enable us to identify the traveler in question. Another report—also by a returned traveler—makes it appear that the Nilus who was at Irkutsk is the son of the man who died in 1910 and himself too young to fit the autobiographical sketch referred to. I may add that an edition of the protocols is reported to have been published in Kishinev in 1906, the name of the author of the book in which they appeared being given as "Butmi de Katzman." I repeat that "no responsible person in or out of Russia has yet come forward to vouch for the bona fides of 'Sergei Nilus.'"

II.

Nilus gives conflicting accounts of the protocols. According to his first story, told in his book, Nilus came into possession of these documents in 1901. They had thus been in his possession about four years before he published them to the world. Now, mark this fact, which seems to me to be of more than trifling significance: The first edition of his book was published at Solotarevo in 1903, after the documents had, according to his story, been in his possession for two years, yet in that edition of his book not only were the documents not published, but no extracts from them were published. It is strange and mysterious that in 1903 the author should have ignored completely, after they had been in his possession for two years, documents to which, two years later, he was to attach so much importance. I should like to have the pleasure of questioning Professor Sergei Nilus upon this point, as well as upon some others.

The elusive and unknown Nilus tells us in this story of 1905 how he came into possession of the documents. He says that at the close of a series of secret meetings of the principal leaders of this secret Jewish conspiracy, which was held somewhere in Europe, a woman stole the documents from "one of the most influential and most highly initiated leaders of Freemasonry." He does not give any clue to the identity of the Freemason; he does not give any information concerning the identity of the woman. He does tell us, however, that the protocols were "signed by representatives of Zion of the 33d degree" but for what I can only regard as a mysterious reason, he does not make known the names of these "representatives of Zion of the 33d degree." Thus we have documents presented by an unknown and unidentified person, alleged to have been signed by unknown and unidentified persons of prominence, and to have been stolen from an unknown and unidentified Freemason, by an unknown and unidentified woman, handed by some person unnamed to the unidentified Nilus, and by him published to the world. If this chain of evidence, taken from the book itself, does not justify what I have said above concerning the mysterious origin and more than dubious history of the documents, then I do not understand elementary English.

NO EXACT INFORMATION

It is worthy of note that Nilus does not present a photographic copy of as much as a single page of the alleged protocols in the original. He tells us nothing about the originals beyond what I have reproduced in the foregoing paragraphs. He does not tell us, even, in what language the original documents were written. He does not claim to have set eyes upon the original manuscript, nor does any other known person. Nilus tells us, in so many words, that what he received in 1901, from the unnamed person, were not the original "stolen documents," but what purported to be accurate translations of them. He says, "this document came into my possession some four years ago (1901) with the positive assurance that it is a true copy in translation, of original documents stolen by a woman from one of the most influential and most highly initiated leaders of Freemasonry." Nilus does not pretend to have made any investigation of the story told him, or to have taken any steps to verify the "translation." For all that he knew to the contrary, the "originals" may have been entirely mythical and nonexistent, and the alleged "translations" impudent forgeries. Nilus does not tell us, even, that the person from whom he received these documents, which, if genuine, are of such transcendent importance, was known to him to be trustworthy and reliable.

This is a pretty thin story, so thin indeed that in 1917 Nilus came forward with another version, which claims our attention. In January, 1917, shortly before the Russian Revolution that is, this author whose personality is such a mystery, published another edition of his work so enlarged and changed as to be virtually a new book, called It Is Near, At the Door. The book is a violent diatribe against the Jews. On page 96 of this later work Nilus says:

In 1901 I came into possession of a manuscript, and this comparatively small book was destined to cause a deep change in my entire viewpoint as can only be caused in the heart of man by Divine Power. It was comparable with the miracle of making the blind see. 'May Divine acts show on him.'

This manuscript was called, 'The Protocols of the Zionist Men of Wisdom,' and it was given to me by the now deceased leader of the Tshernigov nobility, who later became Vice-Governor of Stavropol, Alexis Nicholaievich Sukhotin. I had already begun to work with my pen for the glory of the Lord, and I was friendly with Sukhotin because he was a man of my opinion, i. e., extremely conservative, as they are now termed.

Sukhotin told me that he in turn had obtained the manuscript from a lady who always lived abroad. This lady was a noblewoman from Tshernigov. He mentioned her by name, but I have forgotten it. He said that she obtained it in some mysterious way, by theft, I believe. Sukhotin also said the one copy of the manuscript was given by this lady to Sipiagin, then Minister of the Interior, upon her return from abroad, and that Sipiagin was subsequently killed. He said other things of the same mysterious character. But when I first became acquainted with the contents of the manuscript I was convinced that its terrible, cruel, and straightforward truth is witness of its true origin from the 'Zionist Men of Wisdom,' and that no other evidence of its origin would be needed.

This second story comes pretty close to convicting Nilus of being an agent of the Czar's secret police. Sukhotin, from whom he claims to have obtained the manuscript, was a notorious anti-Semite and leader of the Black Hundreds. Sipiagin, who is mentioned as having also had a copy of the manuscript, was also a bitter anti-Semite and one of the most infamous of the late Czar's bureaucrats. He was assassinated by Stephen Balmashev in 1902. Thus, if this story is true, Nilus is linked up in a very definite way with the secret agencies of the old regime. At the same time, it is worth while noting that Nilus names Sukhotin and Sipiagin only when they are dead and beyond questioning. He presents no evidence to substantiate his tale. He has "forgotten" the name of the "noblewoman from Tshernigov." Criminologists would deduce from these two stories that the author belongs to a well-known criminal type.

Now mark two other interesting facts in connection with this story of 1917: The first is that Nilus omits the statement made in 1905 that the protocols were "signed by representatives of Zion of the 33d degree." The second is that having told us in 1905 that the friend who gave him the protocols in 1901 assured him that they had been "stolen by a woman," and told us in the 1917 version that the friend from whom he received the documents was Nikolaievich Sukhotin, who told him the name of the woman thief, which, however, he managed to forget, he tells us in the epilogue of 1917 that the protocols "were stealthily removed from a large book of notes on lectures." He says: "My friend found them in the safe of the headquarters office of the Society of Zion, which is situated at present in France."

Was ever liar more confused? First we have an unknown woman stealing the documents from "one of the most highly initiated leaders of Freemasonry"; next, we have the documents presented as having been obtained by Sukhotin from a "noblewoman from Tshernigov" whose name Nilus has forgotten; finally, we have his friend—i. e. Sukhotin—named as the thief! The woman thief disappears and the "highly initiated Freemason" disappears. It is Sukhotin who is the thief and he steals the protocols from a safe in Paris. So much for Nilus. I may add that I am assured—though I cannot vouch for the statement—that Sukhotin was not outside of Russia between 1890 and 1905.

III.

Here is a significant circumstance connected with the literary activities of this Jew-baiter: His first publication of the alleged protocols took place in 1905, at the time when Russia was seething with revolution. The publication of his second book, with the revised story, took place in January, 1917, when Russia was again seething with revolution. It is as clear as daylight that the literary activity of this conscienceless tool of the Black Hundreds had for its object the creation of anti-Jewish uprisings to divert the minds of the Russian people from revolutionary agitation. It was a backfire. The canting piety is merely the familiar camouflage of the Black Hundreds.

This, then, is the history of the Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, about which so many good people have become excited, and upon which rests the theory of a world-wide conspiracy to establish universal Jewish dominion. It would be an insult to the intelligence of my readers to subject this history to further analysis or to make any argument to discredit the value of the documents as evidence. Yet, the documents are seriously regarded by many people of apparently normal intelligence. They are solemnly discussed in clubs, on trains, and wherever men and women congregate. They are written about by influential journalists. They are preached about by some of the foremost Christian divines in America. All of which, I respectfully submit, is evidence of the extreme gullibility of most of our human kind. Phineas T. Barnum understood the limitations of the mentality of the average human.

When I was in London in October, 1920, an English journalist of distinction, well-known and influential on both sides of the Atlantic, sought to impress me with the importance of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. He was convinced that the documents were genuine, and that they prove beyond reasonable doubt the existence of a world-wide Jewish conspiracy. He sought my cooperation in defense of what he called "Anglo-Saxon civilization," which he seemed to regard as synonymous with Christian civilization. He was astonished when I directed his attention to the fact that a French writer, Louis Martin, had published, as far back as 1895, a book in which he attempted to prove the existence of such a world-wide Jewish conspiracy. My friend honestly believed that the existence of this conspiracy had never been known or dreamed of prior to the publication of the work of Nilus. He was still more surprised when I told him that in his book, L'Anglais Est-Il Un Juif?, Martin had attempted to prove that the English people are part of the Jewish race, and that the British Government is the principal directing power of the conspiracy; so that the world-wide Jewish conspiracy must, according to Martin, be understood as a secret compact between the British Government, as a Jewish organization, and the leaders of Jewry in all other lands. Thus the theory of a Jewish conspiracy is reduced to absurdity. At the time I was not aware that in the original Russian of the book by Nilus this absurd theory of Martin had been reproduced but carefully omitted from the English translation for the obvious reason that it would make a laughing stock of the whole protocols. The omission of this passage from the translation, without any reference to or explanation of the liberties taken with the text of Nilus, seems to me to place those responsible for the translation upon a plane as low as that occupied by Nilus himself.

Prayer For Victory

L ORD, not for light in darkness do we pray,
Not that the veil be lifted from our eyes,
Nor that the slow ascension of our day
Be otherwise.

Not for a clearer vision of the things
Whereof the fashioning shall make us great,
Nor for remission of the perils and the stings.
Of time and fate.

We know the paths wherein our feet should press,
Across our hearts are written thy decrees;
Yet now, O Lord, be merciful to bless
With more than these.

Grant us the will to fashion as we feel,
Grant us the strength to labor as we know;
Grant us the purpose, ribbed and edged with steel,
To strike the blow.

Knowledge we ask not—knowledge thou hast left;
But, Lord, the WILL—there lies our bitter need;
Give us to build above the deep intent
The deed, the deed.

JOHN DRINKWATER.

"G. K. C."

By Joseph Fort Newton

SIR JAMES BARRIE, who is a citizen of fairyland and a broker in dreams, tells us that genius is "the power to be a boy again at will." He ought to know, having never lost the key to that enchanted land where nothing but miracles ever happen. If that be so, when G. K. Chesterton—whose visit to America is at once a religious and a literary event—is a great genius, because, like Peter Pan, he has never grown up at all, and never will. His point of view is that of an eternal Boy playing leap-frog, when he bends over and looks at the world from between his legs. Familiar scenes are strange and fantastic, but in a world that is up-side-down most of the time, like the world in which we live, that is the only way to see things straight, much less to keep our sanity.

That is to say, Chesterton is a mystagogue, and his intellect is a wonderland of perpetual adventure. Small wonder that he made a stir when he suddenly appeared twenty years ago, big of mind, burly of body, with a shock of black hair, puzzlingly brilliant and ridiculously happy. It was as if a cocoanut had rolled into a village of peanuts. The decade called "the eighteen nineties" was a deadly dull time, when boredom had become a fine art and the inverted cleverness of Oscar Wilde was mistaken for wisdom. It was like the hour before tea in an English country house, when the essence of good manners is to conceal a yawn. Now a yawn, as Chesterton defines it, is a silent yell, a suppressed desire to smash something. He could endure it no longer, and burst into explosions of rollicking laughter. Young men made old and gray by a wisdom that was not wise, sceptics who thought it clever to deny God, cynics, pessimists, decadents—the whole scene filled him with inextinguishable laughter. It was a laugh for which to thank God, like the ringing laugh of Carlyle at the shams and mud gods of his day.

A NEW PHENOMENON

Nobody likes to be laughed at. It is disconcerting, not to say humiliating, and when men turned to see who was laughing so unaccountably, and what reason there was for such explosive mirth, they discovered a new phenomenon. Here was a man who, in the midst of uncertainties and agnosticisms, affirmed his faith in God—not timidly, not tentatively, but triumphantly, uproariously. The glib sceptics, said Chesterton, think they are clever, whereas they are not half clever enough. From that day to this the neat, smug rationalism of our day has had no more implacable foe, and his blows fall like those of the Black Knight in Ivanhoe. In an age of disenchantment, when men feel that faith is bankrupt and heaven empty, he is an elemental voice proclaiming the truths which are eternally new, yet more ancient than the skies. He is a great Irrationalist to whom the world is an incredible fairy tale, because he believes in an incredible other-world which gives it meaning and mystery. He has been described as a "reactionary idealist," that is, a man who in the midst of revolutionaries has reverted to the normal; the protagonist of a sane, healthy, happy life, declaring and defending the rights of men, and, above everything else, their right to believe in God. He is a great humorist doing a serious work in a funny way, confounding the solemn and terrifying the timid. In short, he is a man who has discovered that Christianity is the secret of sanity no less than of sanctity.

TWO AND TWO MAKE FOUR

It was through a little book of poetry, called "The Wild Knight," that Chesterton first became known, followed by his life of Browning which for swiftness and sureness of insight has no other like it. Then he began to use a big stick on "The Heretics" of the age, such as Ibsen, Tolstoi, Shaw, Moore, Kipling, Nietzsche, and the rest, each astride a hobby-horse—heretics all, because they neglected, or imperiled, or dealt lightly with the central interests of the human soul. After this sparkling book he set about to write his own autobiography, which he called "Orthodoxy"—one of the most glitteringly brilliant books in our language—portraying the mental gyrations by which he made the astonishing discovery that right is right, that God exists, and that two and two make four. It tells how he rebelled against the rebels, doubted the doubters, and found that Christian faith is the essence of sanity and right reason. The book is almost too dazzling, with an incessant, fatiguing brilliancy which "makes you dig for dullness as for hidden treasure." His one little play called "Magic," which is a kind of theological fairy story, is really a dramatized version of "Orthodoxy"; and the two together make a great work, striking at the very roots of disbelief in our day.

Perhaps the greatest story Chesterton has written is "The Ball and the Cross," showing that reason must make friends with mysticism if it is ever to find the highest truth. It is the story of a fight that is never finished between a Highland Catholic and the editor of "The Atheist," a red haired Scot who located his shop at the bottom of Ludgate Hill, as if to counteract the influence of St. Paul's Cathedral. The duelists symbolize rationalism and mysticism in eternal opposition, the faith of the atheist being simple and complete, like a circle, and therefore false; while the faith of the Christian is a paradox, like the Cross. Life, for Chesterton, is at heart a paradox, and however much we may reason about it we must keep that fact in mind if we are to keep our sanity. Light and shadow, good and evil, fate and free-will, love and death—they are equally evident and equally impossible of harmony. Of that fundamental paradox the Cross is a symbol—not a mystery revealed, but a revealed mystery.

There is a mystery in life which is like the sun in the heavens, a victorious invisibility, at once a blaze and a blur. It is typified by the Cross, which is a collision and a contradiction, but whose arms open to the four winds and are the sign-posts of free travelers. Rationalism, on the other hand, is a circle, a ball, a cramped infinity, a thing complete and therefore untrue. It is too simple to be true, lacking the healthy mystery and expansiveness of truth. It is typified by the oriental ball, or by the moon, "the mother of all lunatics to whom she has given her name." The Ball cannot long remain a perfect sphere; under strain it becomes a spheroid. But the Cross is a strain and a struggle in itself; it stands erect above the world—incapable of defeat because it is defeat. Thus, by using symbols as old as man, the mystic teaches us a truth still more ancient—that truth is infinite and no man can confine it within a system. Any man, whether he be Calvin or Haeckel, who seeks to make that dimness lucid by his logic closes the circle of thought and shuts out vast expanses of truth. Beware of the man who puts truth into a nutshell—for of necessity his truth is no bigger than a nut. So long as we have mystery we have health and sanity of soul; destroy mystery and we become morbid, bigoted, exclusive, cruel. An eternal mysticism keeps man sane, as the night with its awful depth of stars gives him rest.

PARADOX AT THE HEART OF THINGS

So Chesterton, by using fantastic allegory and rollicking paradox, is only expounding the Gospel of Christ—which is a series of startling paradoxes. It speaks of the happiness of those who mourn, of the incredible might of gentleness, of the strange poverty of the rich, of the exaltation of the humble. It tells us that the first shall be last and the last first; that if we would save our lives we must lose them; that if we would rule we must serve; that babes are wiser than sages; that death is the beginning of life. It asserts that old men must be born again; that pity is stronger than power; that it is more blessed to give than to receive; and that nothing is more relentless than the mercy of God. Logic is helpless in the presence of such paradoxes, but the soul is strangely happy and sane. Happy is the man who begins and ends his thinking at the Cross—no matter how far or how fast he may journey—for there he finds the center where light and shadow, justice and mercy, love and death meet. There the infinite woos the finite into its mystery, difficulties cease to be doubts, and the incredible becomes true.

Such is the message of Chesterton, but so bald a manner of stating it gives no inkling of the prodigal richness and fantastic joyousness of his exposition of it. If he talks in paradoxes, it is because, knowing that life itself is a paradox, he cannot do otherwise. For the same reason he explodes absurdities with the keen thrust of humor, since the only sensible remark about an absurdity must of necessity be a humorous remark. What he said of Dickens is equally true of himself: "He had to be ridiculous in order to begin to be true"; and no one has written of Dickens with more complete insight and understanding. Of his work as critic, poet, essayist, journalist, and politician, others may speak; my wish is to celebrate him as one of the most wholesome and inspiring religious influences of our day—an influence making for health, sanity, and joy, rebuking alike a morbid piety and a morbid doubt.

ALWAYS AN ADVENTURE

Chesterton is not simply a personality; he is an institution. He is like one of the forces of nature, and must be reckoned with by all who would estimate the possessions of our age. His great, rejoicing, aggressive faith is not only a tonic amid so many pale uncertainties and misgivings. It is a challenge to all who are weary of the thin fancies which pass for profound thinking, and wish to return to the robust faith which has its roots in the revelation of God and the unfathomable soul of man. A Chesterton book is always an adventure. It is like Alice in Wonderland; no one can tell what will happen next. If it is illogical it is all the more true, because life is illogical—and those who live by logic are in the asylum. When he asked "What's wrong with the world?" he took a little girl whose golden hair a school-doctor had ordered cut off, setting her "in the midst" of a topsy-turvy world:

I begin with a little girl's hair. That I know is a good thing at any rate. If other things are against it other things must go down. For her I will set fire to modern civilization. Because a girl should have long hair, she should have clean hair; because she should have clean hair, she should not have an unclean home; because she should not have an unclean home, she should have a free and leisured mother; because she should have a free and leisured mother, she should not have an usurious landlord; because there should not be an usurious landlord, there should be a redistribution of property; because there should be a redistribution of property, there shall be a revolution. Her hair shall not be cut off like a convict's. The winds of the world shall be tempered to that unshorn lamb. All crowns that do not fit her head shall be broken. She is the human and sacred image; all around her the social fabric shall split and fall; the pillars of society shall be shaken, and the roofs of the ages come rushing down: but not one hair of her head shall be harmed.

So a little girl becomes the parable and purpose of all reformation, and the inspiration of the fight for a better world order. Always it is so with Chesterton. With him it is no abstract theory, no doctrinaire scheme, but the concrete human reality that counts; and it is this concreteness of mind that he brings to the service of all the sanities and sanctities of life. His gigantesque levity, his flamboyant common sense, are the outbursts of a human sympathy and a bravado of faith which are worth more for the health of the world than tomes of philosophy. Let us hope that the visit of Chesterton will help restore the sense of humor in America, the loss of which explains much that has been done and said in the last two years.

The Demotion of Death

By Lloyd C. Douglas

THE world was old, weary and jaded before there was vouchsafed to the race, through the words and deeds of Jesus, that which would dispel the gloom of life at the point where the shadows had ever rested most darkly. The Hebrew prophets spoke of death—when, rarely, they spoke of it—as a mystery too vast to be encompassed by human thought or phrased in human speech. The spiritual leaders of other peoples rose to their very highest points of faith when expressing the vague hope that the soul might persist. But all men walked uncertainly as their slanting shadows lengthened toward the east. Solemnly did they respect their obligation to preserve the bodies of their fathers, hoping that their children would deal no less considerately with theirs—but, beyond the sepulchre, there waited nothing more than was comprehended by an undefined wish.

Thus, life lacked the buoyancy, the zest, the zeal, the urge, that came upon it by way of his spiritual contribution who has become known to the civilized world as Master and Lord. Not until he came was victory proclaimed at that part of life which surely is the most important of all parts of it! Not until he came did the soul become the motive power of life; lasting through all changes; superior to all changes; containing an indestructible spark that was as supreme over the body as the body was supreme over its clothes!

Consistent with his own belief, this man of the vision splendid went to his own death with a serenity that made them marvel who had been so disinterested in his tragedy that they gambled for his robe. Not a tremor was in his voice as he declared, to his sorrowing disciples, "Let not your heart be troubled. In my Father's House are many mansions." Not a trace of agitation in his tone, as he remarks to the tearful crowd that lined his way to the Hill of Golgotha, "You need not weep for me! If you will weep, let it be for yourselves and your generation." Ah—to what heights did the evolving soul of humanity arise, that afternoon, when he hung, dying, to whom death was but a guide to a land uninvaded by sorrow!

FROM ENEMY TO WARDER

From that day, there has been growing up, in the souls of men, a new and peculiar kind of spiritual courage that has demoted Death from his erstwhile position as enemy of mankind, to the office of warder at the gates of a city which only they regard with dread who have become so infatuated with the material things of life that they know that when they leave these things, they leave their all!

There is no human happiness at all comparable to that of "walking fearlessly." One may truthfully speak of this new spiritual courage as the finest grace of the evolving soul because it permits men to travel unafraid even of the valley of the shadow. What significant gains, in this field, have been registered even in the past three or four decades. I am not an old man, but I have seen marked changes in the attitude of my own generation toward the mysterious agency that men call death. I can easily recall the most obtrusive and painful emphasis that used to be placed upon all the somber trappings, significant of mortality, when a house had been bereaved; the hysteria; the uncontrolled grief; the tightly-closed shutters; the whispers of the neighbors as they tip-toed about through the gloom; the long-drawn-out cruelty of funeral rites, and the too often harrowing effect of their words who had been called in to offer official comfort; and to whom a funeral, where no mourner fainted under the soul-racking discussion of loneliness on the one hand and worms on the other, was very poorly executed, indeed. And do you not remember the shock as you used to hear the heavy spadefuls of clods spattered upon the pine box lid, as a grisly accompaniment to the ancient words of the committal service—that almost incredibly dismal and despairing rite which even the heathen in their blindness would probably repudiate as an awful thing to do!

HIGH SPIRITUAL COURAGE

Little by little that which is mortal has abated its erstwhile interest for him who has lost his dearest friend; and gradually the whole event is being invested with the spiritual and immortal.

The home of bereavement is, more and more, emulating that high spiritual courage which Christianity teaches. No other person is so aware of this as the minister, to whom this fact is increasingly made manifest. Whatever may be the peculiar advantages of our profession, none is so fraught with great value as the opportunity we have to see how other people conduct themselves in time of trouble! Of course, the layman knows something about this. He stands by his best friend, in an hour of trouble; and sees, that day, a glimpse of the radiant glory of the human soul in one of its high moments—and the remembrance of it will outlast all the other observations of his life! This may happen to the layman, once, twice—a few times, perhaps—in a life time. In our business, such revelations are so frequent that they come to be classed as "all in the day's work." I do not mean that we ever get used to it, or that the frequency of such experiences dulls our consciousness of the absolute grandeur of the human soul, when empowered by this high spiritual courage; but we see it so often that we understand it is not a rare gift, bequeathed to an occasional, rare spirit, but rather that it is a sort of built-in capacity of the normal soul!

And—sometimes—when I see the way that men and women are able to go under fire; and accept the losses of the very dearest possessions of their lives; and how they face, with a sense of victory and mastery, bereavements that fairly tear up the intricately knotted affections of years—smiling through it all—I stand in a kind of reverential awe before this virtue that lifts men out of the category of terrestrials and shows them to be sons of God!

Not infrequently, we are called into consultation by some person whose days are numbered. Here one needs expect to find no cowardice, no whimpering, no hysterical rebellion against an unfriendly fate; but a type of courage that makes one marvel at the superb possibilities of the human spirit when confronting destiny with the heroism of faith. And if we would do our congregations an estimable service, we might tell them something of our experiences and observations—just to hearten them for their own vicissitudes. Surely this is much better than to be everlastingly bombarding them with the indictment of cowardice and faithlessness.

A few days ago, I talked with a man who had—just that day—been given notice. He was a man of forty. The surgeons had just informed him that his case was inoperable; that he had, probably, three months to live. He told me about it with no more agitation than if he had been informing me of a trip he expected to make, early in March, to some foreign country. There was no sigh of resignation; no repetition of the phrase "Thy will be done!"—which is so often the plaint of the passively despairing—no queries why a good God could have permitted this thing to come upon him. He had just one problem: how to make the very most of the next ninety days! How to get the most out of them; how to put the most into them!

And he made me proud, that day, that I was privileged to be of the same order of Nature as he. I told him so. I felt myself fairly shaken with emotion as I realized myself standing in the presence of a soul so fine-grained, so endowed with spiritual courage, that it could meet a crisis—the Crisis—with such poise and serenity! In the light of such experiences, I know that there is latent in the human soul possibilities still undreamed of. We are in a process of spiritual evolution. We have come up from crude beginnings, and we have attained to a grandeur of spirit that stirs us deeply whenever we contemplate these vast soul-gains! It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He shall be made clearly manifest to us, and we see Him as He is, we shall be like Him!

VERSE

Idols

STILL the blind heathen bow to wood and stone.
Christians have grown
More clear-sighted in idolatry:

Great calm ideals of worth rule Christian earth.
Moloch, Minerva, Mammon, worship we.

Deploring force, we hold the very bold
Succeed, who force with greater force can brave.

Knowledge the answer seems to all our dreams:
Nature, by knowledge, grows our willing slave.

And gold—be money sordid as it may.
Even the churches have to pay their way.
Mammon has cities, argosies, and gold,

Moloch doth hold

The might of armies and all enginery.

Minerva, half-divine, gives clear-cut, fine
And godless science to her ministry.

By transmutation strange they interchange
Their natures. Gold makes knowledge possible;

Knowledge grows power; then Power gives men
To gather gold wizardry terrible.

Moloch, Minerva, Mammon, one in three,
Rule millions who deny God's trinity.

Yet they are false gods. They shall not endure,
For great and pure

The Living God sendeth us life and death.

Our cherished idols be like the false three Frog-things unclean born of the Dragon's breath.

Knowledge and Force and Gold cannot withhold
The dying from the great uncharted wastes,

Nor stay the flood of souls that pours and rolls
From the Unknown and to the Unknown hastes.

Death conquers idols; but, by Jesus' love,
Crosses confute the graves they rise above.

Moloch, Minerva, Mammon, all shall die.

No one shall try
To garner pearl and gold within the gates
Of gold and pearl: till force has run its course
God's calm Omnipotence impassive waits:

And Science has no power to rule the hour
When everyone shall know as all are known.

The false gods three shall fall and perish all.
Meanwhile the true God rises from the Throne,

The Living God we did not love nor fear,
The end of His long patience draweth near.

LOUIS TUCKER.

IMPRESS of lightest things—
Small hands impressed

Upon my breast,

A tiny head

Upon my shoulder laid—

These things

Where fallen empires only leave a stain.

Be Not Afraid

BE not afraid. There is no harm
Can come to those who trust

The God who rules both wind and wave,
Whose laws are kind and just.

Be not afraid. Where'er thou art
His love is with thee still,

And all things in the end bring good
To those who do His will.

Analyzing the Bigelow Analysis

LAST week we showed the temper of the Rev. Mr. Bigelow's attack on the Interchurch Steel Report. It will be illuminating now to analyze his analysis. Whatever effectiveness is possessed by this document is not in its argument or its basis of fact but in its wide circulation by Judge Gary as an "answer" to the Report. It has been sent to tens of thousands of ministers and other moulders of moral judgment who will never read the Report itself, carrying the suggestion of bias and radicalism. Then it is so characteristic of the type of argument used by the apostles of industrial autocracy and the critics of "reformers" that it serves as a "horrible example." Judge Gary calls the address "splendid" and Mr. Bigelow thinks the president of the Steel Corporation "is very kind to have it printed and circulated," because "there must be a lot of abler men whom you might have easily commandeered to voice the truth." In my opinion, the Judge would have found it difficult to "commandeer" a more thoroughly ex-parte defense than this, though doubtless a skilled attorney would have dealt more with facts and less with derogation of the Commission.

The "Mistakes" of Collective Bargaining and Mediation

Our crusader for the corporation's rights against the rebellious action of its employees first accuses the commission of beginning its task with a blind espousal of "collective bargaining." To this a plea of "guilty" is entered, excepting only the word "blind." It is the blind who refuse to recognize the democratic right of labor to collective bargaining. When the relations between employee and employer were simple and personal, every man bargained. But now that personal bargaining is impossible and capital organizes collectively, either the bargaining must be collective or there is no bargaining. Mr. Bigelow and Judge Gary refuse to recognize a laboring man's right to bargain at all—he can "take it or leave it" and the employer will "hire and fire" at will. The commission, along with all other dispassionate and disinterested students of labor problems, including the government's War Labor Board and many of the great employers themselves, are convinced of the necessity and righteousness of the principle of collective bargaining. The keenest and most discriminating critics of labor union tactics do not defend the labor policies of the United States Steel Corporation.

Next, the commission is criticised as making a "serious blunder" in its offer to "mediate the strike last December 5." "It was a proposal simply absurd," because Judge Gary had refused "six separate and vastly more serious appeals," including one by the President of the United States. Believing it the business and privilege of Christian men to mediate between fellow-men at strife the commission listened to an offer of the strike leaders to accept their verdict as mediators without condition. They had studied deeply into the strike situation and were prepared to go deeper. They were in process of consulting both sides and were eager to get franker and more open statements from the employers than the customary direction to "see Mr. Gary." But above all they could not as a church commission refuse any offer from either side to use their good offices to stop the waste and bitterness of industrial warfare. They did not "offer" to mediate. Frankly they did not deem it worth while after the President of the United States had been turned down, but they could not refuse when asked to discharge so Christian a function. Mr. Bigelow seems not to believe in Christian mediation when masters of corporate industry are concerned.

Attorneys for the Unions, Not Investigators

In none of the four heads under which our advocate of the monarchical privileges of corporations seeks to undo the work of the commission does he deal with the issues at stake; in them all he derogates the commission itself. Of course readers of the Report will judge for themselves as a basis of judgment. In his book Mr. Foster says the commission was unfair to labor. Mr. Bigelow charges that they ignored "the unjustifiable buccaneering practiced by the A. F. of L." But they could not ignore what did not exist. For this "mistake" they are scornfully pilloried as "altruistic champions of human rights" and transfixed with these triumphant words: "Indeed, if I mistake not, every one of our Interchurch Commission belonged to that select band of our sainted (Washington) Gladden." Dr. Gladden, he says, "stirred up thousands of our fellow churchmen and social reformers to denounce the Standard Oil Company" for just such "buccaneering," and behold upon what weak and inert Elishas his mantle has fallen! They "condoned the uncriminal violence of the A. F. of L." But remember, gentle reader, they did not "condone" the criminal violence of the state constabulary which their brave critic passes by in silence.

As "prosecuting attorneys" he finds "the squint of judgment that disabled them illustrated clearly in their diagnosis of the reasons for the strike." He says they questioned five hundred steel workers carefully and talked with leaders on both sides and reached the conclusion "naively confessed" but "truly amusing" that the cause of the strike lay in hours, wages, the control of jobs and "the manner in which all these are fixed." Those were the facts. Why pray are facts so "truly amusing?" Judge Gary and the Senate Committee said it was the question of unionization. In every paragraph of the commission's "Summarized Conclusions" (page 11) in the "Findings" (page 246) and in the headings of five of the seven chapters of the Report that same conclusion is reiterated and emphasized by the Commission. Back of this demand were the questions of hours, wages and control of jobs.

The Rev. Mr. Bigelow's Defense of Garyism

Not the least interesting phase of Mr. Bigelow's philippic is the interlining throughout of his defense of Garyism, as steel's labor policy is now so commonly denominated. If it is a good and benign policy, as both he and the Judge assert, "enabling the workers to get more pay without increasing the costs to the public" and delivering "the poor workman" from "arbitrary treatment under the operation of labor union conference" then Mr. Gary is immortalized by the characterization. The "under-cover" system, to use the euphonious term of the corporation, is defended with amazing candor in these words (page 22): "Can any one doubt the wisdom, justice, and necessity of the spy system on the part of the United States Steel Corporation in sheer self defense?", i. e. defense against Mr. Foster's strike tactics. The fact that the spy system was old and experienced before Mr. Foster came on the scene need not affect this logic, nor should the further fact that no other great basic industry uses it impair the defense. The commission thinks the spy system un-American, undemocratic and quite Germanic, regretting deeply as it does to differ with its critic. The twelve hour day is not frankly defended in so many words but no word of reprobation for it is uttered and the commission's protest is called "the hobo's doctrine." "Reducing the hours of labor to the lowest practicable point" is an industrial creed that "glorifies leisure and denounces toil." The reverend critic cries out in wonder "how could it ever be advocated by a confessed follower of the ceaseless toiler of Galilee." He defends long hours with a sacrilegious quotation of the Master's words "My Father worketh hitherto and I work" and glorifies the corporation for "the freedom afforded some strong and industrious men more nearly to fulfill their capacity for work and to reap a corresponding reward."

The commission is severely condemned for mentioning wages, the bromide about preachers receiving less than the wage workers is offered for answer, and derogatory comparison is made of wages received in the navy yards. On pages 265 and 266 of the Report will be found very adequate comparative tables of the wages of common labor, the class on strike. In every case, excepting only the railroads and the navy, common labor receives a larger hourly rate than in steel and in the navy it receives 1.7 cents less per hour than in steel. While navy and Railroad men work 48 hours per week the average for steel is 74 hours. We commend to Messrs. Rockefeller, McCormick, McAdoo and all other benighted employers who have adopted and advocated shorter days and forms of representation in industry the defense made of industrial autocracy by this prophet of Garyism.

CORRESPONDENCE

Lincoln and the Temperance Reform

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Abraham Lincoln's name is illustrious as the Emancipator of chattel slaves. He is also entitled to a large place in the influences that have culminated in the 18th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. When the circumstances of his early life are considered, it is a remarkable thing that he was a life long total abstainer. In the pioneer days, of his boyhood life, almost everybody drank liquor and it was a time of wide-spread drunkenness. Shortly before he became President he told his friend Leonard Swett: "I never tasted liquor in my life." Robert T. Lincoln in a personal note to the writer said, "my father seemed to be absolutely devoid of the taste which is gratified by wine or liquor of any kind."

There is a tradition that his own mother early pledged the boy not to drink. His father, Thomas Lincoln, according to Mr. Herndon "had no marked aversion for the bottle, but indulged no more freely than the average Kentuckian of his day." Not only did he give the power of his example as a total abstainer, but in the Washingtonian movement became an earnest advocate of abstinence and the signing of the pledge.

There is no public address he ever made that gave him more personal gratification than the speech he made on Washington's birthday, February 22nd, 1842, and this speech is a permanent temperance classic. He also attended meetings in country places, and a number of people living after he became a man of note, made affidavits that they took the pledge at his hands. In his great speech he pleaded for kindness toward the drunkard, and the duty of the strong to help the weak and emphasized the moral side of the temperance reform. He also had a prophetic vision of the future when he said: "When the victory shall be complete—when there shall be neither a slave nor a drunkard on the earth—how proud the title of that land which may truly claim to be the birthplace and the cradle of both those revolutions that shall have ended in that victory. How nobly distinguished that people who shall leave planted and nurtured to maturity both the political and moral freedom of their species."

The liquor advocates have not hesitated to use the name of Lincoln in their campaigns to defend liquor drinking and liquor selling. They have declared that he drank liquor in face of his own statements, and overwhelming testimony that he was an abstainer.

When the committee from the Chicago Convention came to Springfield to give Mr. Lincoln the official notice of his nomination, his friends, knowing his opinions and practice, sent a supply of choice liquors to entertain the committee. They were returned and cold water was the only beverage served.

The enemies of prohibition have made claims that Mr. Lincoln was opposed to legislation to outlaw the liquor traffic. A message to the Negroes at Atlanta, Georgia, in the campaign of 1887 represented Lincoln as issuing a proclamation against prohibition. There is complete evidence that this message is an absolute forgery, and yet it has recently been used in England in the campaign against prohibition.

The Rev. Dr. Smith of Springfield preached a sermon in which he said "the liquor traffic is a cancer in society, eating out its vitals and threatening its destruction and all attempts to regulate the evil will not only prove abortive but will aggravate the evil." He declared that there must be "no more attempts to regulate the cancer, it must be eradicated." Mr. Lincoln signed a petition to have the sermon published, as "it would be productive of good."

After Mr. Lincoln had become prominent as a lawyer, he volunteered his services to defend some women at Clinton, Ill., who had smashed a grog shop that had sold liquor to their husbands in spite of their protest. Herndon said that at the close of his plea for the women he talked of the "ruinous effects of whiskey in society and demanded its early suppression."

Major James B. Merwin, founder of "The American Journal of Education" and known as a writer and speaker on educational and literary subjects says that he and Lincoln campaigned together for prohibition in 1854 and 1855, and spoke in Jacksonville, Bloomington, Decatur, Peoria and other points. In his speeches he denounced the liquor traffic as "the most blighting curse of our modern civilization."

On the day of Lincoln's assassination Major Merwin was a guest at the White House. He was to go as a special messenger from the President to Horace Greeley and others to enlist their influence in the employment of colored troops in the construction of the Panama Canal. After Lincoln had given the major the papers and instructions, he said, "Merwin, we have cleared up a colossal job. Slavery is abolished. After reconstruction the next great question will be the overthrow and suppression of the legalized liquor traffic and you know that my head, my heart, my hand and my purse will go into the contest for victory. In 1842, less than a quarter of a century ago, I predicted that the day would come when there should be neither a slave nor a drunkard in the land. I have lived to see one prediction fulfilled. I hope to live to see the other."

As President he endured much suffering from drinking generals, who caused several humiliating defeats. He issued several orders against the traffic in the army. A delegation asked him to take further measures for the suppression of the traffic. He told them that he was ready to do everything in his power and in his response said, "I think the reasonable men of the world have long since agreed that intemperance is one of the greatest if not the very greatest of all evils amongst mankind."

Mr. Lincoln's whole career, from the Kentucky log cabin to the White House gives him a foremost place in the great moral movement that has reached its climax in national prohibition.

Would Fight Britain to Free Ireland

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I sincerely trust that you will continue the open forum on the Irish Question, and discuss it editorially until it is settled right. We are very closely allied in religion and civilization with Great Britain, and if any one should point out to that rich and prosperous nation her cruel treatment of Ireland, the burden rests upon us. The atrocities in Armenia are not a negligible fact for America, neither can the suppression and devastation of Ireland be ignored.

In your editorial of January 13 you say, "We are quite willing to give passports to any of our citizens who want to fight for Ireland. We only wonder that they have not left long ago." Thanks. But perhaps, Mr. Editor, they will not need passports. The last time I sailed for Europe, I went on the good ship Calamaris, as chaplain of the 133rd Field Artillery. Uncle Sam paid my passage, looking after my passport, and the second Sunday out the Kaiser gave us an entertainment with the "U" boats, which had Billy Sunday as a circus beaten to a frazzle. The boys of our navy by the way also beat the Germans to a frazzle. Was the editor of The Christian Century home at that time, cheering the Red Cross women, and willing to give passports to men who stood for and were willing to sacrifice for the freedom of small nations? Mr. Editor, let us have a showdown.

In 1910, together with a distinguished New York clergyman, I was a guest of an M. P. in the visitor's gallery at the House of Commons. But even then the Irish did not see the sacredness of the king or the holy British Empire. On the question of voting additional sums to His Majesty, or some of his royal family, one Irishman, a distinguished member, asked why the king should stay on his job if his wages were not sufficient. At that same session an Englishman discussed the coming war with Germany. And Mr. Lloyd George, whose hair was black and whose eye was piercing, actually called a member of one of the most distinguished English aristocratic families, what Mr. Roosevelt called the short and ugly word. Lloyd George, who is now the uncrowned king of England, was even human in those days. He is more or less human today.

You say, Mr. Editor, that "the rest of the world" cannot afford to give Ireland the sort of independence that she is asking for. Why not? Who is the rest of the world? Is it we, who have English blood, who profess to follow Jesus, who said, "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you?" Is it the powers of the so-called League?

Did France help us to gain our freedom, and should we never return the compliment to another nation, if that nation is weak? Did we free Cuba from Spain? Should we only fight a weak nation like Spain, but the strong nation that has a large navy like England, ah no, (See Editorial, "Prolonging Ireland's Agony")—might makes right, and the English navy is too strong for us. Therefore let us carefully pass by on the other side of the road where thieves are stripping Erin, saving our wealth and lives to convert nations of heathendom to fight like Christian gentlemen, when they shall become civilized like us.

Does not the report of the British labor delegation place the blame squarely on the Lloyd George government for atrocities? And when that party has its great convention, there may be hope that they will stand for justice and right. Too much to expect from the church of England, which has generally been on the wrong side of every economical and social question, but not too much to expect from labor, at its best.

So the mills of the gods grind slowly. But in the grist is coming greater liberty for man. "The world is my country; all mankind are my brethren; To do good is my religion," said a great American who risked his life for freedom. He would be for Ireland today. Do you doubt it? Where are you?

Did Washington Really Say It?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Referring again to the remarks concerning Ireland attributed to Mr. Summerbell to Washington, does any one suppose that their occurrence in the Congressional Record of 1916 under the circumstances described is proof of their authenticity? Where did Senator Martine obtain the letters he asked to have read, and how may others verify them? Judging by the evidence of style alone, George Washington did not write the last of the three at all events. We are not now arguing the propriety or impropriety of the sentiment, but if Washington's authority is alleged for it some one should cite sources, n'est-ce pas?

A Spurious Appeal

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Mr. Summerbell's reply to my request that he give his authority for the pretended appeal of Washington in behalf of Irish independence, printed in your issue of Dec. 16, 1920, begins with a needless quibble and a mischievous piece of sophism.

MOFFATT'S Translation of the New Testament

THE author is recognized as one of the most distinguished living scholars of the Greek new Testament. His translation is notable for its apt usage of words as well as for its originality of thought. A new meaning is given to the old version which is supplemented and not supplanted. It is the only version which makes use of the recent discoveries in Egypt and the Holy Land. No Bible student's library is complete without this marvelous translation. It will elucidate difficult passages and call forth expressions of surprise, delight and gratitude. Its every phrase is a new text for the preacher and a new idea for the Christian layman.

The quibble and the sophism both pertain to his ascription of the "appeal" to Washington. In his letter of Dec. 16, after stating his descent from ancestors who served under Washington, he "dared" you to print "the following exhortation from Mount Vernon in 1788"; "Patriots of Ireland; champions of liberty in all lands! Be strong in hope! Your cause is identical with mine. You are calumniated in your day; I was misrepresented by the loyalists of my day; had I failed the scaffold would be my doom; but now my enemies pay me honor.....(more of the same tenor)." If this does not mean to say that Washington wrote this "appeal," what in the name of common sense does it mean? Would Mr. Summerbell have us suppose that the coachman, or perchance the field overseer at Mount Vernon, was addressing the "champions of liberty in all lands" in such language as this?

But now your correspondent, disclaiming "directly attributing it to the pen of Washington," finds another reason for admitting that he did so; namely, "on account of its noble sentiments, which I believe we all who are unprejudiced Americans endorse." One is entitled, of course, to believe what he pleases, but in what light does Mr. Summerbell's reasoning process now appeal? First, he "dares" the editor to print an appeal "issued from Mount Vernon in 1788"; next he thinks Washington must have been its author "on account of its noble sentiments which (he believes) all unprejudiced Americans endorse." Such reasoning would equally prove Washington the author of the Emancipation Proclamation or the Gettysburg Address; for do not these contain noble sentiments, and are they not endorsed by all "unprejudiced" Americans?

But to the main point of this spurious "exhortation from Mount Vernon." Mr. Summerbell states that he gave it on the authority of a publication of the association of Friends of Irish Freedom. It now appears that the document was circulated extensively for campaign purposes in the last presidential election. Its authority was challenged and its spurious character shown, facts which can scarcely be unknown to the secretary of the organization which circulated it. Yet when Mr. Summerbell appeals to him for his authority for the document, he contents himself with citing Senator Martine in the Congressional Record!

The truthfulness of your correspondent would seem to be fairly matched by the guilelessness of the secretary of the Friends of Irish Freedom in sponsoring this document upon such authority. When I wrote the letter printed by you on Dec. 23, I was ignorant of these matters. To settle the question authoritatively, I wrote Mr. Worthington C. Ford, editor of the Massachusetts Historical Society, asking what he knew about this "appeal." Mr. Ford is the biographer of Washington and editor of his works, and among historians is recognized as the greatest living scholar on the subject of Washington. In response he wrote, on Jan. 3, 1921: ".....The quotation was extensively used in the last campaign, and I was appealed to on the question of authenticity. I send you a copy of what I wrote, which I think will cover the ground. It is an absurd quotation on its face."

The enclosure, dated Nov. 19, 1920, is as follows:

"In reply to the question contained in your letter of Nov. 18, as to where an excerpt from a speech of George Washington may be found containing the words: 'Patriots of Ireland, be strong in hope. Your cause is identical with mine. Mount Vernon, 1788.'—I would say that such an excerpt cannot be found in any volume of Washington's writings or in any manuscript of Washington. It is a vulgar forgery on its face. The man would never have written in such language, nor has he ever used a phrase which could be twisted into such an expression. (Signed) Worthington C. Ford."

In my letter to you on Dec. 23 I stated the opinion that the "appeal" was of recent vintage and published for a purpose obvious on its face. I trust that this has now been made sufficiently clear to restrain all readers of The Christian Century from ever again connecting Washington with this spurious document.

Please Read Editorial Again

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I enjoy reading The Christian Century. The tone of the paper and the well-informed editorial comment are refreshing. Allow me to inquire why you object that Americans speak out against atrocities in Ireland. If you oppose war with England I second the motion most heartily, but surely we may uncover wrong-doing whether committed against Belgium, Ireland or Haiti? Why should we be given passports to Ireland? You did not suggest that those Americans who used good United States money to fight the Soviet government of Russia be given passports to Poland. It is true that those who oppose Russia by force of arms belong to the ruling class while those who oppose England by right reason belong to the common people. Surely that would be no guiding principle with you.

Answering Thomas Curtis Clark's "Poems for the Times"

(In issue of December 31)

THE churchmen moil in argument
And, quibbling, go through all their days.
They make them gods of littleness
And worship them in wordy maze,
Each boasting of his own true brood,
While Love hangs moaning on the rood.

Yea, Service still wears bitterness
While lust and power hold lordly place.
True, Wisdom still is scourged and scorned,
And maudlins spit upon her face.
But thrones, this day, are cheap as song,—
May not the Right be crowned ere long?

Man, think of this: a grain of dust
Is born of æons old and grey,
And shall a full orb'd human soul
Be formed and furbished in a day?
Somehow, forever, on and on,
As surely as the swinging spheres,
The Lordly Purpose moves along
To consummation down the years.

"Louder, Please!"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Through the kindness of one unknown to me, I have been receiving your paper for a number of months. It strikes me that you should strike out the word "Christian." I shall not subscribe. I have not one penny to devote to a paper that believes nothing, hits at fundamentals and stands for nothing. It may be all right from a literary standpoint, but it is all wrong from a Scriptural standpoint. I verily believe it is more given to infidelity than were the addresses and the writings of Robert Ingersoll. When I read it I become disgusted for the reason that I believe it is devoted to the destruction of faith in the individual heart. Put this into your correspondence column. I like you, but I despise your paper.

British Table Talk

London, January 4, 1921.

AT the opening of 1921 the outlook of organized Christianity in the British Isles is not bright. Practically all denominational statistics of membership show long-continued decreases. Many churches are all but empty. Sufficient funds to maintain existing organizations can only be obtained in too many cases by special efforts and "drives." Candidates for the ministry are lacking; college doors have reopened after the war, but few students enter. Most ministerial stipends are pitifully inadequate. Bishop Henson speaks of the inefficiency which is spreading over the parochial system like creeping paralysis, and states that some of the clergy are falling into debt and some sinking into private mendicancy. The "Guardian" reports that "the clergy are beginning to desert their vocation and adopt secular callings." The British pulpit of today cannot compare with that of a generation or two ago. Spurgeon, Alexander McLaren, Parker, Liddon, Knox Little, Dale, Donald Fraser, Oswald Dykes, Farrar, Wilberforce, Boyd-Carpenter, Stopford Brooke, Price Hughes, Marcus Dods, Ian McLaren, Sylvester Horne were most of them household words in British homes, and many of them were well known abroad. What names can be set against them? Clifford, that valiant knight of eighty-five; Dean Inge, who stings us into thoughtfulness; Jowett, who is temporarily laid aside; Canon Barnes, who is fearlessly expounding familiar "heretical" views; R. J. Campbell, whose once resonant voice now rarely travels far; Campbell Morgan, a world-wanderer who prefers not to stay more than five years in one pastorate; Dinsdale Young, who preaches regularly to one of the largest congregations in London, without non-churchgoing London knowing it; J. E. Rattenby, Price Hughes' successor, who would not dream of donning his armour; Orchard, whose strivings after Catholicism without the Pope achieve a coterie. The only preacher whose utterances the secular press gives much attention to is "the Gloomy Dean" of St. Paul's. No living Free Churchman has the ear of the world as had Spurgeon, Parker, and Campbell. Ask who now minister at the Metropolitan Tabernacle and the City Temple: the man in the street certainly could not say, and comparatively few Free church people know. Alas, there be few pulpit giants in these days. Many earnest men are laboring hard against greater difficulties than their predecessors had to contend with, and it would be cruel and unjust to depreciate their efforts. One kind of preaching never fails of appreciation and response—that of "living epistles." It is Dr. Clifford's personality and record far more than his utterances, wise and weighty though they be, that have won him the love and respect of countless hosts of people of all kinds and classes. Even if organized religion is decaying, signs are not wanting that unorganized religion is increasingly vital.

The Nonconformist Conscience

It is difficult to estimate the strength of the Church of England; for one thing, no statistics of membership are available. Its state-establishment, of course, gives it a great advantage. The existence of a disestablishment movement within the church is a sign of independence and virility: the disestablishment movement outside the church is dead. There is little doubt that during the last thirty years the Anglican church has held its own better than the free churches have done. Not only has nonconformity weakened internally but its reactions on the state are feebler than formerly. The press practically ignores its assemblies, and politicians now rarely trouble to read its pronouncements on national and imperial issues. Nonconformity is far less assertive and definite than it used to be on public questions, one reason being that it is less united. The "nonconformist conscience," which used to exercise salutary influence on public affairs, now rarely makes itself heard. Individual protests, by Dr. Clifford, Dr. Horton, Dr. Garvie, against reprisals in Ireland have been made, but the free churches collectively have been strangely quiescent. The recent demonstration at Kingsway Hall was organized, not by the Free Church Council, but by a journalist. At this meeting Dr. Garvie, who is an increasing power, denounced with equal vehemence Sinn Fein outrages and "Black-and-Tan" reprisals and severely criticised Lloyd George. On this occasion at least the authentic voice of nonconformity was heard. The political sympathies of the majority of free churchmen are naturally Liberal rather than Conservative, and before the war Lloyd George was their idol—they thought he was going to lead them into the promised land of religious equality, Temperance reform, social betterment. But now that he is so closely allied as to be practically identified with their historical opponents they are bewildered, disheartened, divided. The "British Weekly," which under Sir William Robertson Nicoll's brilliant and shrewd editorship has become the leading free church organ, has after occasional hesitations, become an unqualified supporter of Lloyd George, from whom many free church people have withdrawn their allegiance. After the Kingsway Hall meeting the "British Weekly" published a letter attacking Dr. Garvie (who, like Dr. Nicoll, is a Scotsman), saying "his spirit is as barbarous as his pronunciation." The next week another correspondent was permitted to renew the attack.

Striving Towards Unity

The first appearance of an Archbishop on the platform of the National Free Church Council will take place at its annual assembly at Manchester in March, when his grace of York will personally present to the council the Lambeth Appeal. The great difficulties that have to be overcome if Anglicans and free churchmen are ever to be corporately united are illustrated by an interchange of views that has just taken place between Archbishop Lang and Principal Griffith-Jones, an ex-chairman of the Congregational Union. Seeking to commend the Appeal to nonconformists, Dr. Lang pointed out that it was not a statement of terms and conditions, but the unfoldment of an ideal. The bishops, not accepting the view that the spiritual unity of Christendom was all that our Lord desired, hold (1) that as there was only one body of Christ there could be only one church, and (2) that unity already existed and was to be believed in and made visible. Dr. Griffith-Jones dissents from his grace's view that organic union is the only form of unity which is according to the mind of Christ, and confesses disappointment with the credal basis of the Appeal. "Our faith," he says, "we hold in common; the expression of our faith in credal form must be left to the free action of the soul of the thoughtful believer under the inspiration of the spirit of truth," and submits that a heartfelt confession of faith in Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior is all that is required for admission to the church. The committee jointly appointed by the Free Church Federal Council and the National Free Church Council after a preliminary meeting, including a conference at Lambeth Palace, is engaged in preparing, for presentation to the various denominational assemblies, a statement setting forth the principles in the light of which churches calling themselves evangelical and free may consider the Lambeth proposals for reunion.

* * *

Evolution or Revolution

Even more urgent than the need for ecclesiastical reunion is that for ending or lessening the estrangement between organized religion and labor. On both sides efforts are being made in this direction. Dr. Temple, Bishop-designate of Manchester, himself a member of the Labor Party, is pleading for closer connection not only between working people but the labor movement itself and the church, though not of course in a party sense that would in any way identify the church with a section against other sections. "The ideals of the labor movement as repeatedly formulated," says Dr. Temple, "are concentrated on the ideals of fellowship and brotherhood, which are Christian principles." "If," he adds, "the workers are not yet fit for the larger share in the control of industry which they demand, we must give them the requisite knowledge. Bishop Henson warns us that unless we can arrest the disease of discontent among the workers, collapse and disaster will overtake industrial society. Mr. George Edwards, M. P., of the Industrial Christian Fellowship, emphasizes the need for spiritual revival in the labor movement, else in struggling to ameliorate the lot of the workers it will become merely materialistic. In an introduction to a new edition of "The New State," by an American authoress, Miss M. P. Follett, Lord Haldane shows much sympathy with the aspirations of labor. The agitations for nationalization, better housing, higher wages and shorter hours are, he says, but the expression of the desire for the higher blessings of citizenship. He is impressed "with the moderation of the working classes when they are taken into counsel and trusted, even when they are suffering under hardships which they hold to be preventible." The Bishop of Sodor and Man considers that the choice before us is between evolution and revolution. Great social and economic changes are inevitable, we cannot return to pre-war conditions, the former things have passed away, the new conditions have come to stay. The immediate duty therefore is one of readjustment. The voice of the Church must be heard appealing for justice and fairplay, for righteousness and fellowship, for sympathy and brotherhood; in a word, for the supremacy of Christ in the industrial world.

The Rev. John Clifford, M. A.,
B.Sc., LL.B., D.D., LL.D., C.H.

It was announced on New Year's Day that His Majesty the King had been pleased to approve that two British citizens be appointed members of the Order of Companions of Honor—one being Sir John Ellerman, shipowner, and the other Dr. John Clifford. The degrees indicated by the first three sets of initials after his name he won (the second and third with honors) as a young man at London University; the others are honorary distinctions—the D.D. coming from Chicago University and an LL. D. from both New York (Colgate) and Manchester. It is doubtful if there is a public man today who has more admirers and fewer enemies than the veteran free churchman. His praise is not only in all the churches but in all decent circles. It was a graceful and fitting act to make some recognition on behalf of the State of his inestimable services to religious and social progress; the more so that he has never deviated by a hair's-breadth from his championship of high moral and often unpopular causes and from fidelity to principle. Only a few days ago he was served with his fifty-fifth summons covering a period of nineteen years for refusing to pay that portion of the local rate devoted to sectarian education. Unable, as hitherto, to answer the magistrate in person, he sent by his successor at Westbourne Park, Rev. S. W. Hughes, his written protest, in which he defined the "grievous wrongs against which we have protested for so many years," viz: "(1) clerical control in sectarian schools; (2) the compulsion of citizens to pay for sectarian propaganda through the rates as well as through the taxes; (3) the imposition of ecclesiastical tests for teachers; (4) the maintenance of sectarian colleges from public funds." For over thirty years Dr. Clifford has given an annual review of public affairs from a Christian standpoint. This year he chose as his subject "Through Struggle and Defeat to the Highest Internationalism" and was busy preparing his message when his doctor intervened, on the ground that his mental activity was retarding his complete recovery from his recent accident, and ordered him to "be still." The Grand Old Man of the free churches has at last admitted that he is "no longer young." But, thank God, there is much life, physical, intellectual, spiritual—in him yet, and I shall be surprised if sooner or later he does not deliver his soul on the Highest Internationalism.

R. J. Campbell
Restive

After four years in the Church of England, the late minister of the Cathedral of Nonconformity is showing signs of restlessness. For two or three years he has been vicar of a small church in Victoria Street, Westminster, and it is not surprising if after having for long been a national and indeed world figure he chafes under the constraint and detail of the life of a parish priest. It is announced in the newspapers that owing to the numerous demands upon him Dr. Campbell will probably resign his living and devote himself to preaching. When he assumed his present charge there was some hope and expectation that it would be but a stepping-stone to preferment, but although the Abbey is only at the other end of the street, it is not easy to make a path thither for an ex-nonconformist, however famous. As soon as Dr. Temple's appointment to the see of Manchester created a vacancy "Canon Campbell? From the City Temple to Westminster Abbey?" were newspaper headlines, and possibly by the time this letter has crossed the seas the interrogation marks may be omitted. A canonry would suit him admirably; for three months of the year he would be "in residence" at the cathedral to which he was attached, being free to dispose of the rest of his time as he thought fit. The Bishop of London has been conferring with Dr. Campbell, who has been his protege since he left nonconformity, and he may be depended upon to do all he can for him. The filling of the vacant canonry rests with the Prime Minister, and Mr. Lloyd George always consults the Archbishops before making ecclesiastical appointments. Many claims and considerations have to be carefully weighed, and it will be interesting to see what happens in the present instance. If Dr. Campbell is passed over this time, his services to the Church of England are not likely to be lost sight of.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

I Pray Thee Have Me Excused*

THIS lesson should be studied in connection with Luke 14:15 ff. One evening when Jesus was at a dinner a man, probably of an emotional nature, impressed by the personality of Jesus, suddenly cried out, "Blessed is he who shall feast in the Kingdom of God." He was right, it will be blessed. He suddenly penetrated to a vast truth. Jesus then proceeded to paint a picture of his kingdom using this theme of a feast. Jesus had one great interest—his rule over the hearts of men. He had one favorite theme—the Kingdom of God. By every good figure he sought to make that idea clear to his followers. It is a feast, a field, it is leaven, it is a pearl, it is a hidden treasure. One day he talks about laborers for his vineyard, another time he talks about the rewards of working. Work is necessary, reward is sure.

Josiah Royce called the kingdom of Christ on earth "The Blessed Community." It has been called many things, but this is perhaps best. One wonders how many hectic souls are left out; how many heresy-hunters and shibboleth-spouters would never come near this "Blessed Community" composed of the true saints—the Sir Galahads and the gentle spirits. Channing in one of his sermons casts a spell over us as he describes the glorious company of heaven—the great and good of all ages—the brave and chivalrous of all time—the sweet and the devoted since the world began and the morning stars sang together. No wonder the sons of God shouted—God is working out a sublime plan. It would seem that all Christians would be most happy to have all other Christians join in this heavenly company, but in every community today there seems to be an exclusive group. Such a group will not be happy in heaven unless allowed to live in a kind of annex, a place set apart for the orthodox. On earth they would not mingle with the good of other churches and how can they mix with them in heaven? Would it not be well to begin to get ready for heaven here on earth by a gracious acknowledgment of the fidelity and virtue of other Christians?

Our minds love to dwell upon the goodness and greatness of the "Blessed Community" here and hereafter. The wonder is that people can stay out of it, and yet people make all sorts of excuses for staying out. Anyone who has had much experience in trying to induce men and women to join the church can understand, in a measure, what Jesus had in mind when he related this story. "I pray thee have me excused"—Jesus faced that, we face it today.

The excuses also seem to fall into the same categories that Jesus found: Property excuses, recreation excuses and domestic excuses. If business interferes with religion the man gives up religion. Six days are not enough to labor and make money, men must needs run to the office on Sunday morning to open the mail. "You do not understand the struggle of modern business," men say to me, "the competition was never so fierce." Such men spend much of Sunday in bed. I have sympathy with some of these men—but not too much sympathy? Other men say that one cannot be a Christian and be engaged in their business. This is true in some cases. The action of a Christian ought to be as plain as day in this direction. I know a churchman who resigned rather than carry whiskey samples. The business excuse debars much time and talent from the church. Laboring men complain of the long hours and intolerant attitude of employers. Let us suppose that the second class of excuses comes from men with some recreational fancy. "I have bought a new yoke of oxen and must go and look them over." He was a lover of fine stock. This was not bad in itself but there was no reason why this should have kept him from the banquet. He did not want to go to the dinner—that was all. He was more interested in something else. This hits the Sunday golfer, the Sunday motorist, the Sunday visitor, the Sunday theatre-goer, the lover of Sunday games. Thousands of fine-appearing men are caught in this classification. The third group are the home-lovers, perhaps I should say, home-worshippers. As I walk along the streets in my part of the city I never cease to be amazed at the luxurious homes. What soft nests they are! And the tired business man comes home and relaxes selfishly in all this softness. Sunday means the papers, the long sleep, the fine cigars, the big dinner, a few choice friends to chat with, and a day of ease and rest. You see how insidious all of these excuses are, for what is better than business, than recreation, than home? Yet God is angry at all of these flabby excuses and he calls others to the feast. Many first shall be last and many last shall be first. Many plain, simple souls will have mansions in heaven while many arrogant souls will have huts there, if indeed, they have any place at all. And remember that if you shirk, the burden only crushes into the shoulders of another. You must carry your part. An excuse is a miserable thing. Examine your heart and see if you are saying in any department of church work, in any community reform, in any world obligation, "I pray thee have me excused."

BOOKS

THE SOCIAL EVOLUTION OF RELIGION. By George Willis Cooke. This is a very scholarly treatise on the development of religion through all stages from the tribal up to that of our Christian civilization. It covers various phases of religious organization, such as that of clan and tribe, the national, feudal and universal. It is as much an anthropological as a religious treatise as religion is found to be a social phenomenon that develops and keeps to the contour of the development of social forms and institutions. Its psychological and sociological aspects are found to be its characterizing features and its fundamentals best discovered through those approaches. Dr. Cooke finds that religious ideas and practices conform to the leading ideas of various periods in the evolution of human society and that there is much in common between all religions. One may not follow him in the syncretism of his conclusions but he will learn much from them and be given a broader basis for his own. If the book has any lack it is in the use of descriptive material. The reader finds himself wishing for the fascinating if voluminous descriptions of a Herbert Spencer as a foundation for the argument advanced. From the standpoint of social evolution religion is given a place that is primary. It not only takes on the forms and contour of the periods in social advance but it is one of the most powerful stimulants of that advance. Through such writers as Cooke and Kidd religion brings serious challenge to the materialistic school. (The Stratford Co. $3.50.)

PUBLIC OPINION AND THEOLOGY. By Bishop Francis J. McConnell. Bishop McConnell is not only one of the most courageous and prophetic religious leaders of our time but one of the most incisive thinkers and illuminating speakers and writers. In this volume he treats of the influence of public opinion and the changing ideas of the times upon theological conceptions and the terms of their expression. He brings us out of the nomenclature of the monarchy into that of democracy and from the static ideas of absolutism into the dynamic ideology of social progress. He does not deliver us into the hands of a "becoming" God or a "pluralistic" universe but he does reveal to us that our conceptions are subject to change and progress, and he brings theology down out of the dry bones of archeology and metaphysics and puts it into living symbols. His approach is social and human and he leaves us something yet to learn. For the preacher the book is full of sermon material. (Abingdon Press. 259 pages.)

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Presbyterian Growth in Liberality

The generosity of Presbyterians to their missionary, educational and philanthropic work is noteworthy. In 1870 the total benevolences of the denomination were $1,991,302. During the past year this total reached $17,079,548. Ministerial Relief has made the greatest gain of any of the Presbyterian interests during the past fifty years. The Board of Foreign Missions comes next. The membership of the churches has also made gain, though in smaller proportion than the financial receipts. Fifty years ago the church had 446,561 members. The membership at the present time is 1,637,103. Dr. John A. Marquis, of the Presbyterian Home Missions Board, has amused himself by figuring out what the Presbyterians will be like fifty years hence. He estimates the annual financial receipts at $74,836,873, and the membership at 6,008,175.

Cooperation in Vermont

The change of population in Vermont has forced consideration of some fresh allocation of Protestant forces in the state. In thirty-four communities combinations of churches have been made affecting Methodist, Baptist and Congregational churches. A little over a year ago a letter was sent out by Rev. C. C. Merrill, state representative of the Congregational organization, to get the facts from the various communities where these changes had taken place. It was found that in most of the communities more people were going to church. These people were not increasing in liberality, however, for the amount paid for pastoral support had decreased. Sunday school attendance did not show as much increase as church attendance, a fact that occasioned no surprise. Church membership has shown no increase, but this also occasioned no surprise, for the farms of Vermont are changing hands rapidly, and many immigrants from Europe and from Canada, of the Catholic faith, are buying these farms. This means a great decrease in the constituency of the various Protestant churches. The Vermont plan for meeting the problems of overchurched rural districts has commanded the attention of leading churchmen all over the country.

Dr. Carroll Pronounces Lutheran Union a Success

Dr. H. K. Carroll, the veteran statistician of the churches, has recently written an article on "The Year 1920 Among the Churches." In discussing the Lutheran union, he pronounces it a success in every way. The national organizations of three Lutheran bodies are now merged, and the merging of the synods or state bodies is proceeding rapidly. The leaders of the united Lutheran church have recently put forth a pronouncement on the subject of church union. They profess themselves willing to join with other churches in "works of serving love" but are conservative with regard to uniting with other organizations unless these measure up to the Lutheran doctrinal standards.

Opposition to Church Fairs Is Growing

The various religious denominations have devised methods of shocking their religious neighbors. Evangelicals used to give dinners and entertainments during Holy Week, to the scandal of the older communions, while Episcopalians sometimes encouraged Sunday baseball games and thus outraged evangelical sentiment. Lutherans have grown sensitive concerning the impression made upon their religious neighbors by their church fairs. Recently Rev. David G. Jaxheimer sent out a questionnaire to churchmen of various denominations. He has come to the conclusion that the selling of chances, the haggling over prices of bazaar articles and the giving of church dances are inexpedient. He has become a strong advocate of straight-out giving. Meanwhile the method by which he arrives at his conclusions is worthy of all imitation. Each denomination might learn a lot about the impression it makes upon the world by the questionnaire method. In the long run Christians of all names will hold sacred the sentiments and customs of Christians of other names. Thus the church will grow to oneness in Christ Jesus.

Missouri Movement Will Be Revived

The Disciples of Missouri had a successful movement afoot for raising two million dollars for church enterprises in that state when the Interchurch World Movement came along and absorbed it. At the close of operations a year ago the amount subscribed was $891,446.25. Of this money nearly half has been paid in already. Operations will be renewed in the near future, and it is believed that the whole amount can be raised. Rev. W. D. Endres is in charge of the movement. The funds will be distributed among the six educational institutions of the state and the state missionary society. Mr. Endres was formerly the field agent of Culver-Stockton College at Canton, Mo. This school will be one of the largest beneficiaries of the new fund.

Methodists Resent Cartooning of Ministers

The Roman Catholic church has long since protected the dignity of its priesthood, and woe to the journal which would print a cartoon that set forth a priest in an unfavorable light, or to a playhouse in which a priest was represented as a hypocrite. The Public Morals Board of the Methodist Episcopal church has recently taken cognizance of the liberties taken with Protestant ministers. The pronouncement reads: "On the stage and in motion pictures the Protestant minister is seldom represented as other than an effeminate fool. The members of the Protestant churches are exhorted to be liberal, to take humor and to be slow to wrath. But the members of the Roman Catholic church do not tolerate such treatment of their priesthood, which is always represented on the stage, as elsewhere, in a most favorable way, and whose religion is treated with consideration. The Catholics are to be commended. The time has come when Protestants should not tolerate any other than courteous treatment of their religion and ministry."

Ministers Opposed to Increased Armaments

The world outside the United States is greatly exercised over the question of armaments, and it seems to be generally agreed that the United States has the key to the situation. If the United States will agree to "a naval holiday," Britain and Japan would also agree. The Baptist ministers of Philadelphia recently passed strong resolutions on this subject. They said in part: "It is our duty as a nation to set a good example to the world and to reduce our armaments to the lowest practicable point. We entered the war with Germany with the avowed purpose of destroying militarism and so of lifting this menace from the world. Several things show that it is our duty at this time to take the initiative and join with other nations in bringing about general disarmament." This matter is being considered by other ministerial associations and the full strength of the church will be thrown on the side of peace and goodwill before the new administration has been brought into power.

Professor Peabody Urges Aid for China

Professor George Foster Peabody of Harvard University, noted authority in interpreting social Christianity, has started an agitation in behalf of China. He proposes that Congress should appropriate ten million dollars for Chinese relief and that an additional million should be appropriated for every hundred thousand dollars subscribed by private citizens. He calls attention to the fact that this would be only $2.50 for each person in the famine districts. Meanwhile Mr. Hoover's fund for central Europe is making headway, nearly three million having been subscribed in New York recently.

How a Minister Spends His Time

Laymen may still be found who think that ministers do not have much to do. These would do well to ponder the annual report of Rev. Elmer Ward Cole, who is pastor of Central Christian church in Huntington, Ind. In the way of public addresses, Mr. Cole delivered last year 107 sermons, 162 addresses, 59 informal talks, two out-of-town lectures, 25 after-dinner speeches and 83 funeral talks. In order to keep time from hanging heavy on his hands, in addition to this he officiated at 104 weddings, attended 450 meetings in the city and 108 meetings outside the city, gave interviews to 621 people, made 1,265 calls and traveled 9,009 miles. Besides his duties as pastor of the church, Mr. Cole has responsibilities in the welfare work of the Erie railroad. Probably no layman in Huntington worked as many hours last year as did Mr. Cole. He administers a church which has a budget of nearly fifteen thousand dollars a year.

Baptists Greatly Disappointed in Receipts

The southern Baptists did not cooperate with the Interchurch World Movement, but they put on their own financial campaign and raised in pledges ninety million dollars in a campaign in which they asked for seventy-five millions. Three-fourths of the first fiscal year following the making of these pledges is now up, and by this time according to the terms of the pledges there should have been paid into the Home Missionary Treasury $2,900,000. But there has actually been received only $415,000. The Baptist Home Mission Board has borrowed to the limit of its credit to meet contracts that have been made, and there is a real situation on. Pledges tend to grow more and more delinquent over a five year period. The experience of the Disciples in their Men and Millions campaign, of the Methodists with the Centenary fund and of the southern Baptists with their ninety million fund is uniform. It is easier to get the pledges than it is to collect them. National movements for big money under high pressure methods are not the last word in the financing of a religion.

Christian Endeavor Anniversary Is Approaching

The fortieth anniversary of the founding of the Christian Endeavor Movement will occur on the second Sunday of February. The movement began in the parlor of Rev. F. E. Clark, pastor of a Congregational church in Portland, Me. From that first gathering of the young people of a local parish the movement has spread until it has induced twenty million young people to take its pledge of loyalty to Christ and the church. It is estimated that at least one-sixth of the inhabitants of the United States have at some time been members of a Christian Endeavor Society. The Presbyterian denomination leads in the number of Christian Endeavorers in the United States, while the Disciples of Christ come second. In the world the figures are quite different. Outside of the United States the Methodists cooperate with the movement, and in the world field that denomination leads all the rest. The World Convention will be held in New York early in July. Frederick A. Wallis, commissioner of immigration at the New York harbor, is the chairman of the committee on program for that occasion.

Tithing Endorsed by Leading Denominations

The collapse of the Interchurch World Movement and the disappointments that followed the various national denominational campaigns for funds have created a situation at last when tithing is to have its innings. At least three great denominations will begin active campaigning for tithing following the Thrift Week which is being fostered by the various commercial bodies. The Methodists have a slogan "A Million Tithers in Methodism." The Baptists have a similar watchword, "A Million Tithers by 1922." The committee on tithing among the Disciples of Christ have set their goal as "Twenty-five per cent of the membership tithing." It is a higher percentage than the Methodists seek to attain, but not so high as the Baptist goal. A layman, Thomas Kane of Chicago, has persisted in agitating tithing as the method for religious finance, and if the method is finally generally adopted in the churches much credit will be due him for the unwavering persistence of his propaganda. The Disciples are making wide use of his literature this year.

Roosevelt Remembered in American Churches

The memory of Roosevelt is not dimmed with the passing years, but tends to grow brighter. Public libraries have had an unprecedented call this year for books on the great leader. The memorial day for Roosevelt was observed in many churches throughout the land. The churches of Evanston, Ill., joined in a great mass meeting taxing the capacity of one of the largest churches of the city, and ex-Senator Beveridge of Indiana delivered an eloquent address. Rev. E. E. Violette spoke feelingly of the great Christian statesman in a service in Central Christian church, of Kansas City. He said: "It would be too much to expect God to crowd a Lincoln and a Roosevelt into a single age. He must space the periods of a nation's life, and place his supermen as beacon lights along the way. Lincoln saved a nation from itself.

Noble Words Against Race Hostility

THE Jewish Advocate of Boston in its efforts at stemming the current of anti-Semitism features three letters in a recent issue, one from United States Senator Walsh, one from ex-President Taft and one from Dr. Peter Ainslie, minister of The Christian Temple, Baltimore. Dr. Ainslie's letter is so particularly worthy of both himself and the decent Christian point of view, that we publish it here:

"I do not hesitate to say that I am always glad to speak for the common rights of man, whether the man involved be a Gentile or a Jew. I have never had any sympathy with racial prejudice, and in my pulpit, where I have stood for twenty-nine years, there has never been uttered a phrase that reflected on the Jew, but on the other hand I have not hesitated to call attention to the injustice that has been shown the Jew throughout the centuries and urged my audiences never to let it be said of them that they were parties to such prejudice.

"Three of the most distinguished rabbis of Baltimore have spoken for me and recently one conducted a whole Jewish service from my pulpit. It was an informing and spiritual contribution that did much to remove prejudice. I live in a hotel where perhaps half of the guests are Jews. I find no distinction whatever in my relationships there and appreciate the courtesies from and fellowships with both the Gentiles and Jews. Some years ago I was the guest to dinner at a leading Jewish home in this city, where I was invited to speak to a club of university men on the Christian's interpretation of Jewish prophecy. I have had similar invitations from Gentiles, but I have never been treated with more courtesy than on this occasion. Our meeting, instead of closing in the early evening, passed into the midnight, with most pleasant memories to me. I might cite many other instances of actual experience to sustain my position that I am not talking on mere theory.

"As to the series of articles by Henry Ford in his Dearborn Independent, I am not interested in that kind of thinking. The world has had enough of it. Our prejudices are based largely upon ignorance and I am more interested in trying to discover the best in all races than pointing out the weaknesses in some, for God knows and we know too, that no race is free from its bad element.

"I am a Christian, and because I am a Christian I believe that all racial hostilities are anti-Christian, especially hostility against the Jew, for my debt to the Jew is greater than to any other race in the world. In the decoration of my church—the Christian Temple—the first names that appear in the dome of the auditorium are Abraham, Moses, David, Ezra, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Amos and Hosea. I regard these as much my kinsmen as I do those that follow them, namely, Peter, James, John and Paul.

"The persecution of the Jew in history by so-called Christians, which is perhaps one of the darkest pages in human history, is the most anti-Christian act of this Christian civilization. The continuance of that policy is likewise anti-Christian, irrespective of the high standing of those Christians who pursue that course. It is always a base denial of all that Jesus of Nazareth taught, irrespective of the Christian forms and ceremonies that cover the deception.

"With a larger knowledge of each other and an education upon a more humane basis I look for a more cordial relationship not only between Jews and Gentiles, but between all races, whose highest aims are to find God and glorify Him in their character."

Roosevelt saved a nation from internationalism. It is not an exaggeration to say that I could name a hundred men and newspapers that caught their inspiration for pure and untrammelled Americanism from the preaching of Theodore Roosevelt. And these disciples of a great patriot carried their message to the antipodes, saving America from internationalism (which, in the old world vernacular, means communism, nihilism, bolshevism), and may it please God, to help us save the world from that false, vain and imaginary political balm of Gilead!"

Privately Owned Baptist Journals Disappearing

Independent newspapers are disappearing from the southern Baptist denomination. They are being bought up one by one by the state conventions. The Christian Index represents the Baptists of Georgia. Recently the Baptist Courier published in Greenville, S. C., was purchased by the state convention for $25,000. The majority of the Baptist papers of the south are now owned by state conventions. The Baptist Standard of Dallas, Tex., is the organ of the Southern Baptist convention. This movement has been greatly hastened by economic conditions. The expense of publishing the papers has meant for the smaller journals the necessity of seeking subsidies.

Baptist Ministers Think Newspapers Promote Crime

The Baptists' Ministers' Conference of Chicago recently spent a session on the crime situation and passed a resolution pledging the association to oppose newspapers which unduly magnify crime stories. The resolutions asserted that one Chicago paper had printed fifty column feet of matter concerning a crime in the southland with many odious details calculated to debase the public morals. The resolutions were not all negative for it was resolved "that we note with pleasure that we have newspapers in our city whose editors do not thus luridly exploit criminals and their crimes, and we commend these newspapers to the Christian public of Chicago."

Divorce Question Agitates Kansas City

The break-up of families all over the nation is an evil which attracts the attention of serious-minded statesmen as well as ministers. It is proposed in Kansas City to establish a court of domestic relations and a movement is on foot making it compulsory that banns be published before marriage. The new bill to be introduced into the legislature provides also for a religious ceremony abolishing the justice court ceremony. The latter provision of the new bill has been opposed by Dr. Charles F. Aked, pastor of First Congregational Church. On the other hand, Dr. W. S. Abernathy, pastor of First Baptist Church, and Bishop Thomas F. Lillis of the Roman Catholic church favor the new proposals. The present attitude of ministers seems to be to attack the evil of divorce at its source which is believed to be the hasty and ill-considered marriage. The new bill proposed for Missouri would express this attitude in law.

This Minister a Community Man

In days gone past the church has sometimes been jealous of other forms of community organization, opposing lodges and holding aloof from clubs. The spirit is now different in many communities. Rev. F. W. Condit, pastor of the Disciples church in Kirksville, Mo., is touching life on many planes. He is popular among the students of the College of Osteopathy and with the Normal college students. He is vice president of the Kiwanis Club, and is Scout Commissioner of the newly organized Boy Scout Council. The Elks lodge called on him recently for the memorial address, and gave his discourse wide circulation through the printed page. In the meantime the church loses nothing, and gains very much through these community contacts.

Blue Sunday Laws Make Sermons Over the Land

The discussion of "blue Sunday" laws has not only taken much space in the secular press, but it has brought forth from the ministers of the country new expressions of opinion with regard to the Christian rest-day. For the most part the ministers favor a Sunday free not only from labor, but free from commercialized recreation as well. Dr. Charles F. Aked, pastor of First Congregational Church of Kansas City, believes the very worst reports about the proposed legislation and is opposed to it. He says: "When John Knox visited John Calvin one Sunday afternoon he found him engaged in a game of bowls. If Knox had taken off his coat and played at bowls that afternoon the religion of Scotland would have been sweeter for the next two hundred years. The Sunday blue law which is to be brought before Congress provides that no work shall be performed on Sunday, that no freight or passenger trains of interstate commerce shall move on Sunday, that no firm engaged in interstate commerce shall be allowed to do anything on Sunday, and that the mails shall not accept any Sunday newspaper. Battleships would go to the bottom of the sea, people would die for want of prescriptions, traffic would be tied up to the great confusion of the whole country. It was once argued that an egg laid on Monday should not be eaten because it was formed on Sunday. It would be as foolish to prohibit a Monday morning paper on such grounds. Yet the Sunday morning paper, against which the legislation is directed, is prepared for the most part, on Saturday."

Industrial Conference in Chicago

The labor situation in the country is troubling the minds of many thoughtful people. The large number of unemployed, the possibility of lower standards for labor and the consequent discontent are serious menaces. Labor radicalism and capitalistic selfishness are to be compromised by some Christian force, if the country is to move forward. Considerations such as these have led the Chicago Church Federation to call an industrial conference in Chicago for Jan. 23, 24. Dr. Worth M. Tippy of the Federal Council Commission on the Church and Social Service will be present throughout, and speak. Dr. Samuel Zane Batten of the Baptist Social Service organization will speak on "Practical Forms of Organized Cooperation."

Who Will Be Bishop of New York

With the death of Bishop Burch, the diocese of New York of the Episcopal church must face the task of selecting a bishop. It seems likely that the rector of some church within the district will be chosen and the three names most prominently before the convention will be Rev. Charles L. Slattery, rector of Grace Church, Rev. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity Church, and Rev. Ernest M. Stires, rector of St. Thomas' Church. Already Grace Church people are seeking to pledge their minister not to accept the honor if it is offered. The diocesan convention will be held on January 26.

Methodists Open Headquarters in Chicago

Methodist leaders have discovered that their chief constituency is in the middle west and that this constituency regards New York as quite remote. Hence the headquarters of the Council of the Boards of Benevolence is being moved from New York, and will open up in Chicago on February 1. The mission boards and the Book Concern will remain in New York for the present, but the pressure on these organizations to move also is increasing. Many forward-looking leaders believe that the religious capital of America will be Chicago within less than a decade.

American Lutherans Generous in Relief Work

During the past year the two principal bodies of Lutherans in America have been gathering funds for their unfortunate brethren in Central Europe. The United Lutheran church has contributed $2,000,000 and the Synodical Conference $1,500,000. The relief is administered by Europe by leaders of the Protestant churches, and largely for the relief of members of the Lutheran church.

Editor Offers Money to Increase Salaries

F. M. Barton, editor of the Expositor, a monthly magazine for ministers, has been carrying on a vigorous campaign in behalf of larger salaries for ministers. He criticized the 'Interchurch' World Movement caustically because it failed to include anything in its budget for underpaid ministers. In order to prove his sincerity, he has written to sixty ministers in Pennsylvania who have salaries less than $1,500, offering to contribute five dollars a year to their budget in case the salary is increased to $1,500 per year. Though the amount he offers is modest, he wants to prove that ever so small an offer of this kind may be used to start something in the parish that will lead to more comfortable living for the minister. There is also in the action of this editor a sly suggestion to laymen in Pennsylvania who are in more affluent circumstances than the editor is.

Moderator Puts Over a Big Deal

Dr. John Willis Baer is well known to the Christian public as the former home mission secretary of the Presbyterian denomination and ex-moderator of the General Assembly. In recent years he has given his time to business. The other day he formed a combination of four big banks in Los Angeles, Calif., which have combined resources of $130,000,000. Dr. Baer makes his home in Pasadena.

Half Fare for Some Ministers

During the war the matter of reduced fares for ministers was arranged through one office, and one clergy permit was sufficient. The coming year the ministers must face the old-time confusions with regard to clergy fare. In Missouri and Pennsylvania no clergy fares will be given for local traffic, but reduced fare tickets will be sold for interstate travel. In the Western Passenger Association, that is on lines west of Chicago and

St. Louis, a two thirds fare will be in vogue in most states, while in the Central Passenger Association the rate will be a half fare. In the latter association no clergy ticket will be sold for less than a dollar. The ministers of Illinois will need to hold clergy certificates in two associations.

Biblical Pictures in the Churches

The extension of moving picture service until it is now possible to secure good pictures on religious subjects has brought a change in the Sunday evening program of many churches. First Christian church of Springfield, Ill., recently had a "movie" night. "Blind Bartimeus" is now a very popular picture among the churches for Sunday exhibition, and warm commendations are being given it wherever it is shown. In many cases the churches have been able to support the new enterprise by the increase in the offerings. A Baptist church near Detroit during the past year received $325 more than the cost of the exhibitions. Sometimes the deacons are opposed to the innovation, but there are many interesting stories of their being converted to

A young woman leaving Washington wrote: "The beautiful, spiritual and inspirational services of the Sunday hours of worship in the Vermont Avenue Christian Church will always remain to me among the most precious memories of my eighteen months of service in Washington. I feel that many young people are returning to their distant homes with grateful hearts for the kindly, Christian spirit of welcome and fellowship we received in your church during the time we were trying to do our 'bit' for our country."

Your Hopes for Your Church

Often you have wished you could talk things over with someone who really understood a situation like yours.

Here is a study course directed by the most successful town and country church workers, with the privilege of personal correspondence with well-known leaders.

The lessons of the course include such topics as: town and country church problems; organization and finance; survey methods; religious education; worship, evangelism, preaching; special work for men, boys, women, girls, New Americans; leadership training; the new country church building; the church's obligations to the community; building the local church program.

Gifford Pinchot says: "The plan seems to me admirable."

A group of Home Mission Board executives at a meeting where the plan was presented, passed this resolution:

That this conference approves the proposal for a Correspondence Course on Town and Country Church Methods to be conducted by The Christian Work and earnestly hopes the plan may be inaugurated at once.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HYMNAL EVER PRODUCED BY THE AMERICAN CHURCH

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

FOR THE USE OF CHURCHES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

CONTAINS all the great hymns which have become fixed in the affections of the Church and adds thereto three distinctive features:

Hymns of Christian Unity
Hymns of Social Service
Hymns of the Inner Life

These three features give HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH a modernness of character and a vitality not found in any other book. This hymnal is alive!

It sings the very same gospel that is being preached in modern evangelical pulpits

Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is open. They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make a perfect hymnal.

the new method after it has been introduced into the churches. Hundreds are turned away from Atkins Hall, the auditorium of the parish house of Linwood Boulevard Christian church in Kansas City every Sunday evening.

Unique Preaching Service of English Methodists

John Wesley never had larger audiences than those which he addressed in Gwennap Pit, near Redruth. He says of one of these experiences: "In the evening I preached at Gwennap. I think this my ne plus ultra. I shall scarce see a larger congregation till we meet in the air." The Methodists of England have made an annual custom of holding a great service at the pit. Last Whitmonday Rev. J. A. Chapp addressed a great audience at this place, and the good old Methodist hymns were sung.

Rural Ministers Will Study Again This Summer

During the past year more rural ministers took systematic courses of study than in any previous year in the history of the church. Some of the denominations have met all of the expenses of the ministers in this connection. The United States government has seen the importance of the movement and has contributed to its success by sending lecturers and teachers. The instruction of these rural ministers has been not only in rural sociology and in agriculture, but in Bible study, homiletics, organized play and many other disciplines that are of importance in rural work. This coming year the instruction will continue under the general direction of the Home Mission Council. Prizes are being offered to the ministers who bring in the best samples of rural publicity.

Bishop' Last Service in a Reformatory

Bishop Burch, who died in New York recently, really gave his life that he might meet an engagement in Bedford Reformatory. He was to confirm the first class of catechumens that had ever been presented there. Although too ill to go, he persisted in keeping his engagement, and on the following day his illness assumed a serious form. At the confirmation service he spoke with animation and no one suspected that he was ill. The first flowers to be sent to the bishop's residence following his death were sent by the inmates of the reformatory.

Mid-Week Prayer Meeting Functions in This Church

While many churches have abandoned the mid-week prayer meeting, or carry it along wearily through habit, the mid-week meeting of Central Christian Church in Denver is more than a perfunctory service. It is truly the dynamo of the church. From 275 to 325 people gather for this meeting as the regular thing week in and week out, taxing the capacity of the room where the meeting is held. What this means to the church is seen from the statistics which the pastor, Rev. J. E. Davis, has issued recently. The church had 290 accessions to its membership in the past year and the Sunday services fill the great auditorium of the church.

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

Dr. Ainslie, Editor of The Christian Union Quarterly and a pioneer in recent movements for the attainment of unity in Christendom, deals here with the "Necessity", "Growth" and "Outlook" of Christian Unity. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the Church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power.

The Productive Beliefs

By Lynn Harold Hough

THE chapters of this book constitute the "Cole Lectures for 1919" delivered by this brilliant preacher, and ex-president of Northwestern University. The message of this volume is sorely needed in this time of transition and crisis. There is today a profound desire on the part of multitudes for a satisfying, productive faith. They want this faith stated in a definite and understandable way. This book meets the demand. The reader who delights in keen, meaningful sentences will sit up nights with this volume.

Of Dr. Joseph Fort Newton the American Journal of Theology says: "It is a striking fact that from a town of the Central West, whose very name is unknown to England, a preacher should have been called to the City Temple, London, a pulpit made famous by Joseph Parker and Dr. Campbell. Mr. Newton is a mystic, but of a different type. He goes back of the long line of doctrinal and ecclesiastical development to Jesus of the Gospels, to the ideal human life in whom God dwelt and through whom God revealed his redemptive love, the divine Saviour and Master of men. This life of the living Christ, touching every life, the soul of every redemptive movement, actually working in men and with men for the world's salvation. His sermons speak especially to cultivated minds, yet through their simplicity and naturalness and humanness, they make the universal appeal. Here is the real power. They do not speak the language of the church, but the language of humanity. They are real sermons of a warm, spiritual, enthusiastic manhood."

Dr. Newton is one of the favorite contributors to The Christian Century, and his books are particularly popular among our book-loving constituency.

The New Jerusalem

By Gilbert K. Chesterton

Author of "Heretics," "Orthodoxy," etc.

CHESTERTON, English poet, essayist, dramatist, philosopher, prophet, critic, champion of religion, is now in this country. He says the two things on earth worth seeing are America and Jerusalem. He has visited Jerusalem and now he comes to see America—especially Chicago—and to tell this New World what he saw in Old Jerusalem, and to prophesy somewhat concerning "The New Jerusalem."

When a short time ago the world was thrilled by the news that British troops had entered Jerusalem, visions of unheard of possibilities opened up before the minds of millions. Palestine in Christian hands! What new act in the historical drama was about to open? Egyptian, Roman, Saracen, Turk—and then, perhaps, the Jew restored. Is this what is meant by Zionism? Gilbert K. Chesterton went out to see. This book, which resulted from his visit, is a spiritual journey, and it presents a reconception of the meaning which Jerusalem and its unique history has for the world today. Mr. Chesterton discusses the world-wide movement of Zionism and the position of the Jew, contrasts the ideals of Mahomet with those of Christ and devotes most interesting chapters to his impressions of Jerusalem today. In pages full of penetrating observation he sets before his readers an historical pageant that begins with Christ and comes down through the Crusades to our own time. Full of Chestertonian humor, this book is of deep interest at this hour of world-readjustment.

It may safely be predicted that this newest book of Mr. Chesterton will stir more discussion than any previous work of his. Every minister and every layman interested in modern religious movements, as well as every person alert to genuine literary achievement, will wish to possess this book.

A Prayer on the Threshold of the Lenten Season

BLESSED CREATOR, who dost order the cycle of the seasons so that nature is ever appealing to us with new solicitations of opportunity, of discipline and of reward, quicken in our hearts a response to the gracious promptings of these earnest Lenten days. With our neighbors and brethren we desire, in a spirit of humility and inquiry, to bring to Thy feet our spiritual possessions that we may estimate them anew in the light of Thy judgment. We have been careless and have trifled with our stewardship. We have slept while Thy battles were being fought. We have lost the path whose way is marked by the prints of our Savior's feet. Tempted by unrealities and follies, our lives have become complex and tangled, and the farther we go the more distraught are our souls and the more unsatisfying our contacts with experience. Restore to us, O Lord, the divine simplicities that are in Jesus. Set our feet again in the way of comradeship with him. In the morning may we find on the beach a fire of his kindling, and at the end of the day may he come in to sup and to abide with us. As never before, may we realize in our hearts his living presence by our side. Save us from thinking of him as a dead fact of an ancient past. Save us also from the benumbing of tradition and orthodoxy. May we walk with him expectantly. Shatter our conventional opinions and surprise our hearts with fresh disclosures of what our friendly Master means to us and to mankind. Show us the secret of his calm strength, his graciousness and his joy, that we may be set free from the petulance and bafflement in which our nerves and wills are held.

And may these days of self-searching and spiritual adventure be days rich in blessing for Thy whole church throughout the world. Give to each disciple the inspiring sense of fellowship with all Thy children in the quest of holiness, of understanding and of practical ways of service. Upon those who counsel and lead us in the things of the spirit send particular tokens of Thy blessing and guidance. And as Thy people find along the Lenten path the deeper values of fellowship with Christ, may they find also a richer fellowship with one another, a fellowship so spiritual and catholic that all differences of creed and sect shall seem but as the dust of the balance. We pray in the name of our Lord Jesus. Amen.

The Pope and the Y. M. C. A.

PROBABLY the encyclical of the pope on the Y. M. C. A. was never intended for the press of the world. It was such good copy, however, that journals all over the world have printed it. An issue has been raised by this encyclical, and it seems likely that the verdict of the world will be that his holiness has given yet another proof of the lack of that infallibility which is supposed to attach to his office. It is well known that the Y. M. C. A. when invited to begin work in Catholic countries made every concession to the religious feelings of these countries. Though a large part of the "Y" personnel was made up of young ministers, these were not sent into Italy. The "Y" was satisfied to carry on during the war as the chore-boy of the allied armies. Whenever a soldier could be released for duty at the front by the taking over of some menial duty, the Y. M. C. A. stood ready to accept this duty. In the days following the war the funds of the "Y" have been applied to humanitarian and similar work in many of the war-ridden countries of Europe. The marvelous efficiency of the organization has kept men even in Bolshevik Russia where the Red Cross does not go, and in other countries where the life of the secretary is anything but a rosy dream. The work in every case is to be described as humanitarian, but with ethical motives. As for Protestant dogmatic instruction there was none. There was no Protestant evangelism, though the "Y" does that kind of work in the homeland. And yet the pope must have had some ground for his encyclical. That a new attitude toward Protestantism is dawning in some papal lands is the likeliest explanation of his having spoken. The best of all propaganda is the unconscious propaganda of consecrated lives. Without intending it, the Y. M. C. A. may have been the precursor of a European reformation in religion.

The Magicians and the Spiritualists

FOLLOWING the war there was a great increase of interest in spiritualism in England, and the tidal wave of interest reached America. The public libraries reported "Raymond" by Sir Oliver Lodge among the most-called-for books. Spiritualistic meetings grew in size, and so-called spiritualistic churches sprang to sudden influence and power. Since, the nemesis of spiritualism has arisen in an unexpected quarter. The magicians have been watching the physical phenomena of spiritualist mediums. They offer to duplicate any phenomenon ever seen in a spiritualistic meeting by perfectly natural means. So the magicians are going over the country and performing before even larger audiences than the spiritualists have had, and with most convincing results. These magicians are entertainers. They declare themselves opposed to fraud and superstition. At the same time they indulge in no dogmatism. They do not deny that communication might be set up with disembodied souls. They confine themselves to a duplication of the familiar physical evidences of such communication. Meanwhile the superiority of ethical Christian faith may well be preached. The spiritualistic medium always represented the denizens of the spirit world as people of subnormal intelligence. In "Raymond" we read of puerile occupations. One could hardly read "Raymond" without recalling that ancient Greek who said, I would rather be the slave of a poor man on earth than king of all the realms of the dead." Our evangelical view of immortality sets forth the idea of progress in the soul's life, and makes immortality really desirable. As the years pass the Easter hope of the gospel will hardly be displaced by the dreary shades of a spiritualistic hades.

A Labor Cooperative Bank

THE first cooperative labor bank in America was organized November 1st in Cleveland, primarily by the railway brotherhoods, with Warren S. Stone, Grand Chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, as president. It has $700,000 of paid in capital. In seventy-seven days this had been increased to $1,000,000 capital with $100,000 surplus and the bank had more than $4,000,000 deposits on its books. It limits dividends to 10 per cent, pays 2 per cent on checking deposits, 4 per cent on time deposits and will pay all earnings over the 10 per cent maximum back to the depositors. This means genuine cooperation. With many banks making from 20 per cent to 90 per cent profit on capital stock there should be a real depositors' dividend. A wealthy flat owner came to Mr. Stone asking for a loan of $110,000 on a large apartment which furnished ample security. He revealed the fact that he intended to raise his already high rents, yielding him 12 per cent until they would pay him 15 per cent. The Chief Engineer bank president immediately replied, "Then you cannot have this loan." The man asked what that had to do with a bank's making a loan. The answer was that it had nothing to do with the banking business, perhaps, but that this bank was not organized for mere business alone; it was founded for a human purpose, and so long as it had its present president it would serve no such purposes as that. Later a school teacher who supported a mother and an invalid sister came for a loan of $200 to provide for an operation for the sister. She had been refused at seven banks because she had no property. Her character and reputation and position were looked up. She was found to have a long and useful record as a teacher. She was given the loan on her honor and character. This may not be good banking, as the world sees it, but it is about the best kind of humanity men can practice, and it will pay even in banking in the long run.

The Religious Future of the Jew

THE zeal of the first disciples of Jesus was turned, naturally, in the direction of converting the sons of Abraham. The records indicate that the efforts of the early church in this direction were in a degree successful, particularly among the Jews of the dispersion. When in the middle ages the church adopted a program of persecution, Israel was confirmed in her racial consciousness. It is not only a racial peculiarity that has made the Jew survive through millenniums of wandering: he has been confirmed in his attitude of separateness by his foolish enemies. In America the other thing is rapidly coming. While evangelistic propaganda has signally failed among the Jews, the fact remains that thousands of them are finding their way into Christian churches, as a careful examination of city populations reveals. Most metropolitan ministers know of Jewish members of their churches and of Jewish children in the Sunday schools. From these ministers certain facts may be ascertained having a bearing upon the possible gradual absorption of Judaism into Christianity. Not ten per cent of the Jews are any longer connected with synagogues in large cities. In some smaller cities there are hundreds of Jews and no synagogue at all. Since men do not live long without religion, these "unchurched" Jews are finding new altars. Many of them have gone into Christian Science, for there the offensive symbol of the cross is entirely removed, with no reminders of it either in baptism or the Lord's supper. Jews now intermarry with Christians, and these mixed marriages nearly always result in a Christian program for the education of the children. A Jewish parent who is anxious to break through the social stigma of race, sends his children to Sunday school. Few of the adults will ever be Christians, but in many cases the children will. Whenever the church goes out consciously to "evangelize" the Jew, it meets failure or meagre success. When the church treats the Jew democratically as just one of the many sons of God, the middle wall of partition is broken down.

A Better Record on Lynching

THE year 1920 shows a much better record on the matter of lynching. There were sixty-one as against eighty-three in 1919. The south still holds the unenviable record of staging all but eleven, but the decrease was all in the south. Negroes were the victims in fifty-three cases, which is, of course, the explanation of the south still holding the unenviable record. In other words, lynching is associated more with racial clashing than with peculiar depraved social impulses of any particular section. Were the race relationships reversed the north would no doubt succeed to the title. With a decrease of about 25 per cent for the country as a whole, the decrease in the south was more than 40 per cent. Fifty-six attempted lynchings were prevented by the resistance of officers of the law and forty-six of these instances were in southern states. Thus in other sections there were eleven lynchings with ten defeated by the officers, and in the south there were fifty lynchings with forty-six thus defeated. Where men of the same race are concerned it is quite customary for law officers to take summary and drastic action; it is to the credit of southern law officers that they are doing the same thing in the case of men of another race and color. Georgia leads all the states, but Georgia has done several strange things in the past year, notably elected one of the worst haters in the nation to the United States Senate. South Carolina had only one lynching and North Carolina only three. The Carolinas have reacted from the Cole Blease sort of thing. When Mississippi and Georgia repudiate the Vardaman and Watson type, the better citizens of those fine old states will feel themselves represented both in the nation's councils and before its laws. The "rough-necks" will lynch so long as the "nigger-hater" wins in politics and has the prestige of political success to back his public speech and influence.

Fellowshipping the Community Church

THE average rural community and small town is grossly over-churched. No denominational apologetic can blink that fact. There are simply not enough people in these communities to support all their churches in any program except one of helpless inefficiency. Denominational efforts to build up these weak churches are sheer waste unless it is hoped to use home mission funds to promote a competitive struggle for survival among those on the ground. Some of the overhead agencies propose trading, that is, one will give way to the other in one community if the other will reciprocate in another. This method has some promise in those communities where no one cares much about which denomination he belongs to. But in almost every community there are those who might unite with a non-denominational church but will not surrender their own for that of a church of another denomination, and in no case does this plan offer hope where there are other churches than the two primarily concerned. There is a decided tendency among the awakened farmers and villagers to ignore the outside denominational machinery and unite with their Christian neighbors to give the community a real church. In the west, in both the United States and Canada, this movement is strong. The time has come to urge the importance of giving recognition to these churches through either the Federal Council or through the denominational agencies themselves. It is sinful to hold denominational loyalty so taut that thousands of small communities can have no working church with the support of connectional affiliations because sectarian lines forbid neighboring Christians to work and worship together.

Unity Via the Mission Field

AN observer at the annual meeting of the Foreign Missions Conference at Garden City, Long Island, January 18-20, could not possibly have gone away without carrying vivid impressions in his soul. The program itself was a revelation of the breadth of view and sweep of the missionary movement, and of its unparalleled significance in the making of a better world. Underlying all the discussions was the clear conviction that the whole missionary enterprise rests upon the power of Christ to transform personal character. But it was seen with no less unmistakable clearness that such inner change must inevitably express itself in the building up of a worthier social order. The importance of agriculture in missionary activities, the development of an educational program for the peasant masses of India, the building up of a Christian literature, the working out of various types of social service in non-Christian lands—these were some of the topics that engaged the attention of the responsible leaders in our missionary task. Particularly striking was the address of Robert Woods, of the South End Settlement in Boston, who, as a result of his recent observations in the Orient, spoke with unrestrained enthusiasm of the great social value of foreign missions, even as now carried on with inadequate resources of both men and money, and urged that they should expand to include a trained social worker in the staff of every important station.

But beyond the particular features of the program, the fact of the Foreign Missions Conference itself and of its past history is of great significance. It is the oldest cooperative organization in America built upon the principle of bringing together official denominational agencies. For more than a quarter of a century it has been a needed meeting ground for the discussion of common problems, for studying the conditions that all the boards alike had to face, for the interchange of information as to plans and for the development of mutual acquaintance and understanding. Gradually it has become, also, through its Committee of Reference and Counsel, an agency for doing many things that can be better done together than in separation. The cooperation thus established among the foreign mission boards pioneered the way for the building up of similar organizations in the home mission and the educational fields, and was a factor in leading to the establishment of the Federal Council of Churches representing not simply administrative boards but the denominations themselves.

The cooperation at the home base of the missionary movement is, of course, only a faint reflection of the cooperation and unity that have developed on the foreign field. There stronger influences for unity have been at work than in any other phase of the churches' life. The task of Christianizing the world has been seen to be so overwhelming as to be impossible of achievement by a divided church. Moreover, the denominational differences that seem important when we are among Presbyterians, Baptists, Episcopalians and Methodists fade into insignificance when we are surrounded by Mohammedans, Buddhists, Hindus, Shintoists and Animists. Then we realize that as Christians—whatever our sectarian names—we all hold in common the things that give us a gospel for the saving of the world.

It is no wonder, then, that union institutions for educational, medical and literary work have within the last decade or two grown by leaps and bounds till in India, China and Latin America the numbers run up into the scores. No wonder that cooperative committees covering whole fields, federations of churches and arrangements for the allocating of territory have been established. Nor has the movement stopped here. It has gone on irresistibly to the stage where the union of churches has in some cases become a reality and in many cases seems not far away. Groups of churches of the same general family have long been united in Japan. The South India, United Church has for more than a decade included the Christians of the English Congregational, American Reformed and Scottish Presbyterian missions. At the present moment three union movements of outstanding proportions are under way. In Africa, Kikuyu has come to the fore again, this time resulting in a definite proposal, now being considered, for an alliance of missions in British East Africa, including Presbyterians, Methodists, and Anglicans, with the expressed intention of not resting till they all share one ministry. In China all the churches of the Presbyterian order have been united in a General Assembly and a federation between it and the Congregationalists is now under consideration, looking specifically toward organic union. In India, proposals have been made by the South India United Church (already including Congregationalists, Presbyterians and Reformed), the Anglican Church and the Mar Thoma Syrian Church, looking toward one united body. If the union should be consummated it would be the first time since the Reformation that episcopal and non-episcopal churches would have come together, and the first time since the breach of the eleventh century that branches of the Eastern and the Western divisions of Christendom would have found themselves a single church.

The foreign field is leading the way. Can the churches at home keep pace?

Do You Use Your Minister?

MR. L. C. HAWORTH, general secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association in Youngstown, Ohio, recently sent out a questionnaire to representative men of the United States, including professional men, tradesmen, business men, educators—as nearly as was possible, that is to say, all types of laymen—in preparation for an address before the ministerial association of that city on the subject, "What Do the Laymen Think of the Clergy?" More than one hundred answered, and the replies furnish interesting reading.

It is noteworthy that all the replies agree in the opinion that the church is essential to the perpetuation of high ideals. Only one answer indicates a total condemnation of ministers as such. Ninety out of one hundred and five believe that ministers enter their work with different motives than those influencing men in the choice of other callings. Eighty-six of one hundred and seventeen say they would advise young men in whom they are interested personally to enter the ministry. Seventy-three of the writers think ministers stand out as real community leaders, forty-six think otherwise. To the question, "Are ministers as good mixers as men in other professions?" sixty-five answer yes and fifty no. To the question, "As a rule, could the ministers of your acquaintance have commanded a larger income had they pursued another calling?" the answer is emphatically in the affirmative—yes, eighty-nine; no, twenty. To a question covering one of the commonest criticisms of the ministry, "Is the average minister too idealistic and uncompromising in his teaching?" the majority of opinions were in the negative, showing that the average man of the world feels the need of a maintenance of high standards by the church.

Perhaps the most interesting part of the summary is in the answers to the question, "It is as natural and easy for you to turn to the minister for spiritual advice, when needed, as it is to turn to the lawyer for legal advice or to the physician for medical advice?" To this, twenty-three answer yes, and seventy-one answer no.

Several different explanations of this honest self-revelation of the layman's mind suggest themselves. The average man looks upon his relation to his lawyer or his doctor as a business matter. He commands a certain part of their time, he pays for it and that is an end of the transaction. With the minister he does not feel so free, especially if he is not a regular contributor to any church. Often, too, a man of affairs feels somewhat shamefaced in seeking spiritual advice. He feels that his actions may be disapproved, and he does not really want advice and needed correction, but sympathy and a confirmation of his own course.

But often there is a feeling that the minister is without real understanding of the world of affairs. "How should he know what I am up against?" says the business man, even while stoutly holding that his pastor's idealism is right and should be maintained. Here the preacher may be partly to blame. The present-day minister is not studiously aloof, like the long-coated clergyman of the olden time, but in many instances he has no intimate understanding of commercial and industrial life, no ground on which he can meet men of a large variety of occupations and interests. True, he no doubt knows as much about their work as they know about his, but this is not a real excuse. Jane Addams once defined culture by saying that the most cultured person in the world is he who understands and sympathizes with the most people. To no one else is this breadth of culture so important as to the minister. He, of all men, must know much of one thing and something of everything. It will do him good to study the market reports and the industrial situation, and this, not so much that he may make eloquent pulpit generalizations concerning them as that he may really know through what struggles and self-mastery a man of our time must maintain his moral balance when caught by the forces of commercial or social rebellion. When the average man is assured that the minister will understand his situation he will learn to turn to him in times of spiritual extremity.

The Waste-Paper-Man

Parable of Safed the Sage

I RODE upon a railway train. And I spent the night in that chief torture of our Hurried Civilization, even in a Sleeping-Car. And I slept well; and so, as I judge from my shoes, did the Porter.

Now in the morning, the train stopped long at a Junction. And I looked out of my window, and behold, a little Park. And it was littered as if there had been a Band Concert there on the night before. For there was Waste Paper of many kinds and in Great Abundance. There were Paper Bags that might have contained Peanuts, and boxes that had contained Cracker-jack, and bits of Newspaper, and Soiled Programs; and if there be any other kinds of Waste Paper that people leave in Parks, they were there, and Then Some.

And I looked, and behold, one man with a Sack. And the Sack was suspended from his neck, and was behind him and upon the left of him. And the mouth of the Sack was held open with an Hoop. And the Mouth was not wide, but was Wide Open; and whatever dropped into the Sack blew not out, but stayed put. And the Sack was a Great Sack, and contained as it were Two Bushels.

And in his right hand did the man carry an Iron Spear, even a Rod that was sharpened at the end. And the other end was shaped even like unto an Handle.

And he walked through the Park, and he thrust the Spear through the pieces of Paper, even the Newspapers and the Programs, and the Peanut Bags and the Cracker-jack boxes. And he dropped them into the Sack. And when the Sack was full, then did he empty it into a Burner of wire that I beheld behind the Shrubbery; and he burned the Papers with fire. And he came yet again and did likewise.

And even as we waited, the Park began to look Respectable. And I saw that before the Sun had risen high in the Heavens his job would be done, and that which had been an eye-sore would be a place of Beauty.

And I considered this, and I said, One sinner destroyeth much good; but one Righteous man who goeth about doing good can do something toward evening up the work of many sinners. For behold, the crowd that scattered the papers were many, and this man is but one; but he goeth straight at the business of making his part of the world better, and he delivereth the goods.

And I considered that there are people in the world, and I know a few of them, who Brighten the Corner Where They Are, and who go quietly about making this world a Safe and clean and happy spot and make no fuss about it. For the Crowd that doth eat Cracker-jack and yell Rah-Rah-Rah and scatter Paper, maketh a big stir in the world, but the world doth little note nor long remember the beneficent work of the Waste-Paper Man.

And I considered those good and quiet souls in whose presence all Scandal doth die; who take up no reproach against their neighbors, but who go quietly through life quieting false rumors, and healing life's little hurts, and doing it without any fuss, and I thanked God for such good folk.

Then did I meditate upon the way in which the Human Race hath littered up this Planet since first Adam and Eve did Feed Peanuts to the Elephant in Paradise and forgot to pick up the Bag; and how the soul of the Infinite Father hath been grieved through the long ages over the way we have mussed things up. And I considered the Patient Love of Him who bare our sins, and put them behind his back, and cast them into the depth of the Sea. And I have great hope that the sins of the many shall not outweigh the infinite grace of the One.

But I considered that it would be a very good plan to tell folk to be a Little More Careful not to litter up God's Park, but to keep clean and wholesome the good world in which our heavenly Father hath permitted us to play.

Know Thyself

HE read the books which all the wise men writ;
He searched the world for knowledge, not for pelf;
He thought no man unknown, so keen his wit,
But once he met a stranger—'twas himself.

What About Lent?

By Lloyd C. Douglas

ONE of the pet quotations with which we frequently embellish our remarks about human existence maintains that we do not live "in figures on a dial." It is an intriguing phrase, but fallacious. For precisely in this way do we live—in figures on a dial. Solomon was entirely right when he said that men's lives were ordered by seasons. There was a time to laugh, a time to weep, a time to jump into things impetuously, a time to reflect, a time to sow, a time to reap, a time to fight and a time to run. One gathers that this wise man felt the unsuccessful life was made so through failure to observe its appointed seasons.

We upon whom there has been laid the responsibility of spiritual leadership should be more fully conversant than we are with the peculiar mental states induced by the changing seasons of the year. It is our business to know the difference between the prevailing moods of May and August. It is part of our task to understand the wanderlust provoked by the vernal equinox, and the vagaries of autumnal melancholy. To secure such valuable information, we may not seek a more reliable source than the calendar for the "church year." It is to be believed that many of us have been failing to make full use of the greater festivals of Christianity—either neglecting them outright or subjecting them to purposes for which they were never intended.

FIXED BY NATURE

If you will take the "periscope" in one hand, and a modern text-book on psychology in the other, and observe their close teamwork, you may be amazed at the excellence of their wisdom who devised the schedule of events commonly known as the "church year." There was nothing "hit or miss" about the "make-up" of this calendar. These canny church fathers did not sit in council to determine whether it would be more convenient to observe a "penitential season" in June than in December. No; that matter was out of their jurisdiction. It was something that had been settled by Nature, and they simply obeyed her voice. It is a known fact that the budding spring inevitably lures men to introspection. At that season they search their hearts, take invoice of their spiritual capacities, and seek whatever art forms are most familiar to them in an endeavor to make articulate the vague longings of their souls. Of old, they fasted at this season, and took counsel of holy men in cloisters. Of late, some write spring poetry, hungrily seek the art-galleries, and patronize orchestral concerts. It is a season when everybody grows restless, dissatisfied with the apparent futility of his business, rebellious against the narrow boundaries of his experience, eager to escape the tyranny of material things to make adventure with the more ambitious quest of what, for him, serves as Ultima Thule, Summum Bonum, Utopia—or whatever you like that stands for the High Spot.

So, we may conclude that the season of self-search is fixed by Nature. Christianity is not unique in respect to the time of its penitential period. All the other great religions understand this psychology quite as well, and some of them have followed the suggestion much more effectively. Christianity, so inextricably tangled with the best of progressive civilization that men debate whether it is Christianity blazes the way for science, commerce, and the arts—or vice versa—should have a care that it does not develop into an urbane, artificial, indoor kind of religion. It began out in the open, under the guidance of one who frequently had no pillow but the turf; and we do well who would give all the fresh air and sunshine requisite to its health. When Nature suggests a mental and spiritual mood—and historic Christianity stamps its O. K. upon the suggestion—we are wise who follow the hint.

It is quite difficult for the present-day minister in America to obey his natural impulses and the suggestions of the "church year" in making a program of sermons and services to suit the season. In his desire to be a good citizen, he feels obliged to comply with every request of local, state, and national reform and philanthropic societies when they solicit his backing of their movements to the extent of observing their "days." No sooner has he planned his schedule for a vigorous evangelistic appeal through January than along comes "National Thrift Week"—backed by the local Chamber of Commerce. Will he not be so good as to preach, on the Sunday preceding the "drive," emphasizing the importance of saving pennies that they may grow up into dollars. He dislikes to decline. Perhaps he really can contribute something to this cause—especially on the subject of frugality, a matter with which he has had much experience. He can talk ably of pennies. In the course of his business he sees such a lot of them.

"DAYS" AND THE SEASONS

In the fall, when he knows he should be driving deeply into the "thanatopsis" mood, and making the most of it in his sermons, the secretary of his denomination's board of education sends him a whole waste-basketful of literature providing plans and specifications for the sermon he is to preach on the importance of supporting the little church colleges. He knows this is a worthy cause. He wishes, however, that he might be permitted to speak about it some other time. Just now he has himself all set to do a constructive task bearing upon the spiritual life of his congregation. To spend one Sunday morning parading the poverty of our wretched little—our own little—our all-but dead little Peewee College at Hinkum's Crossing—will upset the continuity of his proposed series of sermons; but if he doesn't come through with the Peewee business he will be put down as "a brother hard to work with."

In the same mail, he gets orders from someplace—he is not quite sure whence—that the next Sunday thereafter is the first day of "Good Literature Week."

Unless he proposes to classify himself among the unread and unwashed who are indifferent to this wonderful movement, he had better load himself with good literature propaganda and be prepared to fire it off on the appointed day. It will be easy to do this, for the National Council for the Spread of Good Literature has not only prepared him a sermon outline, but has selected his text, his hymns, his Scripture lesson, his homiletic illustrations; so that though he be a mere wayfarer, he need not err therein. (Incidentally, the impertinence of some of these people who persist in preparing sermons for us wherewith to present their various movements seems equalled only by the stupidity of the stuff they send us. One Sunday—when the war was on, and we were getting sermons from Washington—the writer, thinking his people needed a moment of relaxation and a chance to have a hearty laugh, read a few paragraphs of a regulation government sermon. It was good.)

A BROKEN PITCHER

Days and days and days! If it may not be too impudent, I should like to assume the role of soothsayer long enough to predict that we have now passed the crest of these "days," and that our good friends with the causes and movements and drives and campaigns—good, bad and indifferent—are presently to discover that they have overdone it. The good old preacher-pitcher has been carried once too often to the campaign-well. He is "gone broke." And that is a fact.

Lent begins next week. What are we going to do about it? Most of us who plan the programs for our non-liturgical churches organize classes, during this season, for the instruction of young people in the fundamentals of Christianity as interpreted by our own denominations. This is as it ought to be. Many of us make special evangelistic efforts. More and more, our churches are coming to think of the pre-Easter weeks as a season of recruiting. But it is to be doubted if many of us are making proper use of this period for the deepening of the springs of spiritual life in the hearts of mature and confessed Christians.

The preacher who fails to see and utilize the possibilities of Lent is standing in his own light. He may be reluctant to observe the season lest he infringe upon the exclusive privilege of the liturgical churches; but no denomination enjoys a monopoly of Lent. He may fear the indictment that he is "headed toward Rome"—an ancient bugaboo that has cost us heavily who have sacrificed so much of the beauty of holiness in our awkward efforts to avoid doing anything that was ever practiced by historic Christianity previous to 1517. Again, he remembers the ungodly travesty of Lenten observance in the upper ether of "high sassiety" where the self-abnegation of this penitential season seems to enjoin no more rigorous discipline than the refusal to have lemon in one's tea at the bridge party; and where fasting means laying up, for a few days, in some sanitarium, to take medicinal baths wherewith to recuperate from the winter's overgorging and loss of sleep. But good things will be counterfeited; and the better they are, the more likely to be imitated.

MAKING LENT HELPFUL

It will be well for us to consider how we may make something profitable and helpful of Lent for our people who have not been trained to observe the season—not even to the extent of going through the motions of celebrating it. Perhaps the caution should be extended to the zealous young minister, who feels the importance of doing this thing to the limit, and has it in mind to hold daily services all the way from Ash Wednesday to Easter, that forty days are a very great many! He may begin his campaign with much enthusiasm, but before he has arrived at the end of the season he will feel that instead of commemorating the forty-day fast of the Master in The Jeshimon, he has been emulating the period spent by Moses in the Wilderness of Paran. In offering this suggestion, we speak that which we do know.

This isn't something that a church may hurl itself into, in one season, with utter abandon. If you have never observed Lent, at all, in your church, do not plan a lot of extra meetings, but keep the Lenten idea to the fore in all the meetings that you would customarily hold. A series of three sermons, on the first three Sundays of Lent, dealing with the temptations of Jesus, will serve to establish the idea that we are in a season of the year when such meditation is timely.

Practically inexhaustible are the spiritual resources in this story. The preacher can afford to sit down over it, for a whole day, and study it in the light of present-day problems. It makes a delightful setting for a series of three sermons, because it falls apart, naturally, into as many distinct propositions. The Wilderness Temptation comes first—temptation on low levels—a frank appeal to appetite. The City Temptation follows—temptation to get into the hurly-burly of the crowd—to take the short-cut to success—to win one's way at a leap—to gamble with Providence. No less alluring and dangerous is The Mountain-top Temptation—temptation to dream of glory and honor achieved by other processes than the simple, friendly, hand-to-hand contact with men as brethren.

SPIRITUAL SELF-APPRAISAL

All of the sermons, and mid-week addresses of this period, should be clustered around this central idea of self-search, self-examination, spiritual appraisal. Great advantage is gained by printing and distributing a calendar of all these services, showing that they are all of a piece, and all pertaining to Lent. One can build a program that has cumulative value, reaching its high point in the celebration of Holy Week.

We miss much who do not hold daily services during Holy Week. Unless local conditions absolutely prohibit the plan, it is best to have these meetings late afternoons. There should be excellent music, meditative and devotional of mood. The address should be brief. The congregation should be asked to do little or nothing but sit and think and pray. We have been making mistakes who have considered it necessary to every service that our people should sing hymns and read responsively. Occasionally—during Holy Week, for example—it is better to give them nothing to do but listen and meditate. In the writer's program for the coming Holy Week, the congregation has nothing to say or do, at all. A penitential ritual (home-made—for we are not ritualists), is to be rendered by two choirs, one in the choir-box consisting of a mixed chorus of sixteen voices, the other in the rear of the balcony composed of a male quartet acting as an obligato accompaniment to a soprano soloist. In answer to the question that has just come to the reader's mind—"Does this not involve large expense?"—it may be said that, in our own case, these people are contributing their daily services, through Holy Week, without financial recompense.

As to the addresses of Holy Week, it is better for the minister to make them himself, rather than call in local colleagues who are unable to establish such continuity of thought as may be achieved by one speaker. The most frequent treatment, during this Week, is a consideration of the events in Jesus' life, day by day through the crucial period. This proves quite perplexing. On Wednesday, there is practically nothing to be said; on Thursday and Friday one is positively embarrassed by the abundance of materials. It is better to plan a series of addresses, topically.

TOPICAL ADDRESSES

For example: Let the general theme of the addresses be phrased: "Suffered Under Pontius Pilate." On Monday, the theme might be "The Indictment." Pilate asks, "Art thou a King?" That is the indictment. It fits like a glove to the business one was doing, on the day before, when the Palm Sunday pageantry was displayed.

On Tuesday (all of these topics have to do with Pilate's attitude toward Jesus—Pilate, the cold-blooded, self-contained, dispassionate business-man) the topic might be "A Problem of Jurisdiction." This deals with the story of Pilate's sending his prisoner to Herod. He hoped to prove that the adjudication of the case was none of his business. A curious little twist is given to the story when it is noted that "Pilate and Herod, who had been previously at enmity, became friends that day." Pilate, the gentleman, strikes hands with Herod, roue and sot. Pilate despised Herod—but today they find common cause.

On Wednesday, a good theme is "A Compromise Settlement." Pilate advises the crowd to "scourge him and let him go." If Jesus was guilty, he should be punished; if innocent, he should be acquitted. Pilate is willing to trim. It all gets back to the old query "What will you do with Jesus?"

On Thursday, the topic might be phrased "A Judgment Affirmed." This has to do with Pilate's remark to the priests, "What I have written, I have written." After it is too late, Pilate bucks up and reveals a vestige of moral courage. After it is too late, Nicodemus ben Gorion and Joseph of Arimathæa appear as pallbearers. It is a great text—"What I have written."

Good Friday seems to take care of itself. There should be a program of penitential music—an address on the significance of the sacrifice on Golgotha—a stirring appeal to the courage and devotion of every man who has claimed fealty to Christ. Care must be exercised not to let this service become a mere lugubrious funeral of the Lord. Seeing he is not dead, that manner of memorial is out of drawing. A great theme for that day is "Ye need not weep for me!"

Witnesses

THE centuries, since Christ to earthland came,
Have been aflame
With His fair fame.

The nations that have fallen in decay
In sad tones say,
"His is the Way."

And in this age of turpitude and blight,
Out from the night
Shines clear His Light.

BECAUSE of the light of the moon,
Silver is found on the moor;
And because of the light of the sun,
There is gold on the walls of the poor.

Because of the light of the stars,

A Song of Life

THE still white mountain dawn is mine
And the viking call of a stormy sea—
Little white clouds and a blasted pine
And the light of the stars are the soul of me,
With petals that fall from the apple tree.

I am life and the fire of the sun,
New moon and the ragged mountain line—
And a tender twist of eglantine.
The storm torn sky and my heart are one,
With the strength of a World that is just begun!

The Truth About Bolshevism and the Jew

By John Spargo

Second Article

HAVING exposed the history of the protocols and their worthlessness as evidence, let me address myself to a question of great importance concerning which there is much confusion and misunderstanding—the alleged connection between Bolshevism and the desire of the Jews for world-dominion. The protocols are twenty-four in number. They are alleged to be detached and disconnected parts of a comprehensive report to a secret conference of “the invisible Jewish Government.” If they are genuine, and the statements made in them are true, the principal agency through which the Jewish conspirators have worked and are working is Freemasonry, and the Masonic lodges throughout the civilized world have been and are the instruments of the Jewish conspirators. If genuine and true, the documents reflect upon every Masonic lodge, quite as seriously as upon the Jewish race. If the genuineness and truth of the protocols could be proved, Freemasonry ought to be suppressed.

I

I suppose few people in America believe that there is any connection between Bolshevism and Freemasonry. The last place in which I should expect to find sympathy for Bolshevism would be the average Masonic lodge. I should as soon expect to find belief in and sympathy for Bolshevism in the College of Cardinals, or in the Union League Club, as in a Masonic lodge. But when we enter into the mysteries of this “Jewish conspiracy” we encounter many surprising things. So we find in these protocols an unexpected association of Jews, Freemasons and Bolsheviks—surely a grotesque trinity. Upon what is the charge of the Jewish origin of Bolshevism based? Simply that in these protocols, which were published in 1905, that is twelve years before the Bolshevik counter-revolution in Russia, there are a number of passages which seem to be an anticipation of the principal characteristics of Bolshevism.

THE PROTOCOLS

In one of these protocols it is stated that, for the furtherance of Jewish conspiracy, “ferments, discords and hostility” are to be deliberately created and fostered throughout Europe and the world. (Protocol 7.) In another it is stated that efforts are to be made to compromise the honor and ruin the reputations of the leading statesmen of the world, and blackmail resorted to in order to compel these statesmen to serve Jewish purposes. (Protocol 10.) Another protocol says that revolutionary movements of Anarchists, Communists and Socialists are to be inspired and fostered for the purpose of bringing about the destruction of non-Jewish civilization. (Protocol 3.) In order to attain the goal of Jewish dominion, it is declared that “a universal economic crisis” is to be brought about, and the economic life of the world disorganized through the ruin of the credit and currency systems of the leading nations. (Protocol 3.) If these ends are met with opposition on the part of any nation, or group of nations, there is to be resistance in the form of universal war. (Protocol 7.) To insure the success of the conspiracy and the enthronement of the Jewish dynasty over all the civilized world, every means is to be used, including bribery, deceit and treachery. (Protocol 1.) A multitude of spies and secret agents, all abundantly supplied with funds, is to spread sedition, dissension, revolt and civil war in all the principal countries. (Protocol 2.) These are the principal passages which are relied upon to prove the Jewish origin and inspiration of Bolshevism.

A SUSPICIOUS CIRCUMSTANCE

Now, it cannot be denied that Bolshevism actually conforms in a notable degree to the foregoing specifications. Shall we then conclude that the charge is proven and declare the case closed, or is it necessary to examine the evidence further and more critically? A brief period of honest reflection will convince any fair-minded and intelligent person of the injustice of rendering a verdict holding the Jews responsible for Bolshevism upon the basis of such evidence. Let me direct attention to a suspicious circumstance, a coincidence of dates which once more directs suspicion against Nilus and against the alleged stolen protocols: I have pointed out that in 1903, in the first edition of his book, Nilus did not use the protocols, though he claims that they had been in his possession for two years prior to that time. In 1903 the Russian Social Democratic party was split into two factions, and the word Bolshevism was coined to designate the policy of one of these factions. In 1905 the first Russian Revolution took place. In the period between the split in the Social Democratic party in 1903 and the outbreak of the Revolution in 1905 the Bolsheviks had been active in formulating and propagating their views. During the Revolution a sharp conflict occurred between the Bolsheviks and other factions of the Russian Socialist movement, and the Russian Socialist press was full of the controversy.

UNDOUBTED FORGERIES

It will be seen from this brief sketch that when Nilus published the second edition of his book, late in 1905, he could easily have found in the Russian Socialist press all the materials for such a general description of Bolshevism as that in the protocols. If we believe the documents are genuine, that they are authentic translations of documents stolen in 1896, delivered to Nilus in 1901, and by him first made public in 1905, we have simply a coincidence of dates. I submit, however, that there is not a shred of credible evidence that the documents were so obtained by Nilus, or that they existed in 1896, 1901, 1903, or at any date earlier than 1905, the year of their first publication. I submit that it is probable that the passages in the protocols which are cited as conclusive evidence that Bolshevik policy had been formulated as early as 1896, were written after 1903, and in the light of already published accounts of Bolshevik theories and tactics. There is not a thing that we know about these documents and their history which does not point to the conclusion that they are forgeries.

JEWES AND GENTILES IN SOCIALISM

Even if we do not conclude that the alleged Protocols of the Elders of Zion are forgeries, invented for the purpose of bringing about pogroms in Russia, there is nothing in the paragraphs I have summarized referring to revolutionary disturbances which can be said to be peculiarly distinctive of Bolshevism; nothing that does not apply equally to the French Revolution or to almost every other great revolution in history. The statements are too general in character to claim for them that they apply solely and exclusively to Bolshevism.

II

Upon the strength of statements made in these documents it is charged that Socialism is a movement founded by Jewish conspirators to overthrow non-Jewish civilization and so make possible the triumph of worldwide Jewish imperialism. Because Karl Marx, Ferdinand Lassalle, and many other Socialist leaders belonged to the Jewish race this charge seems to many persons to be fully proved. Having spent practically the whole of my life in the Socialist movement, and devoted many years to its advancement and the study of its problems, I feel that I am competent to pass judgment upon this question. That individual Jews have played a conspicuous role in the international Socialist movement cannot be denied, nor have I the slightest intention of either denying it or apologizing for it. I am proud to acknowledge the friendship of many Jewish Socialist comrades. I am as grateful for their friendship as for the friendship of any of my Gentile Socialist comrades. At the same time, I repudiate the suggestion that through all the years of my Socialist activity, I have been, either consciously or unconsciously, used to further a conspiracy to bring the world under the yoke of Jewish imperialism. In my own behalf, and equally in behalf of my Jewish Socialist colleagues, I deny that the Socialist movement has at any time served such a sinister purpose.

Only those who are entirely ignorant of the history of Socialism, and those whose minds have been warped and distorted by prejudice, can possibly believe this silly charge. Anglo-Saxon influences have contributed much more than Jewish influences to modern Socialism. Karl Marx was of the Jewish race, but he derived most of his ideas from English sources. Not only do we owe the word "Socialism" to a British Socialist, Robert Owen, and not only was there a more or less well-defined Socialist movement in Great Britain when Karl Marx was still an infant, but the economic theories which Marx systematically formulated, and which are now universally known as "Marxian Socialism," were practically advanced by British writers before Marx was ever heard of. Here in the United States we find the same thing. When Karl Marx was a boy of nine years, there was already a Socialist propaganda in this country, and, so far as can be ascertained, not a Jew connected with it. At about that time, 1827, Thomas Cooper of Columbia, S. C., published a book in which the fundamental economic theories of modern Socialism were expounded with great clarity and force. Marx was only ten years old when O. A. Brownson, of the Boston Quarterly Review, was preaching here in the United States the doctrine of class war, the abolition of the wage system and the necessity for the rule of society by the proletariat. The work of Thomas Skidmore belongs to this same period. In 1829 there was a notable group of Americans engaged in the propaganda of Socialism, not a Jew among them.

REVIVAL OF INTEREST IN SOCIALISM

After a period of ten years or so, during which Socialism almost disappeared from American thought, there was a revival of interest in the subject inspired by the theories of the French Socialist, Charles Fourier, by whom Karl Marx himself was greatly influenced. Quite as profoundly as the Frenchman inspired the German Jew, he inspired a typical American, Albert Brisbane, who began the agitation of Fourierist Socialism in this country and soon had associated with him a distinguished and notable group of Americans. Such Americans as Horace Greeley, Parke Godwin, George Ripley, Charles A. Dana, John S. Dwight, William Henry Channing, Margaret Fuller, John Orvis, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Edmund Clarence Stedman, and many others, were actively engaged in propagating Socialism, while other distinguished Americans, such as Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ralph Waldo Emerson, James Russell Lowell and Theodore Parker, among others, were brought into more or less sympathetic association with the movement. It would be difficult to name a body of men and women more thoroughly representative of the highest and best of American life and genius. It is absurd to charge that these great and distinguished Americans consciously lent themselves to a Jewish conspiracy, or that they were the dupes of such a conspiracy. The plain fact is that Socialism is essentially as Anglo-Saxon as Magna Charta and as American as the Declaration of Independence. Karl Marx devoted his typically Jewish genius to the exposition of Socialist theories, but the theories themselves were not of Jewish origin.

AN ANCIENT CHARGE

The charge of being an instrument of Jewish conspiracy and intrigue has been levelled against practically every progressive movement, and every struggle for freedom, during the last thousand years. It was directed against the Reformation; against the Barons who compelled the submission of King John at Runnymede; against the French Revolution; against the movement for American Independence; against Mazzini's movement for Italian unity; against Chartism in England. Whether it was made against the movement for the abolition of slavery in this country I do not know, but it would be surprising if such were not the case. Now that Bolshevism has filled the minds of the greater part of civilized mankind with terror and horror, the propagandists of anti-Semitism are assiduously seeking to fasten upon the Jewish race the responsibility for Bolshevism.

In a newspaper maintained by one of our great manufacturers, and largely devoted to the propaganda of anti-Semitism, I find the statement that "every commissar in Russia today is a Jew." This statement, which has been widely reproduced, can only have one object, namely, to create in the minds of non-Jews a profound suspicion and fear of the Jewish people. The statement is not true. There are apostate Jews among the leaders of Bolshevism, just as there are Gentiles. Trotzky, for example, is an apostate Jew. But Lenin is not a Jew. Neither is Tchitcherin, the Bolshevik commissar for foreign affairs; neither is Lunarcharsky, who is in charge of the educational system of Soviet Russia; neither is Dzerzhinsky, the responsible head of the infamous Extraordinary Commissions; neither is Krassin, to whom was entrusted three commissarships, namely, commerce and industry, transports, and war and munitions; neither is Kollontai a Jewess. There are many other Gentiles holding responsible positions in the Soviet government of Russia, but these names will suffice as proof of the falsity and injustice of the statement I have quoted. Lenin, Tchitcherin and Krassin—three Gentiles—wield more power in Soviet Russia than all the Jewish commissars combined. Of the seventeen members of the supreme Bolshevik authority—the Council of People's Commissaries, only one—Trotzky—is a Jew.

JEWES HOSTILE TO BOLSHEVISM

On the other hand, it is only fair and just to point out that the principal leaders of the organized resistance to the Bolsheviks in Russia are Jews. The largest Jewish Socialist organization in Russia, the "Bund," has from the beginning consistently opposed Bolshevism and many of its leaders have paid heavy penalties for that opposition, some of them forfeiting their lives and others languishing in vile prisons. Such men as Martov, Dan, Axelrod, Lieber, Abramovich, Kossovsky, and many other Jewish Socialist leaders have consistently and persistently fought Bolshevism and all its works and ways. The only Socialist elected to the United States Congress in the recent elections is a Jew and a firm foe of Bolshevism.

Bolshevism is fundamentally opposed to the idea of nationality as well as to the Jewish religion. Not a single Jewish community in Russia, and not a single Jewish political party, has supported the Bolsheviks. Tiny and negligible minorities in the "Bund" and in the Zionist party had to split off from those parties and form separate groups of their own when they desired to join hands with the Bolsheviks. Every important Jewish community in Russia has issued some kind of formal denunciation and repudiation of Bolshevism. All the oppression, misery and suffering which Bolshevik rule has imposed upon the population of Russia has been shared by the Jews equally with the Christians. Everybody knows that the Jews made up a very large part of the Russian commercial class, the traders, shopkeepers, brokers, money lenders and the like. Upon this class the Bolsheviks have levied their exactions, and the Jews have had to pay their full share. Scores of thousands of Jews have had their property confiscated, many thousands more have been compelled to leave their homes in order to save their lives. Many Jews have been put to death because of their opposition to the Bolsheviks.

III

In view of such facts as these, is it reasonable to suppose that Bolshevism is a pro-Jewish conspiracy? Is it not absurd to suggest that the regime which has reduced hundreds of thousands of Jews to abject poverty, broken up thousands of Jewish homes and families, forbidden the use of the Hebrew language, confiscated billions of Jewish wealth, imprisoned thousands of prominent Jews, and murdered numerous others, is part of a Jewish conspiracy? Every intelligent person realizes that any such conspiracy must require, as the first condition of its success, complete racial solidarity. That solidarity could only be obtained by assuring the complete exemption of the Jews from the suffering and oppression imposed upon the non-Jews. Had there been any aim of securing the solidarity of the Jewish people of Russia against the non-Jewish population, it would have been thwarted by the imposition of such burdens of poverty and suffering upon the Jews, and their resulting resentment. Not the smallest particle of evidence has been adduced to show that the Jews in Russia have been exempted from any of the oppressive features of Bolshevism.

POGROMS COMMON IN SOVIET RUSSIA

Pogroms against Jews have been painfully common in Bolshevik Russia. I am aware that this statement will be challenged and indignantly denied by many of our American defenders of the Bolsheviki, Jews and Gentiles alike. It is, however, a well-attested fact. I do not mean to charge that the Soviet Government has deliberately instigated or authorized pogroms. The truth seems to be that just as pogroms have taken place in the new Republic of Poland, despite the efforts of the Polish Government to prevent them, and just as pogroms were carried out by Denikin's Volunteer Army, despite General Denikin's attempts to prevent them, so regular Bolshevik troops have plundered and murdered Jews and raped and mutilated Jewish women and girls. The Pogrom Victims' Relief Committee of the Russian Red Cross Society published a report of its investigations of the Jewish pogroms in Southern Russia. The report, based on evidence of unquestionable reliability, showed that Jews had been plundered and murdered by regular Bolshevik troops, as well as by Denikin's troops and the troops of the adventurer Petlura, and the robber bands of such bandit leaders as Makhno.

POGROMS AGAINST THE JEWS

I have before me a report of a pogrom at Novopolitka which lasted through the first week of September, 1919. This pogrom, in which more than one hundred Jews were murdered and numerous women and girls violated, was carried on by the guerrilla bands of Makhno and Grigoriev, together with regular Bolshevik troops. Vladimir Kossovsky, one of the ablest and best known leaders of the "Bund," has written a terrible account of the Jewish pogroms which occurred in Glukhov, in the Government of Chernigov, and a number of other places. These pogroms were the work of Bolshevik troops. He says: "The Red Army men, transformed into savage beasts, murdered the arrested Jews who were being taken under guard to the building of the Soviet, and the street which housed the Soviet was literally sodden with Jewish blood. All Jewish stores and residences were sacked. Peasants from the nearby villages soon joined the plunderers of the Red Guard in their work of looting and pillaging. According to newspaper reports, 450 Jews were murdered, among these some Jewish soldiers who had been rewarded with 'St. George' medals for bravery. Long lists of victims—such as could be identified—were at that time published in the newspapers. The pogrom was directed exclusively against the Jews, and the Christian population of the city did not suffer in the least."

A MONSTROUS CRUELTY

Quite recently Bolshevik troops joined in pogroms against the Jews in the Ukraine. Does anybody in his right mind believe that these things would be possible if there existed such a world organization of Jews as our anti-Semites charge? "The Soviet Government has shot and is still shooting Jewish public men, lawyers, engineers, physicians and workmen who have participated in the struggle against Soviet rule," declared the Council of the Vladivostok Jewish Community in a formal address to the Russian people. Does this indicate the existence of an understanding between the leaders of the Jews of all lands and the Bolshevik rulers of Russia?

The charge is preposterous and monstrously cruel. Whoever gives currency to such a cowardly falsehood deserves the ostracism of every right-minded, decent American man and woman. There can only be one object in making such an accusation, namely, the creation of fear and suspicion of the Jews in the minds of non-Jewish people. And from such suspicion and fear only one result can be reasonably expected, namely, the bitter fruits of the cruel and terrible hatred which gives birth to pogroms. It is not so much in defense of the Jews as in defense of American institutions and ideals that I raise my earnest protest against this cowardly propaganda of anti-Semitism. The problems which arise out of the presence in our large cities of masses of people of Jewish ancestry and faith can only be solved by the earnest and intelligent cooperation of all men and women of goodwill, Christian and Jew alike. Anti-Semitism makes that cooperation impossible, and is therefore a dangerous form of treason to America.

The Dreamer Speaks

To the Man Who "Has Everything"

YOU say you have many possessions,
But though they are taxed in your name,
I, vagrant by open profession,
The heavier portion must claim.

What, business is plainly not my line?
Investments are nothing to me?
Your sky-scrapers add to my skyline,
But do not complete it, you see!

Your acres? My earth is below them,
My infinite blue is above;
To count and appraise them you know them,
I count not, appraise not, but love.

Your house? You are told it is Spanish;
I know it a dream, caught, held fast,
That might suddenly, mistily vanish
In a far, Andalusian past.

Your yacht? But it sails on my waters!
Then—this is the tenderest spot,
Begging pardon, your sons and your daughters?
I know them, you own you do not!

Schrecklichkeit in Ireland

THE most devoutly to be desired of all international amities is that between the English speaking peoples. We are of one blood and a common tradition and furnish the democratic leadership of the world as well as its most enlightened form of Christianity. An Anglo-Saxon comity would do more to preserve the peace of the world than could any other force.

But Americans cannot support British imperialism with blind approbation. No Anglo-Saxon comity can ever be effective if British Toryism and historic imperialism are to chart the policies. The immediate peace of the world depends upon a common Anglo-Saxon democracy, and the American democracy can do nothing less than make common cause with the British democracy. Yet if British democracy is weighed down and overborne by Tory imperialism it is useless to bewail the absence of that bond of the spirit which would make for peace. This all good Americans would deplore, but its control is not in their hands.

As Americans we may not sympathize with Irish aspirations for independence, though why we should sympathize with such aspirations in other enlightened peoples and not in the case of Ireland is utterly inexplicable to Irishmen and an enigma which the writer cannot understand. We may think the Irish foolish to want a clean-cut independence from England, and with that the writer of these lines will agree. Yet it is wholly unnecessary to excuse the crimes of Tory imperialism because of a desire to promote Anglo-American comity. There can simply never be a genuine Anglo-American comity while terrorism or any sort of suppression is practiced in Ireland. This is not in the least because of a hyphenated Irish-Americanism; it is a straight-out democratic sentiment that refuses to be confused by the claims of an Anglo-American friendship that carries approval of Tory imperialism in its wake.

Imperialism the Same Everywhere

Imperialism is the same everywhere. It may differ in degree but it depends upon an essential spirit that is always the same. British imperialism is the most benignant, but slumbering beneath its benignity is the ever present derogation of the people ruled, the assumptions of racial superiority and the motive of national profit. No government has ruled another people long for the supremely unselfish purpose of promoting that people's good without imperial profit. The American experiment in the Philippines is the one conspicuous exception to this rule in history, but the continuance of our rule in those islands is based upon the program of their eventual independence. We took the Philippines in the flush of victory, at the moment when imperial ambitions rode high, but the American democracy refused to launch on an imperialistic career, and we concluded to make the casuistry of "benevolent assimilation" a genuine ethic. We are definitely done with imperialism as a national policy. All good Americans remember "Hell Roarin'" General Jake Smith and the "water cure" with humility, and there have no doubt been things done in Hayti the past year that will shame us when once the whole truth is known. In other words, Americans are no different in moments of imperialistic aberration than are others.

England's great problem as a modern world-power is to make the transition from the empire of imperialism to the commonwealth of democratic peoples. Inside the old British Empire there has grown up a commonwealth of nations composed of the motherland and her English speaking colonies. But her relations with the non-English speaking peoples of the realm are very different. One of the commonest errors is the failure to distinguish between the democratic relations that bring peace and concord among the English speaking realms of the commonwealth and the policies that bring unrest and rebellion in the imperially ruled empire. Just now, with the war mind and habit still upon her and in the flush of victory, the democratic dream of turning the empire into a commonwealth is in eclipse. The unrest in India, the resurgence of Boer power in South Africa, the effective protest in Egypt and the Irish rebellion have flung things back into the hands of the imperialism of yesterday, and the power of reason gives way, as ever, to the power of violence. All this, with a coalition government, so-called, which is in reality a most effective combination of toryism and the most conservative of the upper-crust party liberalism, brings the policies of machtpolitik into being once more.

Tory Schrecklichkeit

Ireland is today, by English testimony, in the grip of a military terrorism. Every fact upon which this assertion is here made is taken from Englishmen and from Protestants. An English newspaper man who visited and described for the Manchester Guardian the German ruin wrought in Louvain was sent to Balbriggan and said frankly that the Black and Tan ruin of the Irish town was the greater. These Englishmen tell of thousands of citizens, including women and children, fleeing to the open fields in the night while their homes were looted and burned. Women have been maltreated, innocent citizens horse-whipped, suspected persons shot without proof or trial, and millions of dollars worth of property wantonly destroyed, including scores of cooperative creameries and other public property built up as a part of Sir Horace Plunkett's great public spirited enterprise to settle Ireland's troubles in peace. All this has been done by the forces of the crown sent to preserve law and order. It has been protested by ex-prime minister Asquith, Lord Robert Cecil, Sir Horace Plunkett, Arthur Henderson and by scores of nationally influential Liberals and churchmen and by the Parliamentary Committee of the Labor party officially. None of these men are Sinn Feiners or socialists or ask for Irish republican independence; they are simply English Liberals and Protestants who believe in Britain keeping her hands clean of the things her young men so recently died to purge the world of. They unhesitatingly accuse their own government of doing what Germany did in Belgium and they deplore the fact that it is costing them the everlasting enmity of conservative Irishmen and the friendship of the democracy of the world. But the government stands by Sir Harner Greenwood's policy of Terror. "Coalition" is camouflage for Toryism.

What Are the Excuses?

Lloyd-George always answers criticisms with something about the "murder gang." No American will defend the assassination of even the Blacks and Tans or the Nihilist method of assassination at all, even though the apology for it is that there is no other method of warfare open to a cause so overwhelmed by power and numbers. Informed Americans know that there were no "murder gangs" until after suppression became heavy with the ancient hand of Tory policy. It is said law and order must be upheld, but that sounds like cheap hypocrisy when the forces of law and order are lawless themselves, and when the regular police and soldiery are supplanted by special forces recruited from ruffians and adventurers and youths whom war left to become professional soldiers ready for any violence, and who are paid several times the stipend of the regular army for this business. No talk about Irish independence or the necessity of the United Kingdom has anything to do with this contention, for it is not these things we are debating; it is the use of schrecklichkeit we denounce along with all genuine English democrats.

Let us recall that it was only a few months ago that General Dwyer's troops in the Punjab were ordered to fire upon a miscellaneous crowd of some thousands of Indian people and that machine guns within a few minutes laid low some five hundred men, women and children, and that there were

Tory minds to defend his action. But English democracy repudiated it. So too does English democracy repudiate the like act at an Irish fair and all the rest of the unspeakable business of suppression by the methods of lawless reprisal and rule by terrorization. There is no finer democracy in the world than the genuine English democracy, and the genuine American democracy deplores its eclipse in this Irish tragedy.

British Table Talk

London, January 10, 1921.

THE death of Dr. Alexander Whyte does not rob us of a leader in the field; for some time he had lived a life in retirement after his long and noble ministry. Only once did I hear him preach, but the memory of that once is imperishable. "When the Son of Man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" was the text. But the phrase that remains most with me was the question he put to his hearers, "And who is your favorite midnight author?" It was indeed the mission of Dr. Whyte, not only to preach to Edinburgh to which he was a glorious witness of the Truth and the Life, but it was given to him to guide countless readers back to the great books of the faith. "Your true evangelical," he loved to say, "is the true catholic"; and certainly there was no more catholic mind than that of this writer who introduced us afresh, not only to Marshall on Sanctification and to Booton and Goodwin, but also to Saint Theresa and Cardinal Newman. To the end he remained faithful to his beloved Puritans, but he had a place in his heart for all loyal disciples, even though they were of Rome. How such a man found time to do all his reading, it is impossible to say; he must have had midnight authors of his own; and he must have guarded diligently his hours and lived, as he taught others to live, among enduring things. Among the ministers and teachers of his generation a high place can be claimed for Dr. Whyte. Of his great ministry I have no doubt that Dr. Hugh Black has spoken in America, and who could speak with such authority? Dr. Whyte was not a systematic theologian; it is impossible to reconcile into one system all his enthusiasm. He was something more, a sensitive spirit eagerly responsive to every touch of the Holy Ghost.

Student Christian Conference at Glasgow

The Student Christian Movement conference at Glasgow is just over, and the minds of its members are filled with a host of impressions not yet grouped or fused into one. But it can be said with perfect confidence that the conference made a land-mark in the history of the Christian church in Great Britain. "Glasgow 1921" will mean much. There the Christian students summed up the resultant meaning of changes which have come gradually and almost imperceptibly, and yet in their total effect have wrought a revolution in the attitude of youth toward the world. The gathering up of the meanings left by the history of late years, led inevitably to a new challenge, related to the old and yet new in its range and emphasis. It is worth the while of any student of the church to see which way youth in the universities is moving in thought and in action. However calmly age may assume that the old will go on, youth is clear that all things must become new.

The first thought which flashes out in clear outline is the memory of an audience of 4000, far more than half of whom were students, joining in the great hymn of thanksgiving, "For all the saints who from their labors rest." It was sung not to the old tune but the great tune of Dr. Shaw, which makes it for the first time like the shout of faith triumphant over all its foes.

And hearts are brave again and arms are strong, Alleluia!

But that hymn has always been sung. So far there was nothing new except that the presence of a new generation of faith always seems a new thing. The changes in outlook became clear when the diagnosis of the world's needs began. It was a world surveyed with ruthless honesty by which the students were confronted.

Conviction of Sin in a New Sense

The morning and afternoon sessions in particular became one prolonged attempt to bring home conviction of sin, but of sin as it is interpreted in terms of industrial wrong and social injustice and international folly and greed. India was treated not as a land where idols are honored—

Where every prospect pleases
And only man is vile,

but as a land with its political problems, its striving for self expression, its economic wrongs, the beginnings of its industrialism, its ancient civilization with all that it has brought down of longing after God. India was set before the student world, not as an inferior land—patronage was ruled out—but as a land with much to receive and much to give, a scene for Christian adventure, not only for the missionary but for the civil servant and the engineer and all the host of Britons who are called to the East. And where does the sin enter in this connection? The sin of which this nation must be penitent is simply the difference between the impact it has made and the impact which a really Christian nation would have made. And the sin is grave and oppressive. But is this nation now fit for a world task? "No" was the answer, again and again repeated with each fresh approach. "As we are today, no!" On every hand there is need; the nations of mankind are not satisfied. But who are we to answer this cry? And if it was first of Great Britain the students were thinking, in the same indictment all Christendom is involved.

Industrial Problem to the Front

With the exposure of the sores of the world in all their horror there went an exposure of the evils in this land. That belongs to the same vision of sin. A quarter of a century ago the student movement would not have dealt directly with the entire range of national life as it deals today. Now its teachers see that there is no separation possible between the industrial problems of a people and their spiritual life. The industrial problems are all moral and spiritual, and the student Christians cannot hope to carry the gospel of Christ in all its fullness to all the east, if that gospel is virtually denied at

ome. The indictment of the industrial system was made with authority by Mr. Tawnes, an Oxford tutor and a member of the Labor Party. From so accomplished an economist the counsel came with convincing effect that the Christian church need not be intimidated by any "economic laws" from the attempt to embody the mind of Christ in a better social order. The present order to him was nothing less than a denial of the first principles of Christ's teaching. Nothing in economics forbids the attempt to change this order. If it is unchanged how could the western nations make their true impact upon the East? If their own life is a negation of their creed, how can they commend Christ to others? "Physician heal thyself!" It must not be supposed that the appeal for personal discipleship was neglected in such a setting. Along with the voice of judgment there came the bold and confident claim that in Christ there are resources ample and satisfactory both for the individual life and for society and for the world. The nation is not fit now, but its weakness is not in its Lord; it lies in its own failure to enter into the power and victory pledged to a faithful church. Of this indifferent way, Mr. J. H. Oldham, Dr. Temple, the Bishop-elect of Manchester, the Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. Cairns and others spoke. Dr. Temple delivered a powerful series on "The Universality of Christ," his contention being that the only satisfactory solution of the problems of thought was the spiritual, and the spiritual principle, when it is pressed home, makes demands which are only met in Christ.

A High Doctrine of Christ

From the intellectual side and from the spiritual and moral, there was throughout this conference a bold claim that in Christ the one secret is to be found. No one can accuse the S. C. M., as it is called, of a disregard for modern scholarship. On the contrary, it is suspected of heresy in some of its publications and on its platforms it welcomes men and women of every shade of Christian thought. But there is no doubt whatever that in the church of Christ on this side there is an increasing trend towards a high doctrine of Christ. This is found not only among the more individual believers but among critical scholars; it is a mark of the Free Catholics as well as of the evangelicals. It is shared by high and low. At Glasgow it seemed as though with every new revelation of need there came a new understanding of the incomparable splendor of Christ. With every humiliation endured by his church, there arose a new faith in him. His disciples cannot cast out the evil, but he can.

Miss Maud Royden had a great reception in her denunciation of the war spirit as it reveals itself still. Miss Royden has not yet been given a church in which to preach, but she has a remarkable company everywhere who seek to hear her. The fact that she was a pacifist during the war, if anything, helps her today. Not that the mass of our people have repented of their entrance into the war, but they see more clearly today than ever that war is itself a denial of Christianity, and if they still say that it may be under certain conditions a necessary evil, they now lay emphasis upon "evil"; and they are not in the least angry with the idealist who will not admit the "necessity." Miss Royden ought to be given a pulpit in her own church, the church of England. There are too few voices that can carry so far.

Far Reaching Effects of Student Conference

What ought to be the outcome of such a conference? There were thirty-six nations represented, including a splendid delegation from the U. S. A., whose speeches on Sunday I have had to miss to my great disappointment, through my return home before the end of the conference. To many lands and many universities there will return men and women who have understood the breadth, the peril and the glory of the Christian task. They have come to set things in their right proportion. They have seen the need for a united church and they have tasted in the fellowship of Glasgow the real spirit of that great church of the future. They have heard at the same time the call to live for the Kingdom of God, whether they serve in the industrial life at home or in the mission field. At the outset of the conference, Viscount Grey said that the world might be made better, but only through the devotion of youth to idealism. Looking upon the mighty company of youth, it seemed to me radiantly clear that the world can be changed. And here at the strategic center there were signs that those who had their lives to give, were listening and thinking; and every such life surrendered to the kingdom carries with it a host of lives.

It too should mean new volunteers for the service of the missionary societies. It should mean experiments in industry and a new bearing of the next generation toward the problem of racial relations. It would be a great day for the church of Christ and for the nations of Christendom if all who wear the name of Christ came under the same conviction that was theirs who met in Glasgow.

When John Henry Newman and Richard Hurrell Froude in their youth, as they traveled in the Mediterranean, were seeking a motto, they chose the proud boast, "They will know the difference when we are back." The church and the nation and the world will know the difference when the new generation enters into the scene in full strength. "It is a great thing for a nation to be saved by its youth."

The attempt to introduce the beginnings of forced labor into the Kenya Colony (British East Africa) has met with strong opposition from the British Conference of Missionary Societies. A deputation, headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, has presented a memorial to the colonial minister who has promised to give it his careful attention. It is urged by the memorial that forced labor will be disastrous to the true development of native life, and will prove in East Africa, as it has always proved, bad economics. There is a widespread feeling that the mandatory clauses in the League of Nations Covenant shall be made the guiding principles of our administration. But there are powerful interests on the other side.

The Christian As Citizen *

I ONCE knew a man who was very long on discussing "Baptism" and very short on paying his taxes and voting—he never impressed me as much of a man. It is one thing to learn the multiplication table and quite another to be an honest business man. It is one thing to learn to conjugate a verb and quite another to use pure English in an uplifting manner. It is one thing to master "First Principles" and quite another to be an upright, clean-cut citizen. "First Principles" are all right, but surely one should make some progress. Planting a tree is necessary but the fruit tells the tale. When I buy an apple tree for my orchard I put it in the ground correctly, I prune it correctly, I water it correctly, I enrich it correctly, but after a while I come around asking how many apples there are to sell. In the day of judgment the Lord is not asking about planting, but about fruit. You may say that there never would be any fruit if the tree were not planted rightly and I will counter by saying that the planting amounts to nothing unless fruit appears. I have planted some mighty poor trees and I have cast them into the fire. Other trees have been "merely stuck in," but the fruit has been luscious. "By their fruits you shall know them," "Men do not gather good fruit from bad trees, nor bad fruit from good trees." "So shall you be my disciples, if you bear much fruit." I would like to see the emphasis put upon fruit rather than upon planting. As it stands today we hear many people putting it this way: "So shall you be my disciples if you are planted rightly." It does not always turn out that way. We have been testing too early. Jesus lays the emphasis upon fruit, and he is right, absolutely, unalterably right. People should be tested by character. You say salvation is not by character and you are partly right, but not entirely. No man considers that he is good enough to enter heaven, but heaven has everything to do with character. It is an excellent idea to receive people into fellowship on the basis of character. The test should be fruitage. Devils believe and tremble. Devils can easily go through forms, but to achieve character—that is a slow and difficult thing. When a man or a woman can give unmistakable evidence of Christian experience, when they can show the fruits of love, joy and peace, they bear very good credentials, in my opinion.

Love to God and man is the disposition out of which all good citizenship springs. How are we to love God? With all our heart, soul and might or mind. (1) With all your heart: in the Bible heart is the inclusive term, all will, emotion and intelligence is comprehended. You know what it is to love with all your heart—your whole nature goes out to your child or perhaps to your friend. (2) With all your soul. The greatest thing about a man is his spirit, that flaming torch without which life is dark and dull. You admire the spirit of the football player, you adore the spirit of the soldier, you bow before the spirit of the artist in painting or music, the charming thing about your dearest friend is the spirit. Eye, voice, facial expression only "express" the spirit. You love God with a dedicated spirit. (3) With all your mind. That is clearly intelligence. Recently I listened to Bishop McConnell, who is now resident bishop of Pittsburgh, speak on this theme, "Worshipping God with the Mind." How he did sting ignorance! How he pleaded for culture, study, mastery and high intelligence! Sunday-school teachers who trusted in personal charm and who study little, left smarting under his lash. Pastors who were emotional mostly went away with hanging heads. Laymen who felt smart but who studied little went out to ponder. God may be worshipped with pocketbooks, with horny hands, with devoted lips but also with the mind. But when God is loved men are loved. Always. What happened at Pentecost was that Christians reached up and got the power of God and brought it down here to change men. That is our task. Loving God, we must change men for the better. Evangelization, education, emotion, energy—all head up in citizenship.

BOOKS

HOW TO PRAY. By Charles Lewis Slattery. This little manual belongs to a series of books under the general title of "Church Principles for Lay People." The author finds in the Lord's Prayer the perfect model of prayer for all Christians. A significant feature of the interpretation is the social attitude of the worshipper. The phrase "Our Father" indicates that the attitude of prayer is not that of the lonely mystic but rather of the soul in society. The thoughts of the author are beautifully phrased and the book is a material enrichment of the church's devotional treasures. (Macmillan.)

THE POWER OF PRAYER. By W. P. Patterson and others. The thought of this book arose in war time when the practice of prayer came into fresh prominence. The Walker Trust in connection with St. Andrews' University in Scotland, offered a prize of a hundred pounds for the best essay on prayer and additional prizes for others. The competition was opened to the entire world and 1667 essays were submitted. A group of impartial scholars have sifted these to twenty-two and these form the substance of the book. The winning essay was that of Dr. McComb, Episcopal minister of Baltimore. The essays are not confined to any one religion, Bahaists and orientalists being represented as well as Christians. One of the most valuable features of the book is a chapter devoted to bibliography in which are listed the titles of works on the subject of prayer, probably the most comprehensive bibliography on this subject that has ever been assembled. The book is a gold mine of information and inspiration for the Christian student. (Macmillan.)

GREAT LEADERS OF HEBREW HISTORY. By Henry Thatcher Fowler. This volume was designed for the use of college students and tells the Old Testament stories from a modern viewpoint but in very simple language. While true to modern critical positions, these questions do not represent the main interest of the book. The work is a good example of modern scientific method combined with religious feeling. (Macmillan.)

TWO LIVELY STORIES. For those who like a little fiction with a tang mixed in with their heavier reading, "Resurrection Rock," by Edwin Balmer, and "Black Bartlemy's Treasure," will serve that purpose. Those who have read "The Indian Drum," and "The Broad Highway" by these respective authors, will know what they may expect from the later books. (Little Brown.)

BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE AND CHILDREN. Brand new books for young people are "Tales of Wonder and Magic," fairy tales gathered from many literatures by Katherine Pyle, and "Green Forest Fairy Book," other fairy tales adapted for children ten to fifteen years of age. "Old Granny Fox" is Thornton Burgess's latest wonder book of animal tales for smaller children, and two new Volland books for the same age are "Helping the Weather-Man" and "The Turned-Into's," both examples of the Volland genius for gauging the tastes of child life.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Dr. Manning Elected Bishop of New York

The diocesan convention of New York met on Jan. 26 and from the first it was evident that Dr. William T. Manning would be elected bishop. This actually happened on the third ballot. The sessions were enlivened by a newspaper attack on Dr. Manning in the Hearst papers where he was called the "reverend Britisher." This attempt on the part of the secular press to influence the action of the convention was bitterly resented by the members of the convention and this resentment was voiced in public address. Although born in England, Dr. Manning has lived practically all of his life in this country. He was educated at the University of the South, and holds honorary degrees from a number of American institutions. Born in 1866, he was made a priest in 1891. His first charge was in Redlands, Cal. For two years he was professor of dogmatic theology in the University of the South. In 1908 he became rector of Trinity church of New York which has the distinction of being the richest church in the United States, and perhaps in the world. He has served as the presiding officer of the house of deputies of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal church, and is prominent in all the activities of the church. Theologically Dr. Manning represents the more liberal type of interpretation. He has been greatly interested in Christian unity movements and has been favorable to the Concordat with the Congregationalists. His recent book, "The Call of Unity," indicates his interest. He will head the most influential diocese of his church, and his election will mean much for the growth of theological sanity and the spirit of tolerance in his communion, a development needed in a greater or less measure in every religious communion in America.

Big Electric Sign in Chicago

The Union Methodist church of New York has gotten great aid through the publicity of a great illuminated sign on the church building. First Methodist church, the only evangelical church in the "loop" will also install a great electrical sign in the near future. The pastor of this church is Rev. John Thompson who is also secretary of the city mission organization of the Methodist church. First Methodist church has large property holdings, being the wealthiest Protestant church in the city, so far as accumulated investments are concerned.

General Convention of Religious Education Association

The Religious Education Association first called together by President William Rainey Harper eighteen years ago, continues a live organization in its field. The next General Convention will be held at Rochester, N. Y., on March 10 to 13. Other allied bodies will meet during the days immediately preceding and following. The general theme of the convention program will be "Education for World Fellowship." There will be meetings of the departments for universities and colleges, theological seminaries, pastors, Sunday schools, Week-Day Religious schools, the Family and Community agencies, all developing themes that relate to religious training. It is now fourteen years since the association last met in Rochester; since that time the Religious Education Association has tripled its membership. The headquarters of the Association is maintained in Chicago at 1440 57th St.

Sunday School Papers Merged

There is every indication that the proposed merger of the Established church and the United Free church of Scotland will be consummated. The native conservatism of the Scotch has to be overcome, and there are many legal problems to be solved. One of the recent evidences of the growing sentiment for unity is to be found in the merging of the Sunday school papers of the two communities. The paper for boys and girls under nine is called "Morning Rays" and the one of the children over nine is called "Great Heart."

Evangelistic Plans in Various Denominations

The work of evangelism is the primary interest in the various evangelical denominations during the Lenten period. The churches of Indianapolis will cooperate with Gypsy Smith of England in a series of evangelistic meetings prior to Easter. Chicago Disciple churches will bring the Disciple Secretary of Evangelism, Rev. Jessie M. Bader, to their city for a series of conferences in the near future. In the evangelistic plans and discussions great emphasis is being laid on the instruction of the young in the elements of the gospel through "pastor's classes" and catechism classes, rather than through the use of crowd psychology.

Attorney General Addresses W. C. T. U. Conference

Reformers in the past have often thrown rocks at the officials instead of cooperating with them. The women of the W. C. T. U. are too wise to pursue this course. Recently the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union held a regional conference at the Edgewater Beach Hotel of Chicago at which Edward J. Brundage, attorney general of Illinois, spoke on law enforcement. The official addressed the women on the duties of citizens in cooperating in the enforcement of law, with particular reference to the enforcement of the prohibition law.

Poet at the Annual Meeting

The fellowship of First Christian church is enriched by the presence of some well-known characters. Recently Vachel Lindsey, the poet, who has been connected with this church since boyhood, spoke at the annual meeting of the church on "My Favorite Poems." This church has known how to capitalize its opportunities, and many unique methods have marked the program of the past year. Some candle light services have been held with harp music and chimes as features of the service. The office of the church is right up to date with all of the latest devices such as addressograph, dictaphone, mimeograph and adding machine. The missionary giving the past year has averaged twelve dollars a member. Rev. W. F. Rothenburger is pastor of this church.

Disciples of Detroit Organize

The Disciple churches of Detroit have formed a "United Board" composed of the official board members of the various churches of the city. Through this organization an executive secretary has been appointed in the person of Rev. Frank W. Norton. He will be supported in part by the national organization. The Detroit Disciples are just beginning the city-wide program and have arranged to hold a mass meeting on February 13th when Rev. Perry J. Rice, successful city executive in Chicago, will address the meeting on the function of a city organization of the churches. In Chicago Mr. Rice has made the Chicago Christian Missionary Society a clearing house of the activities of the cooperating churches.

Government of Mexico Friendly to Missionary Work

Bishop Thirkield has just returned from a visit to Mexico. He has had an interview with the recently elected President Obregon. The Bishop laid before the President the Protestant program for education and philanthropy as well as gospel work. From President Obregon he had the promise of cooperation "up to the limits of the law and the constitution." The laws of Mexico are the most unfriendly of any Roman Catholic country in the world, but they were aimed at the Catholic orders of Spain rather than at the Protestant missionary organizations of the United States. With settled conditions in Mexico it seems probable that Protestant work will go forward rapidly. The recent election was held without the presence of soldiers at the polls, and the result was the free choice of the Mexican people. The religion that makes good in Mexico will be the religion of the future for the field is now an open one.

Presbyterians Will Help Denominational Newspapers

The Baptists of the south have been able to secure a great increase in the number of subscribers to their religious papers, which have in many cases been bought up by the state conventions. The southern Presbyterians put on a one week drive beginning Feb. 6 in which they will undertake to secure many new subscribers. Each denominational journal of the south will print many thousands of extra copies and these will be mailed out to selected lists of lay people. The pastor will preach on the service of the denominational paper and this will be followed by a canvas of the denomination by the woman's auxiliary in the church. This is the fifth project in the list of eight denominational objectives to be worked out in the denominational program this year. This program among southern Presbyterians is called the Presbyterian Progressive Program.

Church Printing Outfits

The want ads appearing in the preacher magazines indicate a lively traffic in printing outfits. Nearly every church must have a weekly bulletin these days, and the other needs of even a small parish run the printing bill up to five hundred dollars a year and more. Many ministers have installed small Gordon presses in the parish house, and use the boys of the parish, more frequently the boys of the manse, to get out the required printing. One of the most recent to install such a printing outfit is Rev. H. T. Reinke, pastor of Park Avenue Presbyterian Church of Pittsburgh. The high price of printing at the present time is increasing the interest of the churches in this money-saving device.

More Expensive Church Buildings the Rule

Not only the rising cost of building, but also the more elaborate tastes of the people, seems responsible for the more expensive church buildings that are being erected in various parts of the country. First Baptist church in Dallas, Tex., is completing plans for a sanctuary to cost a million dollars. This will probably be the finest Protestant church building west of the Allegheny mountains. The pastor of this church is Dr. George W. Truett, who speaks to a great congregation every Sunday.

Articles on the Bible Stir Protest

One of the central problems in every one of the larger evangelical bodies is the difference between the faith of the ministers and the faith of the people. Most laymen have been trained to think in the older conceptions of the Bible. They are not altogether comfortable in these conceptions and often come to their ministers for help, but they often reject the help that is given. The "Congregationalist" has been publishing recently a series of articles on the Bible by Rev. Frank M. Sheldon. He presented a series of interpretations which are familiar to every minister who has been reading modern books on the Bible. These articles have been read by lay churchmen of one of the most progressive of the evangelical denominations. In a symposium on the articles which the "Congregationalist" published, it is evident that there has been widespread dissatisfaction with the point of view. This fact indicates one of the great sources of weakness in the evangelical denominations. The minister holds to different conceptions from his people and when he even timidly undertakes to present his views, he is branded as a trouble maker. Until the minister learns constructive and pedagogical methods of presenting his views and until laymen learn tolerance, there will be weakness and hesitation in evangelical ranks.

Unitarianism to be Centrally Organized

The passion for centralization is at work in all of the religious communions. During the past year the Roman Catholics formed an organization in which the heads of their various auxiliary societies might come together. The Disciples of Christ went farther than any other organization in actually merging the organizations engaged in missions and philanthropy. The Methodists now have a central board of strategy in connection with their centenary movement. The Unitarians who have recently completed a successful national campaign for funds, have formed the Central Council in which the various denominational boards are represented. This centralization tends to prevent competition of organizations within the denomination and provides a council table where the denominational strategy may be intelligently discussed. This centralization may be away from democracy, but it is in the direction of efficiency. Free churchmen now have ecclesiastics with far more power than a bishop ever has.

Congregational Losses Through Absenteeism

All of the great religious organizations of America have an increasing loss from absenteeism in the church. The loss from death among the Congregationalists remains nearly constant over a period of sixty years, being at the present time approximately 1.4 per cent per annum. Two years ago the loss through absenteeism in the Congregationalist churches was two-fifths of one per cent per annum. In 1919 this loss had grown until it was 3.7 per cent per annum. A graph has been prepared by Rev. Frederic L. Bagley showing the change in each decade. Most of the change has come within the past twenty

If He Had Been Bishop

DR. PERCY STICKNEY GRANT is one of the most fearless liberal preachers in the fellowship of the Protestant Episcopal church, since the expulsion of Dr. Crapsey. While the election of a bishop for the diocese of New York was pending he preached on the matter and declared that candidates for the office should announce a platform so their positions might be known. Though not himself a candidate, he gave the Episcopalians of New York a thrill by announcing what would be his platform if he were a candidate. A part of his statement was directed against the historic creeds. In this connection he said: "Thousands of clergymen would welcome freer formularies. They entered the priesthood or ministry stimulated by the adolescent idealism of self-improvement and human service. The gateway of intellectual belief into the ministry was narrow, but their church authorities almost guaranteed the truth of the debatable doctrines. So these young men accepted dubious beliefs, treating them as ancient historical monuments not to be destroyed; or they allegorized them; or they attenuated them by some form of philosophy which proves that black is white; or they secured mental peace by claiming the rights of suspended judgment, while about some physiological sides of belief they were frankly humorous and said, 'How should I know?'"

The platform on which Dr. Grant would run for bishop if he ever ran is as follows:

"1. I will vote to put the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds in the back of the Prayer Book with the Athanasian Creed, and the thirty-nine Articles, and not require them as a part of the Morning and Evening Prayer or Communion service.

"2. I advise a further revision of the Prayer Book that would not ask questions in the baptism service that are now asked—a belief in the Articles of the Christian Faith, as contained in the Apostles' Creed, which no mature and educated person today can assent to without stultifying reservations, and no clergyman can ask without mental mortification. In fact, I believe there should be a revision of the Prayer Book to take out of it the latitude of ignorance toward natural science and toward social and political organizations that are common-places today.

"3. I will work to bring about a proportional representation in General Convention.

"4. I stand upon a social and economic platform for the Church, at least as broad and progressive as that announced in the recent English Lambeth Conference or the output of the Methodist Church and of the Catholic Church.

"5. I promise to advise in my pastoral letter and to attempt to organize the diocese and the parishes so that the weight of financial management shall not be placed upon the clergy, untrained in business methods, but upon business men. The financial committee in each parish and the financial committee of the diocese should take charge of their respective budget requirements and secure funds as they would for any other purpose they consider important, without asking the initiative or cooperation of the clergy.

"6. I regret that if elected I shall have to live in a $300,000 house, and have to conduct services in a $15,000,000 cathedral. The interest charges, to say nothing about up-keep, will amount to nearly $1,000,000 a year.

"7. I will approve of no church legislation that contravenes or tends to undermine the law of the land, as, for instance, in the matter of marriage and divorce. And I will urge in all church usages (even in the sacraments) obedience to modern sanitary codes."

years. One seventh of the members of the Congregational denominations are now inactive. The Congregational Commission in Evangelism is seeking the advice of Congregational pastors everywhere on methods to prevent this great loss.

Book Brings Money for Labrador

Dr. Grenfell has supported his work in Labrador through the years largely by lecturing and writing. His recently published autobiography has proven a great success and is now in the sixth edition. Many of the readers of the book have wished to become supporters of the mission, and in this way the book has become doubly profitable. Recently a lady of the middle west who was a complete stranger to Dr. Grenfell completed the book, and then sent the doctor a check for ten thousand dollars.

Takes His Vacation in the Winter

Summer vacations for ministers are the conventional thing but Rev. John Ray Ewers, pastor of East End church, Pittsburgh, is likely to do the unconventional. He has arranged this year to take his vacation in February and his pulpit supply committee has drafted a number of Chicago preachers to supply his pulpit during that month. On February 6, Rev. Orvis F. Jordan, pastor of Evanston Disciple church, will preach. Rev. C. C. Morrison, of The Christian Century, will preach on February 20 and Rev. Perry J. Rice, secretary of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society will fill the pulpit on Feb. 27. Mr. Ewers refuses more offers of special appointments than he accepts and he often speaks in the neighboring churches of Pittsburgh of all denominations. His address on "The Religion of David Lloyd George" has been deservedly popular this winter.

Where Are the People on Sunday Evening?

The churches of Aberdeen, S. D., got interested in the question, "Where Do the People Spend Sunday Evening?" A reporter was sent to the various moving picture houses of the city. The ushers in the churches counted the church audiences. It was shown that the attendance at the movie shows was greater than the attendance in the churches. At the same time it was shown that much over half of the population was in neither place. Contrary to the ordinary impression, it would seem that there are a lot of people who like to stay at home for a quiet Sunday with their families.

University Considers Welfare of Rural Church

The University of Ohio promotes every year an Ohio County Life Conference. This conference was held this year at Columbus, Feb. 2-4. Wednesday was devoted to church problems while on other days consideration was given to schools and community betterment. B. F. Lamb, secretary of the Ohio Federation of churches, spoke on "The Rural Church Situation in Ohio." Arthur T. Arnold, secretary of the Ohio Sunday School Association, spoke on "Religious Education in Rural Communities."

Sunday School Bus Comes Into Use

The consolidated school with its use of the auto bus is now an institution in many sections of the country. Churches have been greatly multiplied for the same reason that rural schools used to be multiplied on account of the inability of little children to walk long distances. Euclid Heights Presbyterian

Time To Stop

THE different theological tendencies in the Protestant Episcopal church reveal themselves in every practical proposal. Broad church and high church do not see eye to eye on any proposition. While the Protestant element in the church seeks a better understanding with Congregationalists, and will go a long way to get it, the high church party is very enthusiastic over the prospect of unity with the Orthodox church of Greece, the Balkans and Russia. The Churchman, the progressive organ of the communion, has recently spoken some very plain words to the committee that is negotiating the union with the Orthodox church. This editorial is likely to make church history. The Churchman says:

"The president of the commission of General Convention to confer with Eastern Orthodox and Old Catholic churches has, perhaps, shown more imagination, undaunted by facts, than has yet been exhibited in the Protestant Episcopal church by any chairman of any committee appointed by any General Convention. The bishop of Harrisburg has become a power in the Balkans, of no mean dimensions. We are proud of the distinction which he has won in that unhappy quarter of the globe and of the pleasures which have come to him as a figure in the shifting political scenes of Eastern Europe.

"But has not the time come for some one to remind Bishop Darlington and those with whom he is conferring in the Near East that, whatever may be said and written during the amenities of these delightfully picturesque excursions, the Protestant Episcopal church is quite likely to determine its course, when the time comes for it to do so, in a way which may be damaging to the prestige of the committee and its energetic president?

"We may seem to be lacking in magnanimity when we project such gloomy forecasts at a moment when our desk is filled with news accounts of the splendid pageants which took place a fortnight ago in many of our American churches under Dr. Darlington's happy inspiration. Pageants truly they were, though our correspondents groped blindly for the right words to depict the splendor of the thing they saw in our chancels when unity between Greek Orthodox and Protestant Episcopalians was made manifest as these distinguished prelates walked beside us and took their places in the sanctuary. After such pageants, manifestations of unity with plain, black-frocked Presbyterians and Congregationalists will seem an anticlimax in art.

"We could not write thus if we took the Russo-Greek churches' concordat seriously. We confess the worst at the start. We do not take it seriously. We almost tremble to say that we consider the Russo-Greek churches fair fields for missionary enterprise. Many think this; it is, therefore, well that it should be said; for none of the active members of the Commission to confer with Eastern Orthodox and Old Catholic Churches has seemed to resent certain assumptions of the Russo-Greek prelates. They have treated our commission as suppliants. Perhaps this is the fault of the commission. We think it is. Our committee has gone into conference with the Near East apparently with nervous eagerness to persuade the hierarchy that we are a validly Christian church. The Greeks, of course, with the courtesy native to their race, have examined this little group of American Episcopalians with their credentials in their hands. Where they found us lacking, the committee docilely gave promise that we would doubtless supply the lack. But we shall come to that later.

"It is a minor matter; but our committee must be aware that the Protestant world has long entertained a prejudice that there are some vital lacks in the Greek church. Their 'orders' have for centuries seemed to suffer detriment when measured by the validity test of Matthew VII, 20, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' It has seemed to us in the west that the hold of the Orthodox prelates on the essential meaning of the Incarnation has been rather insecure. We regret, therefore, that Bishop Darlington and the commission of which he is president did not, when the question of the validity of our orders was under discussion, with Occidental bluntness ask of these prelates the privilege of sending American missionaries—Presbyterian, Congregational or Episcopalian—to convey to the Russo-Greek priests the fact that the west conceives Christian ethics to be both the test and the fruit of the doctrine of the Incarnation."

Church of Los Angeles covers a large territory, and recently the Sunday school installed an auto bus. The result of the experiment had been very favorable. In four weeks the attendance has increased from 132 to 288. The success of this experiment has suggested that it is possible to organize in a community a consolidated religious school serving people of various denominations and in a considerable area provided the school bus were put to work in the cause of religion.

New Dean for Disciples Divinity House

THE trustees of the Disciples Divinity House for the University of Chicago announce that Dr. W. E. Garrison has accepted the position of Dean to succeed Dr. Herbert L. Willett who resigned some months ago on the occasion of his acceptance of a secretaryship of the Federal Council of Churches. The new dean will begin his work on April 1. This announcement immediately following the completion of a fund of $200,000 to house the work of the Hyde Park church and the Disciples Divinity House makes it certain that this institution for graduate training of ministers is about to enter upon a new era in its history.

Dr. W. E. Garrison is well known among Disciples, being the son of Dr. J. H. Garrison, for years the editor of the Christian Evangelist. He took an A. B. degree at Eureka college in 1892 and later at Yale. He received his B. D. and Ph. D. degrees at the University of Chicago, being in the earliest group of students that gathered at Chicago to study with President William Rainey Harper. He has had a varied experience both as executive and instructor. He served in the Disciples' Divinity House once before as an assistant instructor, and later taught church history at Butler College. He has been president of Butler College, president of the New Mexico College of Agriculture and founder and president of the Claremont School for Boys. During the year 1903-4 he served as president of the American Christian Education Society. In New Mexico his gifts were recognized by his appointment as a member of the constitutional convention.

As a writer, Dr. Garrison has produced two books, one called "Wheeling through Europe," and the other "The Theology of Alexander Campbell." The latter is still the authoritative interpretation of the writings of the early leader of the Disciples' movement. He has served as assistant editor of the Christian Evangelist and in many other ways has contributed to the periodical literature.

Dr. Garrison has not yet announced his schedule for the spring. It is thought that he may decide to spend three months in visiting colleges and universities in studying the situation as it relates to graduate instruction for the ministry. It is already announced that he will teach during the summer quarter at the university.

It is the hope of the Disciples Divinity House to have a group of instructors at the University of Chicago who will contribute their part to an interdenominational program of theological instruction. The Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples, Universalists and Unitarians all maintain theological instruction at the university, and these schools interchange courses in such a way as bring together one of the greatest theological faculties in the world.

The courses of the Disciples Divinity House have been given in the university buildings during previous years, but it is expected that the Divinity House building will be erected this coming year. This will provide class rooms and a center for social life for the students of theology at the University of Chicago.

The Bernard Shaw of Nonconformity; leader of the New Catholicism; a God-illuminated preacher.

S. PARKES CADMAN

A Rooseveltian personality in the pulpit—man of amazing industry, fabulous vocabulary, and infinite brotherliness.

CHARLES E. JEFFERSON

A quiet thinker, a wise leader, a great preacher who grew up on Broadway.

E. L. POWELL

An historic ministry at the gateway of the South. Today, as in the days of Elijah, fire is the sign of God.

R. J. CAMPBELL

From the City Temple to Westminster; a pilgrim soul in a troubled age.

JOHN A. HUTTON

A man of letters in the pulpit; a preacher who searches like a surgeon and heals like a physician.

BISHOP WILLIAM A. QUAYLE

Humor, pathos, literature, life made incandescent by a spiritual genius who is also unveneered human being.

SAMUEL McCHORD CROTHERS

A compound of Charles Lamb, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Isaiah, and much else besides.

T. R. GLOVER

A layman who is a Doctor of Divinity; an orator with an atrocious elocution; a scholar who knows more than any man has a right to know.

Other names such as Harry Emerson Fosdick, Burris A. Jenkins, Edgar DeWitt Jones, Frederick F. Shannon, Lynn Harold Hough, Studdert Kennedy, and still others of the younger set accused of being great preachers—and each found guilty—will be included in the series.

A Lenten Prayer of Confession

THOU God of perfect holiness and grace, in Thy presence the spirit of mortal man cannot be proud. We draw near to Thine altar to commune with Thee, but we cannot endure the light of Thy face save as we come bringing sincere and humble confession of our sins. We have done those things that we ought not to have done. Turn not Thy face away from us, though we be unworthy, but hear the cry of our hearts for cleansing and for pardon. Judge us, O Lord, not as our fellows judge us, nor yet as in all integrity of conscience we must judge ourselves, but look upon us with that pitying goodness which, while it condemns our sin, yet gives us fresh power to overcome it.

Often have we wandered into wrong-doing thoughtlessly—Thou knowest how thoughtlessly! Canst Thou forgive our careless ways? Forgive us by teaching us to profit by our experience and to learn wisdom in the very things our thoughtlessness has made us suffer. Create in us the habit of spiritual awareness. Make us sensitive to moral values. Quicken not only our will to do the right but our intelligence to discover the right and to avoid the wrong.

We confess not only those sins that grow to full ripeness in our acts, but all nascent sins that lie growing from day to day in the unclean thoughts of our hearts. Forgive us our hidden sins of the mind, our dark imaginings, all lustful and covetous musings, all selfish and unsympathetic judgments upon others. Purify and sweeten our inner life. As Thou dost forgive our misdeeds, cleanse the sources of our misdeeds that out of our hearts may issue goodness like that which is in Thee.

Yet, Lord, save us from too much thought upon sin and our proneness to it. Show us how we are to overcome evil with good, and may our minds delight to dwell upon those things that are noble and beautiful and of good report. May we keep close fellowship with Christ, to know whom is our best defense against the lusts of the flesh. In his name. Amen.

Waiting for the Stragglers to Catch up

NO denomination in America has been more forward in the cause of union than the Presbyterian. Yet there are Presbyterians who are opposed not only to the Philadelphia plan for organic union—the product, chiefly, of Presbyterian activity—but even to cooperation with the Federal Council. The Presbyterian Banner advocates complete separation from the federation movement. Disciples are painfully conscious of a wide chasm between the views of their conservatives and progressives, the former knowing no kind of union save by doctrinal conquest while the latter declare that the church is already one and its divisive distinctions are maintained by non-essential differences. Even among Congregationalists there are reactionaries and conservatives. In any of these bodies a very small minority may threaten the success of any union movement. A large majority of Canadian Presbyterians have long favored union with Congregationalists and Methodists in the dominion. Yet the fear of schism has prevented any definite steps being taken. Progressive leaders of all these denominations are compelled to wait for the stragglers to catch up. Meanwhile the work of teaching must go on. Probably union needs to be promoted more democratically than heretofore. Instead of so much attention being given to negotiations between ecclesiastical dignitaries, local communities should be making experiments in cooperation. Community churches need not always wait on the action of overhead denominational organizations. Every successful community church will tend to hasten the negotiations of the high up officials. The cause of Christianity proceeds best by education in its fundamental principles, and by carrying on experiments which will discover for all the path of ultimate success.

The Movies and Profits

THE effect of the movies upon child life has come to be a matter of serious concern to people all over the land. This interest is reflected by The Outlook in a recently published article bearing the title, "The World's Worst Failure." The author of this article believes that the movie promoters faced a great opportunity which they have utterly failed to grasp. In the February Pictorial Review the influence of the movie upon juvenile delinquency is dealt with. The thing that is wrong with movie shows is the thing that happens to all commercialized amusement. The horse race was once the diversion of gentlemen. Through commercialization it became the tool of gamblers. The movie business of the country has fallen into the hands of the big producers. The people of any city have little control over the pictures that are sent to them. They are on a circuit, and the pictures are sent out over the circuit by the syndicate. At the heads of these syndicates one will find for the most part Jewish capitalists. These men have but little feeling for either Christian or Jewish ideals. Their motto is profits, and they are getting profits as every one knows. Not satisfied with legitimate profits they are killing the goose that lays the golden egg. Public favor is being alienated for the quick profits that come to questionable pictures. Around Chicago there have been a series of outrages against women by supposed morons. Few of these morons are ever caught. One wonders that half-witted men so successfully elude the police. Is there a connection between this fact and the pictures which so often present attempted rape? Douglas Fairbanks appears this winter in "Zorro," a picture in which the heroine is abducted and rescued repeatedly. Gunplay and violence against womanhood may bring box receipts, but they cannot win the approval of thoughtful parents.

"Better Books for the Home"

AN examination of the ordinary home library shows a shocking deterioration from the days of our fathers. Instead of books of devotion, biography and history, we now find the reprint editions of the ephemeral novels. Of these scarcely one in fifty could by any stretch of the imagination be considered as a contribution to literature. The theme in them is generally the sex motive. It is upon such pabulum that thousands of families of children are being brought up. Unless one is cynic enough to believe that reading has no influence upon life, we must expect a harvest from these home libraries. Meanwhile the world never had a better supply of wholesome and interesting books. There are clean adventure stories for boys, and books for girls that lay hold wholesomely upon the imagination. For the adult there is a wealth of biography and popular science and a sufficient range of decent fiction. For the elders there are great books in economics, sociology, poetry and drama. For all there are sane and inspiring religious books written in a far different style from that of the old-time Sunday School library book in which the good little boy always died and went to heaven. There are some books which the ordinary home can afford to borrow from the public library, but there are others that belong in the household. An encyclopedia helps to answer the school-boy's honest questions. The price of one automobile tire will provide mental pabulum for a whole year. No family can maintain an intellectual or cultural atmosphere without owning its own books and reading them. Good books are unfailing life teachers.

Oriental Interpretation of Christianity

THE student of church history is soon made aware of the great difference between the Christianity of Jesus and Paul and the Christianity of the historic creeds, particularly the Nicene and Athanasian creeds. Christianity conquered the Greek-speaking countries, but they in turn hellenized Christianity. It is this hellenized Christianity, still further modified by later racial characteristics, that is practiced in the western world. And now when Christianity is taken back to the Orient, it is this hellenized brand that is taken. It always seems like a foreign religion in India or in China. And it always will seem so until the natives are allowed to make their own interpretation of it. The native Christians, representing a number of the denominations, have gotten together in South India and have agreed upon a basis of fellowship for an Indian church. Even representatives of the Episcopal church were present, and western denominational differences were not allowed to stand in the road of an Indian interpretation of Christianity. The Christian Sadhu, or holy man, is making his appearance, a figure unknown in the western world. Recently Sadhu Sunder Singh visited England and the United States, and was everywhere received with curiosity as though he were representative of some new religion. Yet he is simply a Christian who has Christianized instead of abandoning the temperament and characteristics indigenous to Indian life. One of the first developments in China, as soon as the supporting denominations lose control, will be an adjustment with Confucianism. There are many things in Confucian ethics which are Christian in quality, and the sharp antithesis once drawn between Confucianism and Christianity is regarded by intelligent missionaries as unnecessary. The mission boards which direct the missionary operations are in many cases aware of the need of giving missionaries more liberty, but missionary giving is still too precarious to allow the administrators of missions to go as far as they might if their constituencies were better informed. The task is still conceived of in terms of turning orientals to occidental modes of religious thought. This all the missionary money in the world could never do. Jesus and Paul were orientals. The final oriental reinterpretation of Christianity may conceivably be better Christianity than ours.

Curbing the Public Dance

THERE seems to be a unanimous conviction that the public dance hall is an evil. Once more the commercialization of a recreation has obscured its possible good, and developed a horrid brood of evils. One wonders how long it will be before the state will take over recreation just as it has taken over education, and forbid the exploitation of the youth of the land by an appeal to the lower instincts. John J. Phelan has recently presented in the Survey a resume of investigations which he has made with regard to the dance halls of various cities of America. From his investigations he has formulated a set of dance law regulations which will be recommended to the cities of the land. Among the regulations are these: Girls under eighteen not to be allowed in dance halls; the halls to close at eleven o'clock; liquor to be barred, and the dance hall violating this provision to lose its license; policewomen to attend the dances and curb any tendency to impropriety. Former mayor of Chicago and former governor of Illinois, Edward F. Dunne, has declared that no organized evil of the city, not excepting the saloon, ruined as many girls as the public dance halls. The churches in days gone by have tried to abolish the dance entirely. This sweeping policy does not enlist the support of Christian people as it formerly did. Something could be accomplished if the Christian forces stood together for the municipal restriction of the dance halls. Even though a churchman in his heart might desire more, he would do better to take half a loaf than to have no bread. The dance in the home under the supervision of elders is one thing. The dance that mixes up young people who are strangers to each other is quite another thing. There are no worse hell-holes in the great cities than some seemingly respectable places where the male vampire stalks his victim.

Mothers Who Work at Night

WOMEN who work at night have been the subject of study on the part of the National Consumers League. The League is committed to the idea of revealing to consumers the conditions under which their goods are produced and marketed. It has often furnished white lists of houses which could be commended for their fair dealing with labor. The blacklist is illegal and perhaps less effective than the white list any way. One of the most recent studies carried on by this splendid organization is that presented by Agnes de Lima, the research secretary. The city of Passaic, N. J., has many textile industries. These pay low wages to men and relatively high wages to women. The investigator went from home to home to secure something better than statistics, the human facts about a hundred working mothers. This investigator says with regard to her visitations: "Take almost any house in the non-residence section, knock at almost any door, and you will find a weary, tousled woman, half dressed, doing her housework, or trying to snatch an hour or two of sleep after her long night of work in the mill. Most of these women are Poles, Hungarians or Russians—in fact only one woman seen by the investigator was American born. They speak little English, and the information gathered from them is often most elementary. The facts are there, however, for anyone to see, the hopeless and exhausted woman, her cluttered three or four rooms, the swarm of sickly and neglected children." The law of England has prohibited night work for women for seventy-six years and fourteen civilized nations of Europe have since 1910 had a trade agreement which forbids the production of goods by the night work of women. The United States has not joined in these agreements because of lack of power on the part of the federal government to control labor conditions. Thus because of a loophole in the law we still have states in which practices are continued that have been outlawed by the civilized world.

The Prohibition Movement in Scotland

THE initial prohibition referendums in Scotland have been completed. The results seem disappointing when viewed from the vantage point of complete prohibition as it has been attained in America. It is a time, however, to revive the old slogan of the fighting prohibitionists, "Every saloon killed is victory." The Scotch prohibitionists killed some 300 saloons, or public houses, as they call them. That is all clear gain, and the campaign was gain as a means of education. The thin end of the wedge is driven in. Prohibition progress is a war of many years duration, and in killing 300 saloons the Scotch warriors have registered substantial gain and have placed their lines in advantageous position for the next drive. Britons move slowly away from old things. They may move however with the relentless progress of a glacier. In this first skirmish every weapon that money, politics, ancient habit and the temperament of conservatism could command did battle with all the power it possessed. It was the intention to "scotch" the movement in its beginnings. The "trade" spent millions. Every prejudice that a post-war spirit of reaction could rally was utilized, among them an anti-Americanism that is somewhat strident in some quarters just now. The temperance forces also had certain Anglican church as well as Roman Catholic influences contending against them. "Bishops and brewers" is still an unfortunate alliteration in British public matters. Besides, we must remember that it required 55 per cent of the total vote to eject a saloon and that this 55 per cent must be at least 35 per cent of the total electorate, voting or not. Furthermore, there were three propositions before the voters, which carried the possibility of near-prohibitionists taking the middle course the effect of which would limit the number of saloons without abolishing them all. Thus we can understand how Glasgow could register 148,343 votes for prohibition against 182,500 votes for continuing the present number of licenses, and yet only four wards go dry. The dries had a big handicap in the electoral privilege as well as in the ancient habit and the conservative temper. With 300 saloons killed and no losses on the other side the verdict is victory.

The Public Impotence of Religion

THE title is not ours. It was formulated by that powerful theologian, Principal Forsyth, for an article which was published in The Christian Century two years ago. We can find no other title which adequately matches the thesis of the present editorial, and so we take it for our own. As one looks back upon the ecumenical calamity of the world war and the appalling reaction following it, nothing is more remarkable than the public impotence of religion. Often it was said that if the religious forces of the world had been mobilized and made effective, the war could have been prevented. Perhaps so; nobody can tell what would have happened if something else had not occurred. As a fact it was not so. Instead, in each land the church fell in behind the politicians and militarists and was content to be a follower, not a leader, an ambulance picking up the wounded and burying the dead—a ministry which the Highest did not disdain, but which is manifestly not the highest ministry.

Of course the war did not create that situation; it simply disclosed it. The inability of Christianity to reform the world on a large scale, to hold the attention of the laborer, to keep the respect of the lover of science, to convince the heart and mind of the student of literature or art, had long been suspected, but the war revealed it—like a star-shell over no man's land. Must we admit that Christianity has failed, alike in intellectual command and in moral leadership? No. Is the world more wicked than ever it has been before? No. Take any age in the past, and the things which it tolerated as matters of course fill us with horror. Is it because the world is more hardened against religious influence? No. There is a widespread desire for a personal hold on spiritual reality. Indeed, it is an age of great religiosity, when the unseen is not denied, nay, is courted, but courted often by occult, a-moral, if not uncanny, means.

What, then, is the matter? In working among the soldiers during the war it was found, when one got to the real mind of the men, that their indifference to the church was due to one of two things, either selfish indulgence or unbelief. More often it was the former—the long lie in the morning, an unwillingness to surrender to the moral demands of Christianity—these more than all else. But among many thoughtful and responsible men, spiritually alive and morally noble, it was an inability to accept the creed of the church, which they found to be either unintelligible or incredible. The truth is that we live in a new universe. The man at the plow, and the child in the school, see things in a different aspect and in mutual relations different from those in which their grandfathers saw them. The sun, the stars, the solid earth, the framework of society, the organization of the world, the standard of criticism that governs the search for truth, the ideals of life—all are transformed. The widespread intellectual defection from the church is caused by the plain fact that the church has not yet interpreted this new universe in terms of Christian faith. Today, not only has a nobler idea of God to be disentangled from old beliefs, but the new world, in the innumerable ways in which it bears upon the individual, the family, the community, must be shown to be in harmony with the will of God the Father of Jesus. Here lies the task of the Christian thinker, and it will be accomplished by the inspiration of the Spirit in the minds of men ready to be thus employed; but it will be hard work.

Howbeit, our point now is that the public situation in the world has outgrown the current type of religion and the conventional form of its activities. It is the poverty—the stridency in some, the huskiness in others—of our type of religion that is the source of the lack of influence on the part of all churches in all lands. Whether in the making of war or the making of peace the church is not an inspiration. It is an irrelevance. It does not signify. Whereas religion should be a big business and a moving, creative power in the affairs of the world, it is little more than a sideshow. There is an appalling contrast between the inner wealth of Christianity and its outward futility, its private triumph and its public failure. The position we have reached is well assessed by a recent writer:

Today there is better thinking and writing on social or national subjects than there ever was in the world before. But its eye is not on the history of the whole soul. To read it, you would not guess that we were in a Christian country with a long Christian tradition shaping its society. You would receive the impression that its religion had no more to do with its affairs than a harem, that is kept behind the purdah. Hardly any reference is made to the eternal Kingdom of God, and no express guidance is taken from distinctive principles of the ethics of the Kingdom.

When we ask why this is so, the reason is not far to seek for those who have eyes to discern. For one thing, the church has developed noble personal character, but it has failed to construe its faith, or its society, or its Saviour from the one idea which was his own creative and organizing center—the Kingdom of God, the action in men and nations of the sovereign righteousness and holy love of God in the practical affairs of the world. It has not taught that the greatest thing man can do, either as an individual or as a community, is moral worship, to hallow the holy name; and that this is not simply to be done on set occasions and in sacred buildings—by rapt emotion and mystic ecstasy—but in the moral purpose and trend of affairs great and small. In short, that our worship must be great moral action, and that great moral action is worship.

Men and nations have not been taught that they are here, in chief, not to give effect to their own genius, but to serve the one invincible destiny of the Kingdom of God, to seek that first, and to wait on God and work for him, instead of seeking to exploit, if not to commandeer, him in behalf of their own ends. These words from Principal Forsyth tell, in flashes, the truth of the matter:

Our religion belongs too much to the religion of indulgence, exemption, and immunity. Piety takes the place of faith. Love becomes an affectional infinite instead of a moral absolute. The note of sovereignty vanishes from religion, the note of control from ethics. We are melted without being moulded. We have a temperamental piety instead of moral insight, moral redemption. Religion is too mobile, too subjective, too pliant—just as in the days of a more formal orthodoxy it was too stiff and intellectual, with the hard impotence instead of the soft. It eases but does not cure the public case. It is for easy edification more than hard obedience. We detach individual experience from the immanent and irresistible righteousness of God, with its almost automatic judgment on godless civilization. A church catholic is sought otherwise than by a church holy. We lose the note of moral majesty. We lose the vision of nations in solemn covenant round the great white throne. We are fumbling at a social, national, international religion with the small key of a private piety and a provincial faith.

Again, if we go further and ask why private salvation does not mean public redemption, the answer is that at the heart of the present unrest and discord lies a right instinct baffled by a false philosophy of life. We are feeling our way slowly toward a new and more human order of society; we see dimly what is needed but we cannot reach it, because of the material-mindedness that still clings to us. The gulf which really affects our thinking and our living is that which divides the spiritual side of life, which we believe in and value, from its practical and public concerns. In the lives of many noble and true men there seems to be no actual or necessary relation between these two things. One man has no theology, and no use for God; and yet his life is full of spiritual atmosphere. Another is a sincere and orthodox Christian; and yet his life seems to move on the dullest material plane. A third has his creed on one side and his spiritual sensibilities on the other, but with scarcely any real interaction between them. All three would protest against the charge of material-mindedness; but, as a fact, all equally exemplify it and help to perpetuate it in others.

What we have failed to get clear is the relation between what is spiritual and what is practical. We think of "the spiritual" either as an inherent quality in things to be brought out, or a glamor floating about them. In effect we reduce it to the level and nature of matter, making it something that can be spread, like butter, on things, or extracted, like honey, out of them. Which means that we think in terms of matter, and are still, in principle, material-minded, as much as the men who live in their gross pleasures, or in their stocks and shares. The proof is our failure to "walk by the spirit" in practical concerns. To be "practical" a man feels he must deal in the material. He will acknowledge that a problem—like making peace, for example—is spiritual, and that the only final cure for labor troubles is the prevalence of the spirit of Christ; but he will start to work to that end with material remedies, political or economic. To seem to pin his faith to spiritual influences would be to write himself off as a visionary at once.

So there has been a strange mishandling and undervaluing of the spiritual factor: not that politicians and men of business are necessarily devoid of spiritual perception, but because material-mindedness holds the field. We lower the spiritual to the level of a force—potent, it may be, but too elusive for practical affairs—instead of realizing, as Carlyle said, that the spiritual everywhere creates the practical, and would shape it if we were brave enough to trust it and wise enough to use it. For the Christian man—one for whom, as for St. Paul, "to live is Christ"—this is an intolerable condition, the more so when secular prophets are today prescribing for our shattered civilization a return to God. Everywhere this tragic hiatus confronts us, because we find it so difficult to pass from the spiritual factor to the practical undertaking. For, manifestly, to bridge that gulf is the first step towards any reconstruction that aspires to be based on and made fruitful by the creative and consecrative power of religion. As well neglect the air in seeking to solve the problems of aviation as to hope to solve our social problems otherwise than by bringing the things of matter and sense into subjection to the spirit.

If we go a step still further and ask how this is to be brought about, we must look the facts in the face. First, it cannot be done all at once, any more than the world can be evangelized in a day; but we have made remarkable progress toward it in recent years. In recent years, we say, because the emphasis upon the social meanings of Christianity is new among us. Even yet it is looked at askance by those who, as Samuel Butler used to say, are "equally horrified at hearing the Christian religion doubted, or at seeing it practiced." Second, more and more we see that it is not enough to redeem individuals and expect all things to right themselves; for that fails unless the regenerative forces of the gospel can be more fully organized and applied to social ends. Often enough a company of men, each of whom is a loyal and true-hearted Christian, will do in their corporate capacity what not one of them would do as an individual. They think the two standards different; the responsibility is distributed, if not attenuated; and so we find followers of Christ acting, in politics and business, as if they were disciples of Machiavelli. In the same way, a nation of Christians would not be a Christian nation, unless its people had learned to carry their spiritual-mindedness into public-mindedness. For it is in our corporate life that we lag furthest behind our vision and faith.

For the conquest of communal life by the Christian ideal we must have faith, and yet again faith, in spiritual influences, and trust in spiritual methods. Two instruments are at hand, personal character and public opinion: to quicken and cultivate the spiritual quality in men, and to educate and organize the finer mind of the community. The individualists of old were content to receive; the social Christianity of today puts all the emphasis on giving and doing. Neither, alone, fulfils the Christian ideal, which is that of an instrument receiving and distributing the gift of abundant life. Wesley was right when he said that "the Bible knows nothing of a private religion," and our religion has been so much a private mysticism that it is impotent in public life. If we have been thinking of the Kingdom of Heaven as only an inner experience, or else as a visionary city suspended in the sky—something to be longed for, but never realized—we must "repent," that is, change our way of thinking. Today, as of old, it is evermore at hand, waiting for willing hearts and fraternal hands to make ready for it, make room for it, revealing the will of God on earth as in heaven.

But if we are to recover "the gospel of the Kingdom," as Jesus taught it, we shall need a deeper inner experience of religious reality, an enduement of power such as that with which the church began her morning march in the world. Once again it is power that we need, not power of numbers, not power of money, but the power of the Spirit—and that power is not achieved, it is received.

The Church and the Community

IT is increasingly apparent that the denominational order of things is failing to meet the needs either of large cities or of smaller areas. It is at best a survival from a time when its competitive character did not shock and disturb. Sectarianism was sufficiently in the blood of the nation before the war to find a sort of an apologetic for itself. Today it is increasingly difficult to justify denominationalism to sensible and sensitive people. Its wastage and discord are too apparent to be concealed under any camouflage of diversified convictions.

Particularly is this true in new communities which are taking form in all parts of the country, either as fresh settlements or as the suburbs of cities. Into every such locality it is the impulse of aggressive denominational officials to push with a church of their own faith and order. But the rivalry occasioned by this policy is easily foreseen, and the more constructive spirits find themselves reacting against the policy, and in favor of some unified expression of the religious life.

Where there is a cooperative body, like a federation or council of churches covering the area, it is sometimes practicable to adjust the matter so that some one denomination shall be permitted to foster a community church, while the others observe that self-restraint and courtesy which the situation demands. In other cases the community itself takes the initiative and forms a neighborhood church based not upon any of the denominational distinctions which have now become obsolete and fictitious, but upon the principle of neighborly fellowship in worship and brotherly cooperation in the practical service of Christ.

This is taking place throughout the nation, and is one of the most hopeful signs of the active and constructive impulse in Christianity today. It is the best answer to the criticisms that find mordant expression against the church. The fact remains that this new impulse is shaping the life of scores of rapidly forming communities, with the promise of real effectiveness in Christian service. When undertaken by a denomination in the true spirit of community service it proves that some of these Christian bodies are capable of sinking their sectarian aims in devotion to the larger good of the Kingdom of God. When projected by a community on its own initiative it is a sign of the vitality of religion at the broad human base of community life, whatever may be the fact as to the waxing or waning of ecclesiastical Christianity.

A visitor in the west recently had occasion to make a hasty study in a single evening of four different forms of community service in connection with churches in a typical city. His report is illuminating. The first church visited was in a locality closely approaching slum conditions. The church had saved itself by changing its program from that of the conventional or denominational church attempting to secure a membership for itself out of the local area, and had boldly gone after the community as a whole, making nothing of its denominational connection, but everything of its desire to meet as fully as possible all the needs of all the people of its district.

It was a Saturday night, perhaps the least favorable in the week for a display of activities. But in three or four sections of the very modest plant boys and girls, young men and women, and people of older years, were busy with work or recreation suited to their tastes. Not far away there was a store building which had been converted into a perpetual rummage salesroom, where clothing and other material was on sale at small cost, after being repaired by the willing hands of church workers of that same congregation. The denominational leaders had made a small investment from their forward movement fund, and the rest of the money for the fine experiment had come from the friends of the work as they saw its value.

The next place visited was in a somewhat more resourceful district, but in a distinctly industrial part of the city. A church that had once a great name had come to grips with a changing population, and was on the verge of failure. A young man came in as pastor who had a community rather than a denominational mind. Two years had made an astonishing change in the place which that church holds in the regard of its neighborhood. The old church building was flanked by a community house which was put to many different uses. In the basement gymnasium a basketball game was in progress. Week-day classes of various sorts, from the kindergarten to many kinds of evening class work, were in evidence. A staff of four paid workers carried on a seven-day-a-week program of activities in which apparently the whole community took interest, for people of all social conditions and of many religions were coming and going. A Sunday afternoon forum gathers an audience of seven hundred. These many sorts of work are done in the name of the church, but not of a denomination. Yet this church is the product of denominational solicitude, and was helped to its present equipment in part by denominational funds. The church, however, belongs to the community and not to the denomination.

A third church of similar spirit but of very different environment was situated in a boarding house district, from which nearly all the well-to-do residents of former days had retreated to the "park section." Here on a still more extensive scale the community program was in operation seven days in the week. As the visitor went in a crowd of several hundred was coming away from the Saturday night moving picture showing, for which a charge of fifteen cents was made. All the other forms of physical, social, educational and religious work were provided. It was said that under the enlarged regime which made the community feel that the church really belonged to it, the Sunday school had grown from three hundred to a thousand. On that particular Sunday the attendance was over eleven hundred, while the services of worship and preaching were crowded.

In this church alone of the four visited the denominational note was struck, but that was almost unconsciously done. When the question was asked whether the congregation and the rest of the church's constituency was made up of people from all denominations or of that particular body, the answer of one of the church officials was that since they were not the only church in the community, they tried not to proselyte in any way, but to reach primarily their own members within reasonable distance. But further conversation revealed the fact that the church is really seeking the welfare of the entire district, quite without reference to denominational advantage.

The final visit of the evening was made at a late hour to a strictly community church in an exclusive residence section. Here again a denomination had backed the enterprise, but one looked in vain for any token of its claim upon the property or the program. On the tower and in two places on the side of the beautiful structure were the words, "Community Church," without a hint of denominational connection. Here again the plant provided for the four types of essential church activity—physical, educational, social and worshipful. Every day in the week and at all hours of the day the church is open and its equipment is in use. It is the only church in the locality, and it is making good in the effort to meet all the needs of all the people.

This traveler's experience discloses what is taking place in more than one locality, and what may be the program in any place. To be sure it takes a high order of Christian statesmanship on the part of church officials to conceive and foster community churches without asking for denominational exclusiveness in return. But these four community churches are proof of the fact that it can be done, and that a few consecrated and far-sighted Christian laymen, who have the ears and the confidence of the right sort of denominational officials, are doing this sort of thing with a sense of immense enthusiasm and satisfaction; and that not alone in the city of Denver, where the observations here recorded were taken, but in every other city and town the community church can make the same unselfish response to the needs of the locality.

A Word for the Minister's Wife

THE minister's wife of our time is not the meek, unintelligently submissive person who took that part in the novels of yesterday. Ministers, like other men, marry women whom they happen to know, and in this time of coeducation and parallel education they are likely to know women who approach them in ability and culture. The preacher's wife is likely to be a college woman, and often she has had university courses or technical training of some kind. Naturally such a woman can do things, and since she has had the grace and the good sense to marry a preacher, naturally she is willing to do them.

The churches are not slow to learn that such a person is a valuable asset. A pulpit committee, considering possibilities for the pastorate, is quite sure to take the comparative qualifications of the pastors' wives into account. "Can she teach a Bible class?" "Has she taken primary work?" "Is she a speaker?" "Can she play the pipe organ?" "Can she sing?" are questions anxiously asked. The preacher, especially if he be a young preacher bursting with pride over the recent acquisition of an accomplished wife, is likely to answer all of these questions in the affirmative. Can she do these things? Can she not, and seventeen hundred other things, bless her!

The wife is also in the combination. Having married a minister she is determined to play the game. She has heard a great deal about the sacrifices of a minister's wife and she is determined to get all of the misery out of the situation there is in it,—for prospective domestic sacrifices look so extremely interesting from a bride's point of view! Nevertheless, she vows it shall never be said of her that she neglects her housekeeping for parish duties. The educated young woman of today knows how to keep house, and the preacher's wife is at least spared the humiliation that came to that lovely young reformer, Mary A. Livermore, whose loyal preacher-husband buried her first pudding in a corner of the garden at night, lest the critical eyes of the parish be turned toward this culinary tragedy.

But household duties grow, and so do outside activities. The minister's wife with three or four small children, a wide social acquaintance, and several departments of the church to supervise, begins to find her life a problem in complex fractions. She begins to flag physically and mentally, her work in every line suffers, but she does not know how or where to cut loose. Of course, she has attempted too many things, and has prided herself too greatly on doing them all well. We do not hear it said of a man, "He is the best lawyer in the county; his squashes take prizes at all the county fairs; he runs a large brickyard, repairs sewing machines, reads papers on Ibsen and Sudermann at all the women's clubs, and plays the drum in the town band." The preacher's wife must learn to have more forethought and more independence, and to forfeit her silly pride in doing all things equally well.

There are two easy ways: She may show a sympathetic interest in every department of work but refuse to hold office in any, or she may specialize in the one kind of work to which she is best suited. If she follows either of these courses consistently, her attitude will be respected. If she tries to carry all kinds of responsibilities, there will come a day of reckoning when, lying forlornly on a hospital bed, she will wish she had been content to be one useful and happy woman instead of trying to be a dozen distracted women at once.

Material Things

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THREE women came to my habitation, and they sat them down and spake unto me. And they asked me, saying, When thou art sick, dost thou call upon God or the doctor?

And I answered, I am never sick.

And they asked, What, never?

And I said, Well hardly ever. It is more than forty years since I have lost the labor of a day through illness.

And they said, But peradventure thou shouldest be ill, wouldest thou call on God or on the doctor?

And I said, I would call on both.

And I said, Wonderful and Mysterious is this human body, and no man knoweth much about it, but the Physician knoweth a little more than I do. If I have need of his knowledge, I shall not forget that God hath distributed his gifts; neither shall I forget that God hath caused healing herbs to grow out of the earth for the good of such as be sick.

And they said, Thou canst not trust at once in both God and these Material Things.

And I considered how each of them did trust in Material Things as well as in God.

And I said unto the first, Thy teeth are false.

And she said, Thou art no gentleman.

And I said unto the second, Thy sight faileth, and thou putttest thy trust in Spectacles.

And she said, That is none of thy business.

And I said unto the third, Thy hair is Not Indigenous.

And she said, Thou art a brute.

Then spake I again unto them, and I said, Come not to me to rebuke me for my trust in Material Things. And I spake unto the first, saying, Go thou and trust in God till thy teeth grow out again. And I spake unto the second, saying, Go thou and come not back till thou comest with undimmed eyes. And I spake unto the third, Go thou and return to me when thy hair is grown.

And from the manner of their going, I inferred that they loved me not.

LINCOLN

By Thomas Curtis Clark

The Hand of Lincoln*

THIS hand grew strong by felling stubborn trees
That barred the way of freedom for our sires;
And here in Illinois it lit the fires
That should destroy those age-long dynasties
Of vested right and selfish power that broke
The spirit of a race. He saw their grief
With deep, sad eyes, and vowed their sure relief—
And then the Voice of God and Freedom spoke!
This hand clinched hard the tyrant's rod of hate
And tore it from his grasp. A people's prayer
Went up to God, who seeing their despair
Had sent to them a Friend both good and great.

The Revelation

HE walked among us and we passed him by
And thought him but a country lawyer, crude
As our red prairies are, and more than rude,
Who reveled in his jokes and deviltry.
We could not know the heart within that breast
Until the blood flowed freely from the wound
A madman made; then was it that we found
That God had loaned us for a time His Best.
And now the nations, since their kings are gone,
Have taken him across the wide-flung sea
To rule their hearts as well as ours; to be
The goal of their desires, with breaking dawn.

The Christian

HIS foes declared him blasphemous, perverse,
Ignoring God and heedless of His Word.
They said he lacked in fineness, who preferred
To market jokes, foul scandals to rehearse.
He was no white-robed saint: a strong man he
Who loved to wrestle with the devil's brood
That lurked behind the fashions of the good.
He scorned all shams, and for hypocrisy
He held a hatred such as Christ alone,
The scourge of haughty Pharisees, could know.
Those painted masks of Christians felt his blow,
And at his blameless name each cast his stone.
Not by their words, but by their fruits, said He,
Who also knew the sting of calumny.

The Glory of Lincoln

WHO builds of stone a shrine to bear his name,
Shall be forgot when months and years have flown;
Who writes his name upon the scroll of fame,
The centuries shall find to men unknown;
But who for fellow men endured the shame,
Shall have eternal glory for his own.

*Written after viewing a cast of Lincoln's right hand.

Can Society be Made Christian?

By William Adams Brown

THE question whether Christianity is practicable may have two meanings. We may ask whether it is practicable for the individual or we may ask whether it is practicable for society. As to the first, there would be general agreement. All of us know people who are Christian in their personal life, people who really believe that all men are their brothers and try as far as they can to treat them as such, people who are unselfish, cooperative, charitable, hopeful, self-sacrificing, and who are all these things because they believe in a God who is like Jesus Christ.

But the question whether Christianity is practicable for society is a different one. It is whether it is possible to bring Christian principles to bear upon human life as a whole so that the different social groups which compose society—nations, races and classes as well as the lesser groups within each—shall act and think and feel as Jesus Christ would have them. If so, it is important for us to know it, for it will make a difference in our conduct. If we believe Christianity to be practicable for society as well as for the individuals who compose it, we shall judge current social and economic questions by one standard. If we do not, then much that we are doing both as individual Christians and as a church will be waste of time.

NEGATIVE REPLY

There are many, both outside the church and inside, who answer our question uncompromisingly in the negative. We find them in the circles of big business with its doctrine of each for himself and the devil take the hindmost. We find them among the politicians who teach the supremacy of the individual state and deny that nations have any duties toward rival nations except those which their own self-respect may dictate. We find them among the radicals who in the name of the proletariat claim the right to suppress by force, if need be, all who differ with their will and in the very same breath in which they speak of brotherhood and humanity show by their acts that they have become converts to the imperialistic philosophy of the Czar.

I was reading recently the report of the Committee of Safety of the Russian Revolution in which this philosophy of brute force is expounded with the most rigorous and uncompromising logic. But you will find many who shrink with horror from the consequences which the Bolsheviks draw from their premises who yet accept them as the basis of their own theory of the state. In a recent account of the German revolution published by S. Miles Bouton, "And the Kaiser Abdicates," the author comments on the socialist challenge of the existing state as follows: "The socialist creed teaches the brotherhood of man and the equality of all men irrespective of race, color or belief. The inescapable corollary of this creed is that patriotism, understood as unreasoning devotion to the real or supposed interests of the state, cannot be encouraged or even suffered. And this standpoint necessarily involves further the eventual obliteration of the state itself, for any state's chief reason for existence in a non-altruistic world is the securing of special privileges, benefits, advantages and protection for its own citizens, without consideration for the inhabitants of other states. If this exercise of its power be prohibited, the state's reason for existence is greatly diminished. Indeed, it can have virtually only a social mission left, and a social mission pure and simple cannot inspire a high degree of patriotism."

In other words, there is not enough power in the unselfish motives to which Christianity appeals to serve as the organizing principle for a social unity like the modern state. Whether Mr. Bouton believes this himself or is only interpreting the beliefs of others, he is voicing a philosophy which is far more widely held than we sometimes like to think.

PREMILLENARIANS AND MYSTICS

Within the church, too, we find many who from quite different motives come to the same conclusion. At one pole are the premillenarians who deny that it was ever God's purpose to have a Christian society on earth and bid us postpone our hope of the better social order to the new era to be introduced by Christ at his coming. At the other pole are the mystics who take refuge from the tragedy and mystery of life in the inner world of personal religion. How hopeless, they tell us, to seek the peace we need in any change of external environment. If God means anything at all he must mean some power able to lift us above the fluctuations of our transient and unsatisfying life into a spiritual realm where sorrow and heartbreak can never penetrate. There is something in this view of religion that appeals to a deep instinct in human nature. There are times in the life of every one of us when it seems as if the cruelty and mystery of life were more than we could bear and the promise of some short and easy way of escape from the responsibility that has grown too heavy for our shoulders comes to us with an almost irresistible appeal.

And yet there are few of us who would be ready to accept this answer as final. Christ has made too deep an impression upon the life of the world to make the complete abandonment of the attempt to realize his principles in society permanently satisfying. However hard it may be to realize the ideal, however far we may yet be from the distant goal, we have seen the vision of a world made over after the mind of Jesus Christ and we cannot abandon without a struggle the effort to realize that ideal, cost what it may.

Are we right in this or wrong? Upon our answer will depend our attitude toward all the questions of social reconstruction which fill so large a place in the thought of our time. Wherever we turn we find men increasingly conscious of the need of some spiritual foundation for society if democratic ideals are to persist and triumph. In the great war we had a practical demonstration of what follows when the Christian point of view is abandoned. For the philosophy which underlies war, if it be accepted as the last word for society, involves in the last analysis the denial of the practicability of Christianity. War assumes that the enemy is not open to the kind of considerations with which the gospel operates, that you must not treat him as you would treat other men, as your brother, sharer with you in the good gifts which our common Father has provided for all his children and entitled to the same frankness and fair dealing that you claim for yourself. The Christian attitude of trust, sympathy and good will so essential to the maintenance of a stable society no longer obtains in time of war. The one thing essential in war is to bring your will to prevail over the will of your opponent at any cost. And now that the war is over and we face the new tasks of peace, the old habits still persist. The lessons once learned of distrust, suspicion and fear are not easily unlearned, and unless some powerful spiritual influence can be brought to bear upon the world's life to form the center of a new organization with new motives and ideals, we are in danger of losing the very objects for which the war was fought.

IS THERE A BETTER WAY?

Is such a reconstruction possible? Must we take it for granted that the forces and ideals which produced the great war are and must for all time be the dominant forces in human life so that we must organize our peace on the same assumption on which we organized our war, or is there another and a better way? Are the old words of Jesus about brotherhood and service simply a counsel of perfection for the individual, or do they really give us a clue which points the way to a better future for society? This is the real meaning for us today of the question whether Christianity is socially practicable.

There are three things which we must know in order to answer this question intelligently: first, we must know what the Christian ideal for society really is; secondly, we must inquire how far society as at present organized accepts this ideal; and in the third place, we must ask what resources are at our disposal to bridge the gap between ideal and reality and make the world, which in our preaching we claim for Jesus Christ, Christian in fact.

And first of the ideal by which we must judge the existing social order. We may take as a working definition that given in the recent report of the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook on "The Church and Industrial Reconstruction." "What kind of society would we have," the authors ask, "if the principles of Jesus Christ were consistently applied to human life?" And they answer, "It would be a cooperative social order in which the sacredness of every life was recognized and everyone found opportunity for the fullest self-expression of which he was capable; in which each individual gave himself gladly and whole-heartedly for ends that are socially valuable; in which the impulses to service and to creative action would be stronger than the acquisitive impulses, and all work be seen in terms of its spiritual significance as making possible fullness of life for all men; in which differences of talents and capacity meant proportional responsibilities and ministry to the common good; in which all lesser differences of race, of nation and of class served to minister to the richness of an all-inclusive brotherhood; in which there hovered over all a sense of the reality of the Christ-like God, so that worship inspired service, as service expressed brotherhood."

HOW FAR IS SOCIETY ALREADY CHRISTIAN?

Taking this as our standard, we must next inquire how far society as at present organized accepts this ideal and is consciously striving to realize it. It is not necessary in order to show that Christianity is socially practicable to prove that all individuals accept the Christian ideal or that there is nothing in the conduct of social groups which contravenes the teachings of Jesus, but only that his principles are accepted by men in general as socially valid and made the test by which contemporary institutions are judged. If one's ideals are right there is always hope for improvement, however far one may fall below them at any time, but when the ideal is rejected, the prospect seems hopeless.

How far, then, we may ask, does the Christian ideal determine our judgment in the different fields of social activity?

It is clear that there can be no ready made answer to this question. Some of our social standards are more Christian than others. In the family, for example, we think of wife and husband, parents and children, as making up a spiritual unity in which the welfare of each depends upon the welfare of all and each can call upon the others for the help and sympathy which he needs. In certain professions like the ministry, teaching, medicine, the civil service, we find standards accepted as to the individual's duty to his fellows which correspond in a remarkable degree to the teachings of Jesus Christ. The teacher who should discriminate between his pupils according to their capacity to pay, or the doctor who should deny his services to the dying because of his poverty would lose caste in his profession. But in other fields of social activity this is not yet the case. To prove Christianity socially practicable we do not have to prove that Christian principles are everywhere accepted now, but only that their influence is being increasingly felt; that forces exist and influences are at work which warrant our faith that they will some day be accepted everywhere.

UNCERTAIN SOCIAL STANDARDS

It was Professor Rauschenbusch who first pointed out the necessity for such discrimination. In his book, "Christianity and the Social Crisis," he showed to what extent Christian principles had already come to dominate our social judgments and defined the sphere within which the progress of the future must be expected. There are in particular three great fields of human activity in which our social standards are still largely un-Christian, if not frankly anti-Christian. One is the field of politics to which we have already referred. The second is the field of business. The third is that complex realm of international relations in which the factors of nationality and economic interest are further complicated by the new and formidable factor of race.

If one looks only on the surface it must be confessed that the outlook is discouraging. In all three of these fields we find influential spokesmen frankly repudiating the Christian ideal as wholly inapplicable to the present world. While our foreign missionaries are carrying on their quiet work of friendly ministry in Japan, politicians and journalists warn us of the yellow peril and bid us arm against possible war with our neighbor across the sea. Before the echoes of the appeal to our young men to enlist in the war to make the world safe for democracy have died away, we find men on both sides approaching the vexed questions at issue between capital and labor in a spirit of the purest self-interest, while in the sphere of international relationships we see suspicion and fear still at their old work and the hope of a League of Nations based upon the principles of mutual cooperation and helpfulness laughed out of court as an impracticable Utopia.

BRUTAL CANDOR

Not all are as brutally frank as the writer in the Wall Street Journal who recently expressed his attitude toward unskilled labor in the following sentences:

When the real adjustment comes the unskilled worker finishes where he belongs—at the bottom of the list. He will be able to live on two dollars a day when he is lucky enough to get that amount regularly. Wages which in the spring before the panic of 1873 were eight dollars a day fell to two dollars in the autumn of that year, with employment hard to find. The cost of living will adjust itself. The Labor Bureau will give up publishing nonsense about $2,600 a year minimum for a fancied "family of five." The unskilled worker will thank goodness that he has no family of five, or indeed anybody but himself to support; nor will any employer pay him on a basis of any such fatherhood, as the bankrupt and discredited Interchurch World Movement absurdly proposed in its gratuitous inquiry into the steel strike.

Not all, I repeat, are quite so outspoken as this writer, but the spirit which he expresses was never more in evidence than today. And yet there are not wanting signs of hope. I have spoken of the present attitude toward the League of Nations as discouraging, but this is only in part true. Those who are dissatisfied with the present league are not wholly moved by selfish influences. In part they are against it because it seems to them to make too great concessions to the spirit of national self-seeking, because it is not yet in fact what in theory it professed to be, a league of free nations seeking through mutual conference and helpfulness to unify and pacify a distracted world. The extent of the response among all the peoples to President Wilson's great appeal proves the existence of a fund of idealism which, if it can only find some practicable form of expression, may yet bring Christian principles to bear constructively upon the life of nations.

AROUSAL OF CONSCIENCE

The same is true in the world of industry. Here, too, there are signs that the conscience of men is being aroused and that the old conception of business as the scene of unrestricted competition in which the weakest must go to the wall is giving place to a new and more Christian conception. One may think what one will of the particular measures recommended in the manifesto of the English Labor Party; the fact remains that the ideal for society is one of unity and helpfulness, an ideal in which each recognizes his responsibility for his neighbor's welfare, and the strong help to bear the burdens of the weak. It is not without significance that a group of churchmen, representing such conservative bodies as the Episcopal, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Methodist, Disciples, and Baptist churches, should have stood sponsors for a report which attempts to apply Christian principles to contemporary industrial problems in as thoroughgoing a way as is the case with the report of the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook on Industrial Reconstruction. The widespread interest in the Interchurch investigation of the steel strike, and the volume of the National Catholic Welfare Council on the Church and Labor, proves that the Christian conscience is aroused and that men are no longer willing to accept the complete divorce of business and religion.

Even in the most difficult region of all, that of the relation between the races, there are signs of hope. The fact that in a question so hotly debated as that of Japanese exclusion more than two hundred thousand citizens of California should have been found to vote against the proposed anti-Japanese legislation is an indication that helpful influences are at work in this most difficult field. And in that older and more baffling question still, of the relation between the Negroes and their white neighbors, both north and south, the formation of such bodies as the University Commission on Race Questions and the Interracial Councils is evidence of a new and better spirit. But more than any one specific thing to which one can point is the awakening of the church to the spiritual significance of the questions at issue, the abandonment of the old attitude of indifference and laissez-faire on the part of multitudes of Christian people.

TODAY AND TOMORROW

If, then, we are to answer the question whether Christianity is socially practicable, it is to these new and constructive forces that we must direct our attention. Not what we see today, but what we are likely to see tomorrow and day after tomorrow is the significant thing. And here there is need of a study more careful and thoroughgoing than has yet been made, which will take up in detail the different aspects of our social life and apply to each the method of investigation which this article has suggested.

Most significant of all for the light which it will shed upon our inquiry, is the attitude of the church itself. For the church presents in miniature all the problems which we have passed in review. The church, like the state, is a government and it faces in principle all the problems which confront secular politicians. The church is a business, holding property and employing labor, and it faces in principle all the problems of industry. The church includes within itself men of every nation and every race, and it faces in principle all the problems which meet us in our international relations. In order to prove that Christianity is socially practicable in these most difficult phases of human experience, we must show that in the church, which alone among human societies professes to take for its standard the ideals of Jesus Christ, these problems are being approached and solved in the Christian spirit. The question whether Christianity is practicable in society is in the last analysis the question whether Christianity is practicable in the church, for the church is Christianity facing the last and greatest of all tests which any movement can face, the test of success. The church is Christianity so far as it has won its place in the world and become part of the structure of human society. It is Christianity using the methods which men use in their organized life, law, tradition, social custom, a professional ministry, buildings, real estate, property in the largest sense of the word, in a word the whole paraphernalia of institutional life. If the church can be made Christian, society as a whole can be Christianized. But if not, how can we expect men to take seriously our preaching of the Kingdom of God?

Education For the New Day

By Vida D. Scudder

IDEALS of education vanish under our eyes. Gone the English idea that a man was educated if he could quote Horace and play a good game at cricket; gone to join the Persian picture of the youth to whom society had done its duty when it had taught him to ride straight and speak the truth. Gone, or going, the segregated class-training with sharp distinctions of sex, which at its best produced in privileged girls lovely manners, attractive accomplishments, and personal charm—in privileged youth, chivalrous virility touched by love of adventure, and sense of responsibility toward inferiors. Enter education democratic, enter education Freudian. Enter, on the one hand, the "commercial high," and the technical school; enter, on the other, the delightful idea that the chief business of the educator is to remove inhibitions—an idea, this last, which destroys all ancient standards of drill and discipline, and lets each little Montessori child work out his or her preferences unchecked, to his or her ultimate misery.

EXPERIMENTS UPON YOUTH

Myriad experiments are tried on the unlucky young. They tell us that they have "had" this or that as if it were a matter of measles, a malady experienced and left behind. They reach us, these young folk, at college age, crusted as it were with a chaotic mosaic casually applied: here a dab of science, there a purple patch of Arthurian romance, here hygiene, here folk-dancing, here civics. And what of the living creature within the crust? Alas! When we seek to penetrate, we find him in a state of nature; a little cramped and dulled, probably, but totally unaffected in his real self by any of the processes to which he has been subjected.

In the confusion of experiment, it is not easy to generalize. But two salient facts surely stand out concerning the broader trend of modern education. Our training makes for two results, one intentional, the other inevitable; it proceeds under the protecting care of the twin genii, efficiency and mediocrity.

The chief point that distinguishes education today from older types is that it aims at production rather than personality. It wants to make people practically useful, and it pays little attention to what kind of people they are. Action, not being, is its objective.

This tendency is a natural expression of an epoch which has put production above humanity: which has feverishly toiled to control and increase our material resources, at whatever sacrifices of human beings to the exigencies of the machine. But the vast procession of men is slowly turning to face another way. Most units in the procession do not realize this yet; but the word has gone out, and the column is curving, and presently even the laggards will reach the cross-roads and find themselves marching toward a new goal.

HUMAN VALUES FIRST

The chief point of the social order we are entering is the proposal to put less stress on production of physical values and more on the creation of men; less on machinery, more on life. Years ago Ruskin made the Victorians contemptuously angry when he said, "There is no wealth but life." Yet that is what the workers mean, in their stubborn fight for leisure and decent, secure well-being. That is what Russia is going after, blindly perhaps; that is the point of the revolution everywhere. Efficiency, by all means, gentlemen: increase of commodities, ease in exchange, what you will. But never to this Moloch will we sacrifice the joy or freedom of one tender adolescent, the health or vision of one working man. The end of our economic system shall be not the multiplication of goods, but the direct enlargement and enrichment of personality.

For we observe that the rage for production has made the race the victim of its own activities. We know the disconcerting proportion of men found during the war in every country to be below the normal physical standard. We meet on every side that curse of mediocrity, resting on our intellectual life—the banal, machine-made minds, the development among abler men of a type alert, competent, but hard, insensitive; the atrophy of the higher powers of joy. We reject therefore the miserable complex of modern civilization. It is our firm resolve to break this sorry scheme of things, and remould it nearer to the heart's desire. There will be a time for salvage; no one denies that there are some precious values to retain. But something is wrong which must be put right with our economic foundations. In our effort to change them, catastrophe may await us; but we cannot stop the effort if we would. For the impetus is up, the power is on.

FACING THE FACTS

It is the young who will fully share the future conditions, and to prepare the young is our task. The task is stern in a way; for the world in which they are to live is not likely to be either peaceful or prosperous.

One might as well face facts. The old aim at efficiency was not wholly thwarted. For large sections of the population, civilization has been a pretty comfortable affair; life has been soft, commodious and easy. Now, that comfort is not likely to last. Even if no dramatic disaster befalls, Efficiency—own sister, she, to Ruskin's Goddess of Getting On—will probably desert us for a time at least; and a nerve-racked race, spent with emotions, but at last set free from goad and external pressure, may pass through a phase of exasperating laziness and incompetence. Symptoms are visible already. The lady who has never worked eight hours on end in her life is filled with moral horror as she sees how careless men are about their jobs, and how those awful unions make them throw down their tools at five o'clock. Lenin, over in Russia, has found it necessary soundly to berate the emancipated Russian workmen, and to preach thrift and energy, quite in the tone of the sententious employer. Everybody is getting slack; and men will be slacker before they are energetic again, for there is a psychological reaction from long-continued mechanical pressure which will take time to wear away.

A NEW CHIVALRY

This reaction will wear off by degrees. There is good reason to hope that one of these days, when workmen own their work and know what that involves, they will labor with a new kind of zest, more enlightened and keener than slave-labor has ever known. We are not likely to slip back into savagery; we shall probably continue to have automobiles and bathrooms; and some time the creative instincts of men will be asserting themselves with undreamed vigor. But reactions take time; and the children now growing up will in all probability live out their days in a world which is lazier, more demoralized than the world of their fathers. A world in which all the wheels will be out of gear, a baffling world, hard to live in, awaits us.

How shall we prepare our children to live in it?

It is obvious to say that they must be held to good standards for work. The offspring of the so-called leisure class, in particular, are perhaps the people who must be chiefly relied on to keep the world going. They have fairly healthy bodies in the main, and they are not handicapped by the hungry passion for rest and freedom which the present working classes cannot be blamed for feeling. It should be a simple matter to imbue them with a new chivalry, as class distinctions become blurred and disappear. The old incentive of private profit may be much diminished as the young reach maturity; but a better motivation must take its place. Technique must not be allowed to lapse if we can help it, and vocational training must be carried on under a higher inspiration than now, when the prime object is to enable men to earn their living.

But if we aim first at use, or usefulness, we shall repeat the blunder which has plunged us into all our difficulties. Education should right-about-face, with the procession. It should aim, and that immediately, not at making men more useful, but at making them more alive.

Not efficiency, but personality, is the spiritual word; and the opportunity of our age is the opportunity to release the Spirit.

The Christian will not care overmuch to equip the rising generation to make the poor world rich again; he is not sure enough that comfort and well-being are benefits. But he will be very concerned to develop men and women who can be the right kind of citizens in the new social order. And the first necessity is to enable people to live with fine serenity in difficult days—to give them such rich resources in themselves that they will have no atom of regret for the old times, so pleasant on the surface, so corrupt within—the kind of resources that will be independent of circumstances, that can survive a shipwrecked world. It is the meek who inherit the earth, after all; and if we want men to possess their heritage, we must set about making them meek.

ENJOYMENT WITHOUT POSSESSION

What does that mean? Well, for one thing it means discouragement of the aggressive, pushing, acquisitive instincts, and (since negative methods are always false in education) the supplanting of these instincts by a full development of the powers to enjoy without possessing: of the passive, contemplative powers, if you will, which were always given precedence of the active in more spiritual epochs, but which have been at such a discount in the West for two or three hundred years. Men must be taught to appropriate their heritage. The ignorance of it on the part of modern youth is amazing, is measureless. They can take an automobile to pieces and repair it, which is doubtless a useful accomplishment; but how many of them know the Divine Comedy? Yet a knowledge of Dante really does equip a man better to meet possible misfortune than knowing how to run an automobile.

To initiate people into their glorious inheritance, to make them sensitive to the best in it, eager for the possession of it, is our first educational duty. The laws of nature, the achievement of humanity, will not fail us. They will endure, they will wait on our reverent study, though every factory in the land should close, though we be driven back on homespun and personally grown potatoes, as Mr. Brailsford expects.

To love true beauty, to learn real truth—this is to gain personality. In one of Mallock's novels, a dull, handsome girl ruefully consults an older woman as to how she may become more attractive. Her friend tells her to learn the best of Wordsworth's poetry by heart, and by and by to look in a mirror and see if a new charm has not come into her face. This is an aside: but, speaking of Wordsworth, no one has suggested better than that wisest of English poets what education should do:

"We live by admiration, hope, and love,
And even as these are well and wisely placed,
In dignity of being we ascend."

There is a motto for our schools!

IMPOTENT TO ADMIRE

Young people nowadays too often grow up in a curious, hard apathy, scarcely admiring anything. To teach them to admire is to imbue them with reverence—a quality which democratic civilization needs to protect with jealous care. It means to quicken them, to give them severe accurate standards, by exposing them to what is beautiful and noble in every form. History, literature, and art can all be taught from this point of view. If the young are to be prepared and equipped to create a fairer and more genuine civilization than ours, they must gain the power to admire the right things. They can be taught to do so; nothing is more responsive to real excellence than a youthful mind. But in a world beset with blatant excitements, with coarse pleasure, a world of movies and cheap magazines, where the strident note is struck so constantly that finer melodies are hard to hear, it takes patience and brilliant energy to give the right training. Constant contact, enforced if need be, with the finest models, is essential; and a teacher who is himself honestly possessed by the perception of true excellence rarely fails to impart his passion to his students. It is quite possible to get a group of average Philistine boys and girls to the point where they would rather read Shelley than the Saturday Evening Post, and know not because they are told so, but because they see, that Greek marbles are better to look at than a movie. The power of admiring rightly does not come by nature; it is the result of careful, protracted, and painstaking education, and there never could be conditions which make the task of the teacher in this line harder than it is today. But he can succeed, for he does succeed when he is the right man.

THE FORWARD LOOKING MIND

Next, hope. And hope means the forward-looking mind. It means release from convention, timidity, dull acceptance of what is, simply because it is; it means flexibility and eagerness. A period of tremendous social experiment lies ahead. Let us prepare the rising generation to play their part with prudence, with zest, with trust in the future of the race. Hope, like most other good things, must be socialized. Personal expectations may not play so large a part in the immediate future; certainly some forms of personal ambition will be discredited. But a social hope, high, pure, tenacious, will be the sustaining power of these coming days. It must be founded, as all reasonable hope must be founded, on close study of the past; it must not be the kind of hope that flutters vaguely on weak wings in a rainbow mist, it must have precision in it; and young people can only acquire it as they are drilled in sound knowledge of history, of psychology, and of sociology. All these studies should be made to converge on the creation of purpose; for purpose is the final name, the ultimate end, of hope; and clear-sighted conviction of what is desirable and feasible in social experimentation is what the new world-order will grow by. Institutions, in the past, have come about in a fashion more or less haphazard; in the future, they must be the result of the reasoned purpose of disinterested men, and if the rising generation is to gain such purpose inspired by confident faith in its power to achieve, it must be enlightened by knowledge of the past and of human nature, and possessed by a religious conception of human destiny.

THE KEY TO EVERY SITUATION

And love. Love is the key to every situation.

You cannot say to young people, "Love one another," and stop there, without falling into a slough of sentimentality. Unlucky children are sometimes led by their teachers to wallow in that slough, but the healthy-minded pull themselves out promptly and betake them to very hard dry land. Love is a difficult quest, slow and complex and beset with pitfalls. And it is quite peculiarly the modern quest. For unless love can be made stronger, wiser, more universal than it is, industrial democracy, soviet rule, guild socialism, and the rest, will be only a new type of mechanism.

Love is active and self-controlled fellowship, based on true understanding; and it is a perfectly practical thing, though unusual, to train young people and even little children into sympathy with alien minds and groups. We need immediately to encourage the clear and precise study of varying group-psychologies in the present and the past. History must teach us, not only how men acted, but why they acted as they did. Literature must teach us, not the meticulous fussing about sources (though this has its place), but the expansion of love. We must patiently teach the young to overcome the provincialism, the instinctive distrust of the alien, that today imprisons us all. We must break down barriers; and just as we seek to understand ancient Greece and Rome and medieval Europe, so we must help people to understand I. W. W.'s, capitalists, Germans, Russians, and the rest of those outside their natural ken. Pride must be evoked on the side of sympathy—not in opposition to it, as has been the case in all forms of aristocratic idealism. For a psychology of imaginative sympathy is the first requisite of a stable new world. The love which education must develop must be rooted, not in passion but in imagination. It must echo Whitman: "I do not ask the wounded person how he feels; I myself become the wounded person." The noble expression of a modern idealist and martyr must be some day native to everyone: "So long as there is a soul in prison, I am not free."

AN ENRICHED PERSONALITY

Through admiration, hope, and love can be developed the power not only to inherit the joy and beauty of the world, but to add to them. Admiration always carries with it an imitative impulse; hope is in its nature constructive; and love is the creative force of the universe. Our aim is to enrich personality; but there is scant danger lest the joyous, the lovely, the well equipped persons of our desire slip into passive days and spend their lives in contemplation. The conditions of the world, for one thing, will hardly allow this luxury; the natural impulses, which set so strongly toward activity in a healthy organism, will not allow it. Let us create the right kind of people to live in the new and dawning day, and they will, automatically and spontaneously, be efficient people. But efficiency is not to be the first objective of our consideration. Rather, we are to remember the old saying, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." When men fix their first thought on Being, then they develop their latent faculties for perception, sympathy, and adoration, their doing will follow as naturally as fruit follows flower. Only it may be a very different kind of doing from what we see today.

There was something to be said after all in favor of the old aristocratic ideal of education. It produced, for a small minority, exquisite results: people finely-tuned, sensitive, emancipated, simple, the type of people whom we should grieve to lose out of the world. The acute fear of losing them is the reason why many cling ruefully to an aristocratic ideal, and refuse to surrender their minds to democracy. For this minority, the end of education, the end of life itself, has been, not working, not producing, but merely living. These few have been flowers in the rank human growth; but it has taken the benumbed toil of the silent millions to maintain them. These millions, so far as they were educated at all, were educated to do the world's work.

ARISTOCRATIC VERSUS DEMOCRATIC IDEAL

And when their hour struck, it was inevitable that the aristocratic ideal should go. A utilitarian and practical conception seemed part of the whole democratic movement. Reinforced by modern materialism, it has dominated, and the demand is all but universal that people be trained, not for life itself, but for service to life. We are in the full swing of this theory, and the older cultures languish and die. Yet even the most ardent Democrat or Socialist, noting the dim mediocrity which befalls our national life and the vulgarity which taints it, must mourn their disappearance. So far does this regret go that one finds a liberal journal soberly stating that the only thing for an American to do, if he clings to the best intellectual traditions, is to flee his own country, above all the middle west, and betake him to Europe. He will, according to this writer, render better service to general culture and thereby to American cultures also by devoting his powers "to strengthening the centers of culture which at present lie elsewhere."

But this is a very pessimistic conclusion, to say nothing of the fact that old traditions are at present breaking down in Europe even faster than with us. Surely there is a better way. Mediocrity is the natural beginning of a strong democratic tendency, but it will not be the end. Democracy will not always remain inconsistent with "the humanization of man in society." As the old class-alignments vanish, we must aim at the union of the two ideals, envisaging an education open to all, carefully noting natural capacity and training for function, but also, and more fundamentally, opening the sources of power and joy in which all normal human beings share. Let us sedulously level up, not down; let us give personality its sacred right of way. At whatever sacrifice of comfort or immediate convenience, at whatever cost in commodities, let us aim first of all at making people beautiful, noble, happy and loving, fit citizens of an ideal commonwealth. And all those things which Efficiency connotes shall in due time be added unto us.

IN temporary pain
The age is bearing a new breed
Of men and women, patriots of the world
And one another. Boundaries in vain,
Birthrights and countries, would constrain
The old diversity of seed
To be diversity of soul.

O mighty patriots, maintain
Your loyalty!—till flags unfurled
For battle shall arraign
The traitors who unfurled them, shall remain
And shine over an army with no slain,
And men from every nation shall enroll
And women—in the hardihood of peace!

What can my anger do but cease?
Whom shall I fight and who shall be my enemy
When he is I and I am he?

Shall We Censor the Movies?

THE movement for state censorship of the movies is on in earnest all over the country. There are forty-four state legislatures to meet this year, and while there are no records at hand to show how many of them will consider censorship bills, the general news seems to indicate that most of them will do so. Besides, there is a federal bill being urged upon congress. And municipal censorship is increasing.

This is not merely a part of the so-called "blue-law" movement. It is a part of that to be sure, but it is more. The agitation for it antedated the much-defamed "blue-law" agitation and it will remain after that wave has subsided. Of course the so-called "blue-law" movement is grossly exaggerated. If one will carefully follow to their sources those agencies which pillory and caricature it they will be found closely allied with those agencies which are protesting against prohibition. They are very anxious to stigmatize prohibition by allying Sabbatical fanaticism and an anti-everything movement with it. They want wine and beer and a continental Sunday and the "lid" off in general. They are individualists of the "do as you please" type and confuse a personal liberty that is social anarchy with a demand for freedom.

"Buckets of Blood"

Last year a certain exhibitor cleaned up $75,000 in a mid-western city in a single theater. When asked how he did it he said "I threw buckets of blood in their faces." The explanation was crude and rough, but not more so than the artistic quality of the films he exhibited. As for their moral quality one need make no guesses; it was blood and thunder, rape and murder, strong-armed men and loose-moraled women. There was something doing every minute and the show-house was a small boy's wild-west paradise.

Recently I went to look over a film that was exploiting a noted prize-fighter of yesterday. Yesterday he drew tens of thousands to the ringside while he beat up his gorilla-like opponents; today he draws hundreds of thousands while he goes through a series of film feints, always delivering the solar plexus blow on his crafty and numerous opponents after the plot has him almost on the ropes. There was no art in his acting; it was characterized by blunderbuss motion and awkward gesture. There was no scenic attractiveness in the background; it was largely alley and garret and cellar stuff. There was no real morality in the sequences; they were simply triumphs of brute strength and animal craftiness. But the house was filled and the front half was a solid bank of small boys. Douglas Fairbanks thrills the politer audiences with agile stunts, but the "gentleman bruiser" was wringing ecstatic shouts from his audience of youthful adolescents, and the day after the back yards and barn lofts would be the scene of many a mimic hold-up and contest.

Here is another show-house that is always filled with girls. One could attend it week after week and see nothing but the sex-motive played. There is much that is sweet and more that is fussy and enough that is outre to overcome all that is sweet. In playing the undying theme of love they play all its discords and overtones and thump it into salaciousness. The most fundamental of all human motives is analyzed into morbidity and emphasized into hectic passion. The art is fine but its overdoing is a gluttony and an intoxication to the imagination that makes a caricature of its divinity.

Why Censorship?

The word "censor" has a forbidding sound. It is a dangerous word in a democracy. It stalks down from monarchy and militarism with a haughty mannerism that is foreboding. But so does the word "authority," and we are busied nowadays striving to adjust authority with democracy simply because even democracy cannot be maintained without it. Our social democracy has been inclined to parody the easy slogan of the economic laissez faire and say, "Every fellow enjoy himself and the devil take the weakest." But social democracy must maintain social morality, and that demands an adjustment of the term censorship to that of social freedom.

The motion picture is here to stay, but not every type of movie any producer or exhibitor wishes to put on will be tolerated. Books and all public prints are so severely censored that few attempt to put the forbidden volume on the market. But things may be done in books that could not be done on the street, and so, too, things may be done in books and in still art that cannot be done on the screen. The screen approaches the realities of the street. It cannot sustain its claim to the privilege of showing anything that may be written in books or to come within only those limitations obtaining in museums of the fine arts. The moving picture art is new and has not yet discovered its canons as an art, though it is making progress in that direction. It is the victim of commercialization as no other great art ever was in its beginnings. The danger lies not so much in its art as in its commercialization.

Just because its danger inheres in its commercial features it must submit to censorship, for commercial amusement runs easily into vice, a fact witnessed to by all history. The question is whether the censorship of the voluntary Board of Review will be sufficient to protect the art against its own commercial undoing.

Official Verbus

Unofficial Censorship

The demand for political censorship brings those dangers that inhere in political management. A policeman may know much better how to catch thieves than how to so arrange a city's customs as to prevent boys becoming thieves. To entwine movie censorship with politics and the morals of the "machine" may not help public morals much. There is danger in official censorship. State censorship is better than the police censorship of local municipalities simply because the office can be lifted higher out of the fogs of local city politics. For the same reason a national censor would be better than that of the state. A federal censorship would be too much elevated in the limelight of public affairs to be petty or involved in the machinery of politics. It would save the producer from the unspeakable annoyance of the differing opinions of a thousand local censors. It could more adequately establish, in good time, a sort of code for national morality, so far as the motion picture art and industry are concerned. Once this became established the movies, like books and newspapers, would be largely immune from censorship through the establishment of a social morale.

It would be much better if the producers and the National Board of Review could work all this out without the interference of political censorships. It is simply up to them to do it or submit to the annoyances of legal interference. There is a growing feeling in the better class public mind that too much is "getting-by" that is objectionable. The Board of Review is made up of high-minded people. They are giving their services gratuitously for the public good. They are eager both to know the public mind and to cultivate in it an appreciation both of good pictures and of the fact that it is a new art and a new form of recreation whose canons are not yet fixed. No committee could satisfy every one, for what one thinks right another deplors; that fact emerges even in the reviewing committees. But by the sincere collaboration of many upright minds the best possible may be done. The producers hold the issue largely in their own hands. If they allow commercial interests to irritate public opinion into a reaction against the Board of Review as a sufficient monitor they will get official censorship for their pains.

CORRESPONDENCE

Meeting Strategy with Strategy

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As a matter for editorial comment I want to refer to you the seeming endorsement of the Hoover committee on European relief of the Sunday moving picture show.

In this state, as in many others, Sunday movies are in direct violation of state law. Yet in the literature sent out by the Hoover committee, if I am correctly informed as to the origin of what has come into my hands, today, Sunday, January 30, was requested to be observed by the amusement enterprises all over America as European Relief Day in the effort to raise the sum of two million and a half dollars for that fund. Plans were on foot in this city to carry out this program, and preparations were made by the sheriff to arrest the proprietors and all employes of the theaters, and the prosecuting attorney had determined to prosecute. A conference of the movie men and the ministers, the mayor, and the assistant prosecuting attorney late last week resulted in an agreement to carry into effect a combined community affair this afternoon, the theaters cooperating with the distinct and definite pledge that it is to be no precedent for Sunday shows, and no part of any effort to undertake propaganda in behalf of such a project. One of the ministers will speak at each meeting and in addition to a plea for the cause to which the funds go the clear agreement under which the meetings are held will be made. Whether some such arrangement can be made elsewhere I do not know. With us the picture is only part of the program, and the money will be taken up as a collection with baskets.

Whatever may be the attitude of the Hoover committee this is a fair specimen of the advantage the moving picture people are taking to encourage sentiment for Sunday desecration.

Church Unity Must be Democratic

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I would like to know whether the current plans for church union are democratic. If "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," is a true definition of democracy, then the originators and promoters of church union have made a very serious omission in their plans. None of the recent plans takes into consideration the will of the people comprising the different denominations. Reading these plans one wonders whether church union means nothing more than the theological pooling of the officials of our respective denominations.

It appears to me as if a very serious error has been made by the promoters of union, when they failed to begin with the people and their desires and preferences. Whatever our opinions or convictions are in the matter, church union must be at least a conscious, intentional, and intelligent union of the Christian people comprising our churches. Whatever else it may mean, it must at least be a union of aims, ideals, purposes, and programs of American Christians for the redemption of the world. Surely, the church of Jesus Christ, above all other institutions should be democratic, that is, all its plans, programs, and policies should be carried out only by the consent and will of its constituents. This means that not only the end of any interchurch program but the manner of securing that end should be by the will of the people. Now, if church union, which is one of the great problems confronting American Christianity at the present time, is to be more than a favorite object of discussion, controversy and prayer, if it is to become a gradually established reality in our church communities, cities and in the nation at large, it must come by way of the people in the churches of our different denominations. For democracy, even church democracy, cannot afford to mean less than a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

If this principle is granted, it follows that any plan for church union must consider first not the amalgamation of church boards, but the will of the people, their opinions and convictions in the matter, for after all they are the constituents of the church. They should be educated on the necessity, advantages and even some possible disadvantages of a united church. Let the heads of the denominations confer on this matter, let them work out plans whereby the people in the churches could be intelligently educated on church union, and then if it meets with the approval of these men, let the people in the churches be given a chance to vote on this matter, after a carefully conducted campaign of education.

I offer not a plan but merely a suggestion that might be considered by all intelligent and earnest workers for church union. It is my sincere conviction that the present and proposed plans for union are essentially undemocratic. The deciding voice must be with the people in the pews as well as with the officials. In religion, as in government, we must trust the people, or else refrain from believing in democracy.

I think that the membership of the churches would be greatly honored if they knew that the issue of church union rested with them. They would consider the matter seriously and intelligently for a number of years and then would be in a position to vote on the matter. The other alternative would be for the representatives of the churches to confer together, reach a conclusion, declare the long hoped-for union, and notify the individual churches that the victory is won.

Thinks Mr. Spargo Misses the Point

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have just read the article by Mr. Spargo, "The Truth About Bolshevism and the Jew," and feel that Mr. Spargo has dodged the issue, just as other writers have who are defending the Jews.

The Dearborn Independent has been publishing articles about the "International Jews" for some time and evidently Mr. Spargo has read these articles.

Why is it that men like Mr. Spargo attack the origin of protocols and neglect to deal with the way in which the protocols seem to be in process of fulfillment?

The facts set forth in the pamphlet issued by the Dearborn Independent covering issues of that paper from May 22, 1920, to October 2, 1920, have not been refuted by anyone to date that I know of. Why does Mr. Spargo not refute the statements made in that pamphlet instead of trying to show that the protocols are a myth?

Plain statements are made in this pamphlet called "The International Jew." If you do not have it you can get it for 25 cents from the Dearborn Independent, Dearborn, Mich.

One can't help but feel that the Jewish problem is a real problem when you read the mass of evidence, which no one has yet refuted, therein contained.

I should be glad to have it done and until it is refuted it seems to me such articles as "The Truth About Bolshevism and the Jews" are not worth publishing.

In a Book Store

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: A few days before Christmas I was in a prominent bookstore in a large city looking over the tables of religious books. I was eliminating many and selecting a few, when suddenly I thought of a book I hadn't seen and which I believed a friend would appreciate.

I asked the nearest clerk whether they had what for want of a better name I will call "The Best of Paul's Epistles," by Dr. P. H. D., and quite a few other editors.

"Yes," he replied, "we had a pile of them here. Let me see. I'm from another department and not fully acquainted with these shelves."

He called another clerk for help, when I spied the book. The other clerk came part way over, however, and said to me, confidentially: "We keep them covered up."

He left with that and my original friend took up the conversation.

"Yes," he went on, "there's been a lot of trouble about that book. It's too liberal, to begin with."

He spoke very loudly, and might have been heard anywhere in the store.

He attacked some of the editors, saying that they knew nothing about the Bible, though what I had heard them speak or read by them had always seemed to me very Godly indeed. But he went on without giving me any specific information in regard to the ignorance of the editors.

"Quite a few rich women come in here and buy a lot of books; and if they saw that book for sale there'd be a lot of trouble, and they wouldn't buy any more," was the next I heard.

It was time for another purchaser, a keen old man, to interrupt. He might have been a certain kind of a pastor, or a professor at a few of our theological seminaries. He asked in a kind and firm voice: "What's the matter with 'The Best of Paul's Epistles'? I had a few conferences with Dr. P. H. D. when he wrote it."

"I am opposed to abridgements on principle," replied the clerk, who became very much wrought up over the matter. He stated he would be opposed to a book giving the best in American poetry. He tried to prove his point by bringing to us a very small New Testament, smaller in size than the edition of "The Best of Paul's Epistles," and saying that that book was small enough for him.

"Even the higher critics," he went on, "who think the same way as P. H. D. on most matters, have knocked this book of his to pieces. * * * Of course it's all right if you know the other side. * * * Now, I'm not narrow either."

"I'll take these three," said I, for I had to break away.

"And 'The Best of Paul's Epistles' is among them," said the certain kind of pastor or professor, in high glee.

How could I have refused to buy in the face of such recommendations from such a salesman?

A Denominational Community Church

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The question has been recently mooted in The Christian Century whether a denominational church can become a community church. My experience may have a place in this discussion. I am a Congregationalist, both by choice and by ecclesiastical relations. The denomination is democratic in polity and theoretically requires every member to form his own creed and determine his own life. Every church is independent, limited only by fellowship. It may and often does become a community church.

When I had been in the ministry twenty-five years, the opportunity for which I had been praying came to me to become the pastor of a new church. It was in a thrifty New England city of about fifty thousand population. We had a section of three thousand inhabitants to ourselves. Most of the families were Protestants. When I was installed pastor, in my statement of faith and purpose in entering the ministry I said that my aim would be to make this church a religious home and social center for all the people irrespective of creed or nationality. During a pastorate of eighteen years, we procured an acre of land at the natural center, built an ideal church and parsonage adjoining the church. When I left the active pastorage eight denominations were represented in the church. There are now eleven. It is in all essentials a community church, though Congregational in denominational relation. This is of great value. The community was made up of working people. We had no rich families and had to go outside the parish for much of the money to secure our equipment. Not only the Congregational churches in our city, but the whole conference of churches helped us in our building. We now have a church property of fifty thousand dollars value and it is a social and educational center as well as religious. It is now thoroughly organized, equipped and trained for its work, and is measuring up to the opportunities and needs of the community. The population has increased to six hundred families and is one of the most prosperous and attractive portions of the city. The church will eventually become an institutional church with a branch of the Y. M. C. A. in connection. All these achievements could not have been realized had we been a community church. Besides we would have missed the fellowship and missionary opportunities which came through denominational relations.

I am pastor emeritus of this thrifty Congregational and Community church.

Bishop Nicholson Explains

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: My attention has been called to an editorial in The Christian Century of January 27, regarding the reading of books by Bishop Thomas Nicholson. Bishop Nicholson has given me the following statement, which I hope you will use in part or entire.

Chicago.

J. T. BRADNER SMITH.

Rev. John T. Bradner Smith,
740 Rush Street,
Chicago, Illinois.

My dear brother Smith:

My attention has been called to statements in several of the secular papers which purport to quote something which I said in a brief discussion speech at the Area Council which convened at the LaSalle Hotel two or three weeks since. May I say in the first place, that the remarks referred to were not in a set speech, and were not in any wise intended for publication. They occurred in a heart-to-heart talk, particularly with the preachers, which I supposed was in the nature of an executive session.

In the second place, I am quoted as saying that I had only spent three hours in my study in a year, and by another paper I am quoted as saying that I had only read two books since I had been a bishop. These plain and unqualified statements seem to me too ridiculous to have credence, and I can hardly understand the temper of the editor who allows that kind of a statement to be printed about a man of my position, without at least seeking verification.

The fact is that I referred to the changed character of our episcopacy since the General Conference of 1912 created the Area superintendency. I explained the difference between the older type of bishop who was selected preeminently as a preacher and a platform man, and who seldom or never held the same conference more than once in a lifetime. His mission was largely inspirational. He had no close supervision of the details of administration and leadership in any given area. Since 1912 our men were chosen more particularly with reference to emphasis upon the administrative leadership of a great section of the country, and in this transition period, I explained the strain we had in readjusting. There has been almost no opportunity during the war period for regular hours in the study for the preparation of sermons or addresses, or for the reading of books. This must be done on a train, in hotels, often late at night, or in the early morning, and in a more or less irregular way. I was urging upon the preachers that nevertheless, it must be done, and was counselling with them as to how both the district superintendents, who are in a sense sub-bishops, and myself could not get these better conditions for work, and yet do the thing we were set to do.

It was almost a cruel misrepresentation to tear two or three sentences out of their connection, making no reference to the other situation, and the statements as they have been quoted in the public press, are not only misleading, but standing alone by themselves, they are absolutely false and should be corrected.

Easter and Disarmament

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

Just at this time when Congress seems interested in the subject of disarmament, ought not the voice of the American church be heard in behalf of this great cause? I suggest that coming Easter Sunday be observed as "National Disarmament Sunday," at which time every church in the United States be asked to assign a place in the day's program for the consideration of this subject.

The Resurrection of Jesus is the triumph of the spiritual over the material. What surer evidence could the churches in America give that they "have passed from death unto life" than to plead with one voice for the nation to abandon that most hideous of all forms of materialism, war?

Should this suggestion meet with your approval, will you not seek to obtain the aid of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, the great peace societies and all the other great Christian organizations and agencies which look forward to the day,

"When from the cannon's rusty throat
The bluebird's song is the only note."

Lamps—But No Oil *

THEY were foolish because they took no oil. They were prepared for no emergency. If the procession came by right on the minute they could get in line, but if, delayed by festivities, the bridal group was slow in approaching, their lamps would have burned out and there could be no place in the procession for them. How often has it happened! No reserve power. I remember in college, the captain of the football team, a man of tremendous energy, gave an oration in chapel on "Reserve Power." He showed how football games were won many times by the reserve in power possessed by a team or by one or more men on that team. Many a team lost because it lacked the punch to put over the last drive; the "wallop," as the boys say, was not there. Reserve power means victory.

In these days we are hearing much about the sub-conscious mind. Whatever you may think about it there does seem to be some force in this conception. William James used to say that the mind is like an iceberg, nine-tenths out of sight. The upper part is apparent and can be studied and in a way scientifically analyzed, but by far the larger part is down out of sight. Up, out of this hidden treasury, we do seem to draw rich stores. Out of it come suggestions, urges, tendencies, strengths that cannot be accounted for by cause and effect. May it not be that our good ancestors have stored away in these mighty vaults vast treasures of race experience? May it not be that we ourselves have made deposits there that can be drawn upon in the hours of need? Just as, in a fire, a man will pick up a chest that ordinarily he can hardly budge and carry it out into the street, so, sometimes, in times of frightful stress of temptation, hidden and unknown forces come up to the rescue. Whether this be the contribution of the subliminal self I cannot prove, but that such experiences come we cannot doubt. Unusual bravery, unusual fidelity, unusual strength—all out of this reserve strong-box.

Wise is the man who saves and stores against the time of need. Into his savings account he steadily puts his dollars, into his Life Insurance he regularly stores his wealth, into his Real Estate he constantly adds his money and when the crash comes he smiles and goes his way. There is a Treasury of Merit in each man's heart, into it he can store good deeds, good thoughts, brave resolutions, kind experiences. In mid-winter I can still smell the roses in my garden, when the icy blasts roar through the woods I can still look up through the branches and remember the gold and red leaves of last autumn when the sky was turquoise-blue. "Thy word have I hid in my heart that I might not sin against Thee."

"Each victory helps another to win." That is true. The memory of defeat robs me of strength, the memory of victory gives me power and confidence. I have watched men addicted to drink. They have gone out of my study resolved never to drink again, then face to face they come with temptation; the recollection that hundreds of times before they have not had the strength to resist acts as a force to batter down their wills and all the good resolutions are defeated as they yield again to the subtle appeal. On the other hand, a man faces daily strong temptations to dishonesty or other sins and the very fact that hundreds of times before he has met and vanquished these foes gives him the ability to overcome. But I like to think that the "Oil" is the Holy Spirit. We may quench the spirit and we may make it burn more brightly. If my heart is an altar and His love the flame, I shall have power to meet and conquer the various temptations as they come. O God, help us to heap on the fuel that the fire may blaze in our souls.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Half Million Given to Bethany College

The mid-year meeting of the trustees of Bethany College, a Disciples institution, has been made memorable by the gift of a half million dollars. President Cloyd H. Goodnight had planned a campaign for three-quarters of a million when unexpectedly two-thirds of this was pledged by M. M. Cochran, one of the trustees. It is thought that it will be an easy matter to secure the quarter of a million on which the half million gift is conditioned. The college already had accumulated endowment reaching a total of $625,000. A little over a decade ago it was thought the old college founded in the wilderness of West Virginia by Alexander Campbell might have to discontinue, but such a question would not now be raised. Under the new president the standards of scholarship are being raised, and the student body is increasing.

Well-Known City Evangelist Refuses Call

Rev. F. L. Bowen has been for many years city superintendent for the Disciples of Kansas City. His method has been to organize a church and then remain on the field until the church could support a pastor. By this patient, persistent work many Disciples churches have been planted in Kansas City. He was called to Los Angeles recently to take up the same kind of work, but after careful consideration decided to remain with his old friends in Kansas City.

Baptist Dean Makes Many Addresses

Among the platform interpreters of Christianity in this country few have a perennial popularity equal to that of Dr. Shailer Mathews, dean of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. He has accepted an invitation to give the George Slocum Bennett Foundation lectures at Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., early in March. In connection with this trip Dean Mathews will also speak at Columbia University and Vassar College, March 13; and at the Columbia Institute of Arts and Sciences, and Brooklyn Institute, March 18. During the spring vacation Dean Mathews is to speak at various colleges and universities in Texas, including the Southern Methodist University at Dallas and Kidd-Key College at Sherman, Texas. He will also speak at the Dallas Open Forum.

Lenten Meetings for Business Men

The keeping of Lent grows more significant every year and among the announcements for this spring is one that the Boston Federation of Churches will sustain a daily downtown prayer-meeting during Lent. In Chicago there are several denominational noon meetings, among the denominations which have preaching in a theater being the Episcopalians and the Lutherans. The Lenten meetings this year should command an increased attendance from business men in view of the widely expressed view of these men that religion is absolutely essential to the welfare of business. Business men have been challenged by Mr. Babson and others to give more of themselves to the building up of organized religion in the nation.

New York Episcopalians are Radical

An outbreak of radicalism in the fellowship of the Protestant Episcopal church is one of the interesting phenomena of the times. The election of the bishop of New York has given the editor of the Churchman a chance to say that the diocese of New York would be panic-stricken if God should send the kind of a bishop that the diocese needs. Dr. Karl Reiland has been making light of the Lambeth proposals for union. He says their spirit, in spite of all pretensions at humility, is "Come to me and I will eat you up." Dr. Percy Stickney Grant criticizes the costliness of the bishop's establishment, and the costliness of the cathedral.

Chesterton Runs Afoul the Sects

Gilbert K. Chesterton has spoken very positively on the subject of religion, and as he tours this country he is paying his respects to the various Protestant sects. Christian Science is for him a revival of Gnosticism. Unitarianism is condemned on the theory that it is not good for God to be alone. The lonely God of Mohammedanism scourged the world with a scimitar. The work of Luther was all a mistake. In religion Chesterton advocates a return to mysticism and medievalism. He loves to trace the downfall of one heresy after another, catholicism alone continuing as a living force in the world.

Minister Will Lecture on Homiletics

In the absence of President Charles M. Stuart on a financial mission for Garrett Biblical Institute during May, Rev. O. F. Jordan, pastor of the Evanston church of the Disciples will deliver a series of lectures on sermon making to Dr. Stuart's class. Garrett Biblical Institute is closely related to Northwestern University and is the Methodist theological seminary of the middle-west. President Stuart is engaged in some vigorous promotional work this year as the institution needs more adequate buildings.

Instruction for Young Christians

The interest in training children for membership in the church is growing in all communions. The General Assembly of the United Presbyterian church has a committee which is working on a revision of the shorter catechism while another committee has prepared a manual for young communicants. The latter work is called "Children of the Covenant" and it affords the additional instruction of a more practical nature which is necessary to make loyal church members of new converts. The Methodist Episcopal church has recently provided similar manuals for the use of its pastors. "Decision day" and other mass evangelism practices in the Sunday-schools are making way for the instructional methods by which more enduring victories are won through the gospel.

Getting the Newsboys Out to Church

The minister who has the vision to find and win the neglected groups in a great city is the one who is really successful in this difficult and important field. Recently Rev. A. T. Abernathy, pastor of Richmond Street Christian church of Cincinnati, invited the newsboys of the city to hear a sermon on "The First Newsie." Nearly five hundred of the city's newsboys attended the service. The newspaper managers took notice of the occasion, and a number of them were in attendance as well as several editors. The gospel is good news, and this minister had an excellent opportunity to establish a point of contact with hundreds of lives not ordinarily influenced by the church.

Hiram College is Starting a New Drive

The General Educational Board has offered Hiram College $200,000 for endowment and $32,000 for current expenses provided the college will secure pledges from other sources of $400,000 for endowment. The money given by the General Education Board is given on the condition that it be used in salaries for teachers. The gift is made after a visit to the college by Dr. Buttrick, president of the board, and is regarded as a significant endorsement of the work that is being done at Hiram College. This college is a foundation of the Disciples, and had for its president at one time Dr. James A. Garfield, who became president of the United States. A campaign will be begun in the near future to meet the conditions of the gift.

Miss Royden Hunting for a Church

Miss Maude Royden, the popular woman preacher of London, has been preaching for the past year at Kensington Town Hall. She feels the need of a better environment for her work and a committee is hunting for a church. Four Congregationalist churches are under consideration. She is planning to found a Fellowship guild of preachers, most of whom shall be women. These guild preachers would be at the service of Christian communities needing aid. While the Established church accords Miss Royden the freedom of the platform at a church congress, she has no opportunity of serving as minister within her own religious fellowship.

Unitarian Seeks Orthodox Fellowship

Rev. Walter Murray recently made application for recognition as a minister in the United Free Church presbytery of Glasgow. He is a highly educated man who for many years followed the profession of letters. Among his other scholastic achievements he has won a London B. D. He says he went into the Unitarian ministry rather because of his desire for freedom than because of deep interest in the teachings of Unitarianism. He makes the astonishing report that the freedom he sought in the Unitarian fellowship he did not find. The presbytery has given favorable consideration to his application, and has sent it on to the Assembly. It seems likely that he will be given recognition in the ministry of the United Free church. While defections from orthodoxy to unitarianism are not uncommon, the return from the Unitarian fold is not so common.

Wants Quakers and Unitarians in Union

The talk of church union in England takes a radical turn at times. Recently Rev. Arthur Pringle, of Purley, England, an evangelical minister, spoke before a group of Unitarians on "Life the Creed-maker." He proposed to his audience that religion should be given to the people in a fresh vocabulary just as William James popularized philosophy by ridding it of a dead vocabulary. On the subject of church union, he was even more radical. In this connection he said: "The man in the street today would not be won by any reunion based on the exclusion of Quakers and Unitarians. Let them declare boldly that the way to reunion was for all the churches to drop exclusiveness and petty, shop-keeping competitiveness, and state frankly that all communities which have the Spirit of Christ belong to his church."

City Church Needs Money

The tragedy of the religious situation is that men of vision often see the possibility of great service, but have no tools. Just as Buffalo University was about to erect a five million dollar university plant adjacent to University Christian church, Buffalo, the church building burned down. The congregation is still young and small, and it will be difficult to erect a $45,000 plant, although the needs of the situation demand a much larger plant. The congregation is being aided by a large grant from the church building department of the United Christian Missionary Society to erect the $45,000 building.

Community House

First Christian Church of Rochester, N. Y., has recently purchased new property and will henceforth carry on, under the leadership of Rev. B. T. Smith, a community work. Two distinct institutions will carry forward the work, one the church itself and the other a "Community house." A large residence property has been purchased for the community work and nearby there will be an auditorium in which the more formal work of the church can be carried on. The ideal of the minister is set forth in these words: "The church is announced to be: not a rich man's church; not a poor man's church—not a church for the masses nor a church for the classes—but it is a church of Jesus Christ where all are brethren and on an equality. It is a Community church in that it tries to serve the community. It is a Christian church in that its method and message is Christian."

Sunday Movies an Issue in Many Towns

The drive of the moving picture interests to have Sunday theaters all over the nation is a significant fact in the life of today. In the state of Indiana there is a law forbidding the opening of theaters on Sunday. This law is violated in many cities of the state, among these being Portland. In this growing city the ministers have raised a common fund with which to fight the movie interests, and the first case will come to trial shortly. In Evanston, Ill., the theaters are closed by city ordinance, and for two years an alderman has represented the theaters in political action looking toward a closing of the theaters. Two years ago the churches defeated the theaters in an open appeal to the city through a paid advertisement. The fight has opened again this spring by the circulation of a petition by the alderman to make the subject a matter of referendum at the spring election. The issue has been discussed in a number of pulpits, Rev. O. F. Jordan of the Disciples church taking the position that movie operators, ushers and musicians should be protected from Sunday labor just as most other workmen are.

Religious Migration from Canada

Some of the most courageous peoples in all history have been those who have suffered for conscience sake. The way of the Mennonite has never been easy and recent events seem to indicate that his cup of sorrow is not yet full. The Continent reports thus some recent facts with regard to Canadian Mennonites: "Because the Canadian government has passed laws compelling Mennonites to send their children to public schools and because of other educational and religious restrictions imposed on them by authorities, the Mennonites in Manitoba, Canada, are selling their property as rapidly as possible, preparatory to moving to Mississippi in the spring. Prior to the war there was little opposition to this sect among Canadians, and its members were respected because of their thrift and honesty. The restrictions which were imposed and rigorously enforced upon them by Canada during the war have not been withdrawn, however, and the former guarantee of freedom in religious and educational matters having been taken away, the Mennonites have been looking for three years for a place to which to migrate. The language used in their religion is German, so they have been accused of pro-Germanism. There are said to be more than 150,000 adherents of this sect in Canada, and its leaders declare that the younger generation will move with their parents. Most of their land thus far sold has been bought by American farmers. There has been considerable opposition in Mississippi to permit the sect to settle there. The American Legion and other patriotic bodies have urged Governor Russell to withdraw the welcome extended and the religious guarantees given them. He appears uninfluenced by the protests, however, and agents of the Mennonites have purchased more than 100,000 acres of land in Green and Wayne counties in the southeastern part of the state on the Alabama border, and have taken options for 100,000 acres more."

Christian Unity Conference in Southland

Under the auspices of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, a Christian Unity Conference was held in Dallas, Tex., immediately following the one held in St. Louis. The conference was in charge of Dr. Peter Ainslie, president of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity. Other speakers were Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, of the Carnegie Peace Foundation; Bishop G. H. Kinsolving, of the diocese of Texas, of the Episcopal church; Dr. Ivan Lee Holt, formerly of Dallas, now pastor of St. John's Methodist church of St. Louis, and Dr. F. W. Burnham of St. Louis.

Presbyterian Heads Great Methodist University

Prof. Walter Dill Scott is the new president of Northwestern University. He is a Presbyterian and a graduate of McCormick Theological Seminary. Recently he spoke before the Methodist Ministers' Meeting in Chicago and outlined his plans for a greater Northwestern. He has vision and enthusiasm and the Methodist dominies are in a mood to give loyal support to their Presbyterian leader. One of the first achievements of President Scott's administration has been the establishment of a school of journalism with some of the eminent newspaper men of the city on the staff of instructors.

Layman States His Views on the Sabbath

The Philadelphia Church Club held a debate recently on the keeping of the Lord's Day. The Rev. Dr. Tomkins and Mr. George Wharton Pepper discussed the question from the standpoint of the lawyer and of the minister. Mr. Pepper has been known as an advocate of more liberal laws. He stated his position in these words: "The Sabbatarian group has done a wonderful service in checking a tendency toward undue laxity. They are a small minority, but insists, as people with principles generally are. It makes them a politically significant group, and they have it in their power to check changes in the existing blue law. As long as they remain powerful politically there will be no change in the Sunday law. If their power wanes, we may obtain a system of Sunday regulation in which these four things will be emphasized; first, protection to religious opportunity; second, prohibition of unnecessary business or industry; third, restriction of every amusement not readily pursued in harmony with the religious observances of the day; fourth, uniformity in the regulation, both as it affects rich and poor. The gravest reproach of the present law is that the poor and unprivileged get the greatest pressure of its restraint, because there are many ways in which the rich evade the code."

Boston Wants Next Methodist Conference

The next quadrennial conference of the Methodist church will be a history-making one as it will have to do with the union of the north and south Methodisms. There is more than the usual rivalry among the cities to secure this meeting. The Methodists of Boston and vicinity have already organized to capture the honor for their city. The next quadrennial conference will be held in May, 1924.

Dr. Clifford Recovers from Serious Accident

The accident to Dr. Clifford, veteran Baptist minister of England, has been chronicled. After being knocked down by a taxicab, he is back in the public ministry again, and declares himself in fine form. He is a great favorite all over England and there are many calls for his services.

New York Ministers Interpret Sunday Agitation

Seven ministers of New York connected with prominent churches have recently investigated the nation-wide agitation on the matter of Sunday laws. They report that there is before Congress only one bill and that relates to the Sunday law for the District of Columbia. The ministers assert that the International Sporting Club, the Exhibitors' Bulletin for moving picture operators, and a number of similar influences have made the agitation a camouflage for their efforts to secure more liberal laws this coming year. The moving picture people cannot run Sunday shows in some states, and these shows are known to be very profitable financially. The seven ministers who signed the statement on the work of the Lord's Day Alliance were among the most prominent of New York, but they were not able to get their statement into any of the papers of their city.

Palestine Has Gone Dry

With the coming of British rule in Palestine, the liquor dealers hoped to open up traffic where they had previously been kept out by Mohammedan religious influence. First Roland Storrs prohibited the open bar in Jerusalem. This decree by the governor of the city has been followed by an order from Sir Samuel Montague, British High Commissioner of Palestine extending the prohibition principle to the whole of Palestine. The action was doubtless taken under the influence of Mohammedan opinion, but it is none the less disappointing to those who had hoped for a new market for booze.

Disciple Embarks for Africa Inland Mission

Highland Park Christian church of Los Angeles recently held a farewell service for Miss Helen Edith Mead who is going to central Africa under the African Inland Mission. She will face one of the most dangerous tasks that remain to be done for the church of Christ. In her home church she has been a strong promoter of the Life-Work Recruit Band. Her church has been very zealous in committing its young people to the task of world-wide missions, and nineteen of them are pledged to enter the religious field.

Hope to Create a Jesuit Saint

A new candidate for sainthood in the Roman Catholic church is Cardinal Bellarmine. About a hundred and fifty years ago an effort was made to secure his canonization, but this was defeated on account of the unpopularity of the Jesuit order. Recently the pope declared that the celebrated cardinal had practiced the virtues of the Christian faith in an unusual degree. This is the beginning of

Unity Conference at St. Louis

MORE successful than even its promoters dared to expect, the Midwest Conference on Christian Unity, held last week in St. Louis, opened new channels for the freer flowing of sentiments of fellowship among churchmen of widely separated ideals. It was planned for the sessions to be held in the chapel of Second Baptist church, but at the first session the room overflowed and the assembly was moved to the capacious auditorium, which it came near filling. At the night sessions the house was well filled. Between eight hundred and a thousand persons were in attendance. For three days the various movements for Christian unity were interpreted by authoritative spokesmen and discussed with great freedom from the floor. There was the Lambeth proposal interpreted by Bishop Ethelbert Talbot, of the diocese of Bethlehem, Pa., who was a member of the Lambeth committee which formulated the now famous Appeal. There was the World Conference on Faith and Order interpreted by its patient and far-visioned secretary, Mr. Robert Gardiner, of Boston. There was the American Council on Organic Unity of Evangelical Churches, interpreted by Mr. Henry W. Jessup, of New York, who framed the "Philadelphia Plan." There was the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, interpreted by its General Secretary, Dr. Charles S. Macfarland. And there was the Universal Conference of the Church of Christ on Life and Work, a new movement launched at Geneva last summer by that dynamic personality, the Bishop of Upsala, interpreted at St. Louis by Rev. Frederick Lynch, editor of The Christian Work. Besides these organized agencies dealing directly with the problem of church unity, there was the World Alliance for the Promotion of International Friendship Through the Evangelical Churches, represented in the absence of its secretary, Dr. H. A. Atkinson, whom illness detained, by Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, of Brooklyn. Dr. Arthur Judson Brown, of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, spoke on "Christian Unity in the Mission Fields." Rev. Samuel McComb, of Baltimore, Canon of the Cathedral of Maryland, spoke on "Causes of Disunion and the Path to Reconciliation." A picturesque and charming figure in the conference was Bishop Velimirovic, of Serbia, who wields an influence in the Eastern Orthodox church said to be second only to that of the metropolitan of Athens. His two addresses, spoken in beautiful English, were memorable in their impressiveness and their refinement of spiritual understanding. The bishop's prayer and benediction, which closed the Thursday evening session, will linger always with those into whose hearts his exquisitely gracious words fell.

This was the first time in American church history that a common platform has been provided for those who from different angles of approach are working at the task of Christian unity, to come together for comparative testimony and discussion. In providing such a platform the Disciples Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, headed by Dr. Peter Ainslie and Rev. H. C. Armstrong, has rendered a distinct service to the cause of unity and reflected credit upon the communion which the Association represents. The temper of all the discussions lifted the great theme far above the sectarian levels of controversy and denominational dogma. Each man came as if saying: "This is my conviction; I bear testimony to what seems to me true. What have you to say to it? And what testimony have you to bear to the conviction which you cherish?" A wider and more sympathetic mind was bound to be created in such an atmosphere. Fellowship was discovered where without such candor in conference none would have seemed possible.

This Midwest Conference is the first of a series of similar assemblies to be undertaken by the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity. A second is being held this week in Dallas, Tex., and it is hoped a third may be found practicable at Cleveland, Ohio, before the end of spring.

a process which leads to beatification and finally to canonization. The members of the Society of Jesus are very greatly pleased with this recognition given one of their great leaders.

Great Cleveland Church Has Strong Missionary Organization

Euclid Avenue Christian church is one of the strong missionary forces among the Disciples of Christ. This congregation supports a whole mission station at Bolenge, Africa. A study of the missionary interest in this congregation reveals the important place occupied by the woman's missionary society. This organization has a circulating library of two hundred books which are kept busy. Three hundred and fifty women are subscribers to the missionary magazine of the Disciples, the World Call. Every Thursday afternoon a group of women meet at the church for prayers, and a program of personal visitation is carried on continuously. The missionary idea is the outstanding interest of the congregational life.

Advice on the Erection of Educational Plants

Some of the most expensive church plants in the United States are found to be utterly deficient in equipment for modern church work after they are finished. Particularly does the ordinary architect fail in providing equipment for the educational and social work of the modern church. The churches are entering now upon an era of building in spite of the high prices, and the southern Baptist denomination has anticipated this by appointing an Architectural Secretary in connection with the work of the Baptist Sunday-school Board. This secretary, P. E. Burroughs, has issued some small manuals showing plans and pictures of up-to-date plants, and is prepared to recommend architects who understand the needs of the modern church.

Church Industrial Conference Hears Radicals

The industrial conference held in Chicago January 24, under the auspices of the Church Federation was conventional so long as ministers and church workers talked, but at the evening session, some of the prominent labor leaders of the city were present. This session was animated and had a late adjournment. The editor of the "New Majority" was among the speakers. He is an interesting figure in Chicago life by reason of the fact that he is a wealthy man who has espoused the cause of labor and is one of its most radical interpreters.

Union Missions Started in San Domingo

The first Protestant mission work was started in San Domingo the past year, with five Protestant organizations co-operating. This new method of opening up mission work is regarded by Rev. S. G. Inman, executive secretary of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, as the most important achievement of the organization during the past year. A budget of eighty thousand dollars has been provided for the new work and Rev. Philo W. Drury, a United Brethren missionary of Porto Rico, has been secured to head the new task. A fifty thousand dollar stone building has been purchased in the heart of Santo Domingo city. This will serve as a chapel, school, social center and clinic for the work of the new union station. The new church will be known simply as an evangelical church with no denominational labels attached to it whatsoever.

Evangelical Magazine Floated in South America

The interpretation of current events in South America has been given either by journals hostile to all organized religion, or by journals under the control of the Roman Catholic church. The Committee on Cooperation in Latin America has been able to establish a journal the past year under the name of "The New Democracy." Its editor is Dr. Juan Orts Gonzalez. This journal will promote friendship between North and South America, and give a Christian view of world events. A dozen of the more prominent publicists of South America have become staff contributors to the magazine.

World Conference Needs Money

An appeal has been sent out by the Continuation Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order for fifty thousand dollars. Up to the present time the committee has been financed by a few laymen of the Protestant Episcopal church. It is now felt that the cooperating denominations should bear a proportionate part of the insignificant burden of financing the conference.

Practice Christian Union in Washington

The duplication of churches on the frontier by state and national missionary societies was a crying abuse until the present era of conference and cooperation. The Presbyterians have recently given evidence that they take their union talk seriously by turning over two congregations to the care of other denominations. The Presbytery of Central Washington disbanded their Zillah church and advised the members to unite

Workingmen and the Churches

C. R. ZAHNISER has rendered a real service to the Christian world by gathering data on the subject of men and the church. It is commonly believed (by journalists who seldom attend) that there are few men in the churches. Mr. Zahniser in his recent article in the "Continent" shows that the number of men as compared with the women is in the ratio of 4 to 6. While this proportion is not satisfactory to religious leaders, the story is not so bad as many believed it to be. Mr. Zahniser gives the following account of the methods by which his questionnaire was conducted:

"In order to ascertain something of the facts in the matter, so far as one community is concerned, a questionnaire was sent to fifty representative churches. The list was proportionally distributed both as to denominations and as to size and location. For example, along with a wealthy church in one of the most exclusive districts was selected another doing institutional work in a congested district, another in a middle-class residential section of the city and another in a neighboring borough. Replies were received from thirty-eight churches of ten denominations, having a total membership of 21,915. The list is so representative that the facts secured can be taken as fairly indicative of all the churches of the community.

"The questionnaire grouped the adult male membership of the churches as follows: Professional men—teachers, attorneys, chemists, physicians, architects, etc. Capitalists—business men having more than four employees. Small business men—in business for themselves, but having fewer than four employees. Wage earners—clerical, office and store clerks, salesmen, agents, etc., skilled manual, machinists, carpenters, etc., unskilled manual.

Following is a tabulation of the results:

Total number of churches	38
Total membership	21,915
Percentage of membership male..	40
Average membership	576

Analysis of Adult Male Membership.

Classification	Per cent of Total
Professional men	9.5
Capitalists and large employers....	6.5

Unskilled labor	17.0

"In order to know to what extent relatively the church is reaching people of different industrial classes, it would of course be necessary to know the percentages of each in the entire population of the community. These figures are nowhere available. In the census reports for 1910 are tables covering part of the population of the country, which show the following proportions:

Classification	Percentage
Professional men	4.0
Capitalists and large employers.....	0.8
Small business men	15.0
Clerical employes	11.0

Mr. Zahniser reaches the conclusion that the church is not a class institution and not an institution for women and children. Unskilled labor is not reached by Protestant churches as largely as should be, but a large part of this population is Roman Catholic. Were Catholic figures added to Protestant, it would probably be seen that religion knows no class lines.

with the Disciples of that community. The members of the Toppenish church were told to unite with the Congregational church. This action of the Presbyterians has been favorably commented on by the secular press.

King of Siam Will Marry a Presbyterian

Announcement has been made in the kingdom of Siam of the betrothal of the king to Princess Vallabha Devi, daughter of Prince Naradhip. She was for a number of years a student at the Harriet House School, operated at Bangkok by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Following the betrothal the father of the bride sent an invitation to the pupils and teachers of the school to attend a reception at his home. The king of Siam is known as one of the best informed men in his kingdom, and his union with a woman who has the best Christian training may mean much to the ongoing of civilization in the orient.

Provide Correspondence Courses in Rural Church

The Christian Work of New York will sponsor a number of correspondence courses on the rural church. It has secured as director Dr. Edmond deS. Brunner. The course he will give takes up such problems as organization and finance, survey of the parish, religious education for the local church, worship, evangelism and preaching. A number of rural experts of various denominations have been associated with Dr. Brunner in an advisory capacity.

"No Man's Land of the Churches"

Rev. B. F. Lamb, secretary of the Ohio Federation of Churches, has called the attention of the village and small town pastors to a problem which must be met if the cause of religion is not to suffer greatly. In a recent letter addressed to them he mentions a "no man's land of the churches." This is described as the territory outside a town or village which is not ministered to by a church. There is a great deal of such territory in Ohio, in spite of the over-churched condition of many neighborhoods. Country people come to town for recreation, and the consolidated school has increased the tendency to center the social life in the village or town. Country churches of the one room type have been dying, and the village churches are urged to reach out into a wider area. This wider parish idea is the more feasible in view of the common use of the automobile by farmers.

New Woman Congressman Asks Prayers

Miss Alice M. Robertson, recently elected as congressman from Muskogee, Okla., and the only woman who will sit in the new congress, was for many years a Presbyterian home missionary among the Indians. She recently sent a request for prayer to her home mission board and expressed the hope that she might continue to be of service to her Indian wards, many of whom she regards as

"still children and unable to walk alone." A part of her platform is: "I am willing to give six days full service a week and work as hard as any man for the six days, but on the Sabbath I will rest."

Modern Methods Win in Texas

Rev. Tolbert F. Weaver is the aggressive leader of the Disciples church at Houston, Tex. Moving pictures are being used on Sunday and Thursday nights in this community, and large audiences are reported. During the past year one hundred new members were received into the church. A new building is being started, the first section of which will cost seventy-five thousand dollars.

Chicago Y. M. C. A. Has Good Year

Renewed emphasis upon the religious phases of its work characterizes the annual report of the Chicago Y. M. C. A., recently issued by the General Secretary, L. Wilbur Messer. The total attendance at religious meetings the past year was 170,931, a net gain over the previous year of forty-five per cent. The number of men and boys pledging themselves "to begin or renew the Christian life" was 2,946. There was a twenty per cent increase in the Association schools in the city. The increase in the average daily attendance at the Association buildings was thirteen per cent. One of the very significant developments is a great increase in "Hi-Y" clubs, made up of Christian young men in the high schools. There are now thirty-eight such clubs organized in nineteen high schools and two preparatory schools. The Y. M. C. A. hotel on Wabash Avenue is an enormous structure. It once seemed that it might prove a white elephant, but the past year's report shows that it has operated at 97 per cent capacity in spite of the fact that it limits its service to young men who are recent comers to the city. Loans have been given to 1,491 young men and boys, and ninety per cent of the $6,043 has been returned. Mr. Messer is beginning his 34th year as general secretary, and is one of the most successful executives to be found anywhere in America.

Will Talk on Industrial Problems

The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions maintains Dr. John McDowell as secretary and as a specialist on industrial problems. His early experiences fit him for his tasks. He has recently prepared an address on "The Challenge of the Present Unrest to the Church." This address will be given over a wide itinerary beginning at Auburn, N. Y., on February 7. The whole month of February will be devoted to the giving of this message before influential groups of Presbyterians.

Most of his life has been spent in the pastorate, and when Central Christian church of Youngstown, O., called him recently to become the successor in the pastorate to Rev. W. D. Ryan, he accepted the call. He will begin his new work some time in March. Mr. Lockhart was trained at the University of Chicago, and has held several important pastorates in various sections of the country. He is going to a church that has been known for its progressive spirit and missionary program.

"The Journal of Religion"

The University of Chicago Press has discontinued both the American Journal of Theology and the Biblical World. These two journals, with a long and honorable history, have been merged into the Journal of Religion. The change is significant. Educated religious leaders are less interested in the minutiae of biblical criticism than in former years. The Journal of Religion will contain a minimum of this kind of material. Neither, on the other hand, is there any gripping interest in systematic theology as it was once schematically presented. The present interest is in a scientific study of religious experience and of religious society. This does not bar out biblical study, the study of church history or even systematic theology, but it makes the soul of the believer and his social relations the primary concern. In the initial issue of the Journal of Religion are some challenging titles. Among these "The Religious Breakdown of the Ministry," by Professor George A. Coe, and "Why Do Religions Die?" by Professor James Bissett Pratt. The tone of the journal is not popular but academic in the better sense. One may be sure that it will never drop down into "journalese." On the other hand it will probably avoid such discussions as "The Origin of the Iota Subscript." The editor of the journal is Professor Gerald Birney Smith. Dr. Smith has won his place in the university world as an authoritative scholar. His "Guide to the Study of the Christian Religion" showed an encyclopedic grasp of the data of the religious field, and a viewpoint that could have been acquired only through years of careful study. With the current events of the Christian world the new journal will have little to do; it confines its attention to the underlying problems.

Live Discussions of Religion in England

Some of the most eminent men of Great Britain outside the fellowship of the Established church will speak at a series of meetings arranged by the church at Queen's Hall early in February. Mr. Balfour will challenge the ecclesiastical leaders on the subject of the unity of Christians. He will probably say a good many things not very agreeable to the feelings of ecclesiastics. The Archbishop of York will reply to his speech. On another night a representative of the Dockers' organization will challenge the church on its industrial record. Out of these meetings it is hoped there may come a clearer idea in England of just what the church does stand for. Many people still ascribe to the church opinions and attitudes which have been outgrown for several decades.

New Membership Rule of Y. W. C. A. Works

Much controversy was occasioned at the last national convention of the Y. W. C. A. over the question of membership terms. It was finally decided to abolish the so-called evangelical test and receive all believers in Jesus Christ. This change was made because of the needs of college and industrial communities. Reports are now coming in from the various educational institutions of the land, and it is reported that Allegheny College in Pennsylvania has 100 per cent of the girls of the freshmen class as members of the Y. W. C. A. There are 750 colleges in America where the Y. W. C. A. is organized, and the reports coming back are uniformly favorable.

Rev. Harry Foster Burns Goes to Baltimore

Rev. Harry Foster Burns has resigned his pastorate in First Church of Dorchester, Boston, and accepted a call to First Unitarian Church of Baltimore. He has spent three years with the Boston church. While there he has been a frequent contributor to Unity, and has spent his summers in England where he often spoke in leading pulpits. Mr. Burns was trained at the University of Chicago and he has belonged successively to the Baptist, Disciples, Congregational and Unitarian denominations.

The Daily Altar

AND THE EVER Y-MEMBER CANVASS

MANY churches are promoting the idea of the devotional life in connection with the every-member canvass. For instance, in Central Church, New York, every canvassing team has been supplied with a copy of "The Daily Altar" by Herbert L. Willett and Charles Clayton Morrison. They will discuss not only the financial support of the church but will present also the privilege of personal and family devotion, suggesting to each home the regular use of this beautiful manual throughout the year. Why not try this plan in your church?

The book is published in two editions: In beautiful purple cloth at $1.50 per copy, five for $7.00, eight for $10.00; in lots of fifty at $1.00 per copy. In full leather at $2.50 per copy; five for $11.00; eight for $17.00. (Postage, single copy, 8 cents; if ordering in lots, add 4 cents per book for postage.)

The Meaning of Baptism

By Charles Clayton Morrison

The Continent says of this work:

“It required courage to publish this book. It is by a minister of the Disciples' church, which has been peculiarly strenuous in behalf of the scriptural necessity for immersion, and he writes that ‘the effect of our study is absolutely to break down the notion that any divine authority whatsoever stands behind the practice of immersion.’ Instead, in the New Testament, baptism simply means the conferment and acceptance of the status of a Christian. He is strongly against the rebaptism of Christian believers who apply to Baptist or Disciple churches for membership having been accepted in other churches by any mode of baptism whatever. Equally he opposes infant baptism, because the subject of baptism must be voluntary. At the root of his argument lies a sound desire for Christian unity.”

The Christian Advocate (New York) says:

“This is probably the most important book in English on the place of baptism in Christianity written since Mozley published his ‘Baptismal Regeneration’ in 1856.”

The Congregationalist says of it:

“A daring and splendidly Christian piece of work, in which the author frankly asserts that Jesus ‘had no intention of fixing a physical act upon his followers. He did not have in mind the form of baptism but the meaning of it.’”

Is Christianity Practicable?

By WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN
Professor of Systematic Theology
Union Theological Seminary

"In this time of world crisis," says Dr. Brown, in the preface of his book, "when existing customs are everywhere being challenged, it is essential that we raise anew the question as to the nature and grounds of our faith, and that we ask ourselves whether the enterprise in which we are engaged is a practicable one, worthy of the allegiance of sensible men." In the book, Dr. Brown considers his great theme from the following viewpoints: "The World Crisis as Challenge and Opportunity;" "The Christian Interpretation of History;" "The Duty for To-morrow;" "What the Church Can Do."

A Lenten Appreciation

By James Austin Richards

Monday

Theme for the Day—The Blessedness of Daily Work.

Our daily work is part of God's plan for us—and a large and basic part. We must avoid that fallacy so common among religious people that work is secular and worship is religious. Work is religious, if it is good work well done. Indeed, good work, be it ever so commonplace, is a form of worship. Out of it grows character. God reveals Himself increasingly in our times in the work-a-day life of men. He calls us to take up our tasks, with all their drudgery and exactions, in a spirit of joy and patience and courage.

Scripture—Man goeth forth unto his work, and to his labor until the evening.—Psalm 104: 22.

Forenoon, and afternoon, and night;—Forenoon,
And afternoon, and night; Forenoon, and—what?
The empty song repeats itself. No more?
Yea, that is life; make this forenoon sublime,
This afternoon a psalm, this night a prayer,
And time is conquered, and thy crown is won.

EDWARD ROWLAND SILL ("The Day").

Prayer—Good Father, Thou hast set before us a goodly heritage, and the lines are fallen to us in pleasant places. We have our daily work and our nightly rest, and blessings enough to make us ever grateful. Save us, we pray Thee, from discontent, from depression of spirit and from thanklessness. Make us strong and of good courage. Suffer us not to grow weary in our task, nor to faint in our pilgrimage. So shall we be fitted for higher blessings and nobler service in a world without end.—Amen.

The Daily Altar

By Herbert L. Willett and
Charles Clayton Morrison

THE remarkable success of this book of devotion lends encouragement to those who believe that at least one "way out" for the distraught church is by the way of personal and family devotion. It presents for each day in the year a theme, meditation, Scripture selection, poem and prayer. For these high-tension days, when the habit of meditation and the custom of family prayers are all but lost, this book makes possible the revival of spiritual communion, on a practicable and inspiring basis, in every home, at every bedside and in every heart.

A Lenten Prayer—For Strength in Temptation

STRONG Son of God, who became our Saviour through the stern discipline of Thy manifold temptations, in Thy presence is our refuge and hope. We are ever calling upon Thee for aid, and Thou art ever offering Thyself to us in grace and strength and infinite understanding. Yet there is no moment when Thou art more near to us than when we feel the promptings and lure of evil. Thou wert tempted in all points like as we are. Thou knowest how frail are our wills, how easily baffled and ensnared are our judgments, and how inconstant are our loyalties. It is in Thy knowledge of our weakness that we find strength, and in Thy triumph over just such temptations as we face that we keep renewing our hope of victory for ourselves.

Go with us, Thou comrade of the spirit, into our lonely wilderness, that we may meet our adversary in Thy company. And walk with us amid the crowd in the city's streets, that we may have a defender against the wiles of evil and a strong tower from the foe. As Thou didst share our struggle against all base promptings of the flesh, may we share Thy courage, Thy vision, Thy soundness of soul, and Thy perfect faithfulness to the Highest. May our comradeship with Thee in our moral struggle rest upon the sure conviction of Thine utter and most real humanity. Show us that all the resources that were open to Thee are open to us, that God is near us as He was near to Thee; and that angels wait around us to minister to us if we but yield our wills into the Father's hand.

Give us, in our humble degree, O Master, some clear sense of a divine commission for our lives like that with which Thou wentest to Thy temptation. As thou did'st carry in Thy heart the sin and hope of the world, may we meet our temptation with the strengthening thought that the destiny of other lives is staked upon our loyalty and our obedience to the heavenly vision. May no base or sordid act of ours hurt or befoul any innocent life or add to the burdens and weakness of others who lean upon or look up to us. Watch with us, O Lord, over the imaginings of our minds lest we be surprised into some action that will not only overthrow our honor but bring shame and trouble upon those who trust us and whose love is the dearest treasure of our hearts. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

Evangelism in the Lenten Season

NEARLY all of the great evangelical bodies now have an organization which directs their evangelistic activities. The secretaries of evangelism are urging the Lenten season as a proper time to stress the work of recruiting the church. Those few communions which still have the professional evangelist are hearing protests from the professionals against using the Lenten season. It seems to the silversmiths that trade all the year around may be interfered with. It is perfectly true that the doors of the church should always be open. But a thing that is a perennial interest may fail entirely for lack of concentrated attention. At this season, the wiser churches gather their children into classes, and instruct them in the way of salvation. All who are prepared for it in mind and purpose accept church membership. This is accomplished without the aid of a high-priced evangelist and without the excitement which has so often alienated the more thoughtful in the community and misdirected the purposes of the children themselves. If educational evangelism among the children were properly cared for by all the churches, there would be little clamor for the professional evangelist. Roman Catholics are not getting up recurring excitement to hold their people. They educate loyalty into their young, and it lasts. Protestant loyalty can be built by the same process whenever evangelicals are wise enough to work by methods which have the approval of common sense and the centuries of Christian experience. Churches of modern spirit will want to teach religion in this spirit. They cannot use the old theological catechisms of the past. Just now there is particular need of a thoroughly pedagogical and informed manual to guide pastors in their evangelistic work with the children.

Shall the Churches Sponsor Dances?

THE question is not as absurd as it may sound in some communities. Of course some communities have always sponsored dances. The guilds and societies of Roman Catholic, Lutheran and Episcopal churches, all of them old communions, have often given room to the dance. Unitarian churches have often used the dance as a device for socializing the young people. The evangelical attitude has been quite different. During the war the Y. M. C. A. conducted dances in France, the only women on the floor being those in the association uniform. No soldier might take a woman to her home after the dance. The "Y" now faces a demand that dances be permitted in the association buildings. Experiments are being conducted in some associations. The magazine, Association Men, condemns the dance on the ground that when it is select enough to be safe, it is no longer democratic. This judgment will bear pondering. A Christian Endeavor dance is not an unknown thing now. The Methodist denomination faces every year an insistent demand that its rule against prohibited amusements be amended. Perhaps it will be some day. Many of the evangelical bodies have no rule, but their protest is as well defined and vigorous as that of the Methodists. It is one thing to tolerate church members who dance. That lies in the field of liberty of conscience. But it is another thing for the church to sponsor the dance. So long as the popular dances are those encouraging the most intimate bodily contacts, and are the occasion of grave anxiety to wise parents everywhere, our Protestant churches will probably continue to refuse to house the dance in their parish houses.

Why the Ministry Holds Men

IT is well to turn a proposition around once in awhile. We used to ask, Why do so few people go to church? Now we ask, Why do so many go to church? If anyone is inclined to inquire, Why does not every able-bodied man leave the ministry, the answer is another question, Why do thousands of young men still choose the service at the altar? The ministry is one of those professions which furnishes opportunity of community leadership.

Some ministers are not community figures because they are not big enough, but the man of honest scholarship and earnest life is sure to be heard. The newspaper considers his remarks upon a public question "news." The clubs and lodges open their doors to him. In time of emergency the community turns to the minister if the issue is a moral one. The ministry is one of those professions which has room in it for an intellectual life. There is little room for books in the life of the average business man. The successful physician can do little more than keep up with professional journals. But the minister is allowed to make a place for the companionship of great books and world-moving journals. The ministry also means friendships, the tenderest that any man forms. Through the years this wealth accumulates until the aged man of God goes down to his grave wept by thousands. He stands beside the souls of men at the greatest moments of their lives,—in sickness, at marriage, at the time of the dedication of little children and at the time when the soul finds the Saviour. People never forget the man who has given them new treasures of faith, of idealism, and of character. In so far as an age appreciates rewards like these, there are young men volunteering for the ministry. In this time of lucre, speed-mania, and materialism, the spiritual goods of life may be held somewhat cheaper by some. But in the long run the gospel ministry will not lose its appeal, unless indeed the church loses its religion.

Running the Liquor Blockade

THE first action of the irreconcilable minority following the coming of federal prohibition was a wave of interest in home brewing. This interest has to a considerable extent passed. Brewing is an art that requires months of careful study under laboratory conditions, and the home brews are either too vile to drink or they promote the undertakers' business to such an extent that home brewers become discouraged. Just now the interest lies in smuggling through from Canada. Bootleggers get from twelve to twenty dollars a quart for Canadian whiskey. With these large profits they figure they can afford to try to bribe officials. It is evident that they succeed sometimes. The liquor is transported around the country under many interesting disguises. One very enterprising bootlegger has in the past been a peddler of nitro-glycerine, and thinking that bootlegging was somewhat less hazardous as an occupation he took his nitro-glycerine truck and drove through the country with whiskey, safe from molestation for a season, since the ordinary official or private citizen is not apt to tarry long around nitro-glycerine. But, after all, it is evident that prohibition is pretty fairly effective. Whiskey at twenty dollars a quart, and an uncertain supply at that, is not a beverage to tempt the ordinary working man or the factory boy. One has to be a confirmed alcoholic to see twenty dollars worth of satisfaction in a quart of whiskey. Meanwhile the government, with that impartial efficiency which has made federal justice more respected than any other, is closing down the lid tighter every day. Running the blockade with liquor is an increasingly hazardous sport, hardly on a par with bass fishing. Besides, styles in recreation change from time to time. It will be only a few years until whiskey will be just one of the drugs down at the drug store, of interest only to physicians who are having medicines compounded, though our physicians tell us that they can get along very well without it.

Shall We Wait For the Next Strike?

THE history of the steel industry in America is the story of a series of conflicts, sometimes armed conflicts, as at Homestead in 1892 and sometimes unarmed conflicts, as in 1919. The steel industry is a basic industry, and in the periods when these struggles are being carried on thousands of men in various other industries must await the settlement of the dispute in the steel industry. The report of the Interchurch Commission has been challenged, but the main contentions stand. The steel industry does have a twelve hour day for part of its men, and a seven day week. It does have an arbitrary management which admits of no collective bargaining, either in the form of recognizing the unions or in the form of a democratic shop organization such as prevails in the shops of McCormick Harvester Works in Chicago. In view of this the industry goes on under strain while everybody talks about the next strike, knowing full well that the steel industry as now conducted invites periodic labor disturbances which rock the economic boat for the entire country. The Interchurch Commission proposes that the federal government shall set up an organization similar to that which has handled the troubles in the coal mining districts. This commission, recognizing that a twelve hour day and a seven day week are incompatible with good citizenship or competent parenthood, would seek to arrange conferences between employers and employees which might lead to the abolition of the conditions in the steel industry which have occasioned an industrial war in a fundamental industry running through a whole generation. The Interchurch Commission also urged the abolition of the company's detective system by which continual espionage is on the lookout for the expression of any opinion adverse to the management. Only by establishing justice in the steel industry by government action may we escape the fear of the "next strike" that now haunts the nation.

The Employers and the Y. W. C. A.

SINCE the Y. W. C. A. at its Cleveland meeting a year ago adopted the social ideals which are now commonplace in church circles, and which are also professed by the Y. M. C. A., the organization has been meeting embarrassment all over the country in its canvas for funds. In Los Angeles earlier in the year, certain business men opposed the organization when it sought public support. In this issue of The Christian

Century, Professor Taylor refers to the campaign for funds put on in Pittsburgh which resulted in the raising of only $90,000 for the welfare work of the Y. W.'s instead of the $200,000 which was asked for. In making examination of the causes of this failure, it was found, he says, that the Employers' Association of Pittsburgh, had sent out a letter to Pittsburgh employers. The social position of the Y. W. C. A. was recited, and then followed the following judgment: "The Y. W. C. A. has done and is doing a good work along some lines, and it is greatly to be regretted that they should have taken this excursion into a field about which they know practically nothing, and thus lend encouragement to what every man conversant with industrial problems knows to be destructive of the very basis of America's progress and civilization." As soon as the church begins proclaiming in any effective way its social ideals, it will meet similar discrimination. It has so far escaped persecution in much the same way that a young man did who went into the army. On enlisting, he expressed the fear that he would face ridicule on account of his religion. After three years in the army he was asked how he had gotten along. "Fine," he replied, "they never found it out on me." The churches have the shameful record of a set of ideals hidden away in documents. The Y. W. C. A. should not be left to bear this burden alone. Every instinct of chivalry and fairness demands that in every city where there is discrimination against them, the church should make their budget safe by unusual activity among the friends of justice and righteousness in industrial life.

Books in the Scheme of Redemption

MINISTERS of today who have been piloting the good old ship mother church through the stormy waters of the reconstruction period find that a good many of their passengers have taken to the sea in open boats of modern manufacture, and they are now carried about with every wind of doctrine. If the average layman was as well read in religion as he is in politics, history and economics, he would be more certain in his beliefs. The society woman who joins a sun cult or runs away with some other kind of oriental religion which at its heart despises women, is another example of what happens to religious illiterates. The only remedy for the uncertainty and vacillation of faith of the religious people of the day is a wider circulation of religious books. A pastor in New Jersey, realizing this, has established a self-service religious library at his church. On a book-table are twenty or more volumes. The borrower promises to write his name on the fly-page of the book, and return it to the church at an early date. As the names increase on the fly-leaf of the book, religious conversation becomes possible in that church. People who have read the same great book have a theme that makes religious fellowship more intelligent and genuine. The fifty dollars put into the book shelf by that church will bring returns for many years. It is quite as well justified as the hundreds of dollars that go into Sunday School papers for the juveniles of the church. The big objective of the minister, however, is to get good books into the homes. Let him observe March 13 as religious book Sunday. All over America one can find the works of Pastor Russell which have been hawked at back doors. These proved disappointing to the purchasers, and since then many have not bought religious books. Into the homes should go the most interesting and the most thoughtful of contemporaneous religious literature. While so much of this is directed at the layman's head, the tables may well be turned. If the layman suspects his minister of living in musty tomes, he can improve the preaching by presenting the minister with some up-to-date volumes. More than one man has had a theological rebirth through the reading of a single modern volume on religion.

The Bread Problem

IF we are to believe the cries that proceed now from all quarters, the problem of this world is hunger—actual, physical, death-bent hunger! There are some complications to the problem—but at root it is a simple demand for bread. We stand aghast at the figures which announce the state of wretchedness in China where ten thousand daily die of starvation. We read with horror of living conditions in Russia where even those long inured to such poverty as we Americans could not possibly understand, much less endure, cry out that they can go no further. We are appalled at cablegrams from the war-devastated countries of Europe where fully thirty million little children are barely kept alive through the generosity of strangers in foreign lands. And always a large block of India is in a state of slow starvation: the only reason we do not observe her plight, at this moment, is because these European dead, closer to us by common ties, and miles, and racial stock, emit a phosphorescent glow that obscures India's suffering. How to find bread to eat—this is the problem.

Little good can come of spending our time in an attempted analysis of this condition to determine its exact causes. Some of them are patent. It is beyond thought that the greater nations of the world could spend four years firing off high explosives, all of which contained the potentiality of food, and could take out of the normal walks of life millions of men habitually productive of such supplies, without inviting the disaster now so pitifully paraded before the eyes of all the world. This cause is obvious enough.

Neither need any mystery be made of the fact that organized greed has capitalized this emergency of war for all that the traffic would bear. Not one government on earth has had the facilities to deal with this menace, so strongly entrenched was it, and so skillfully operated. Our own nation, very much better situated to handle the problem than any of the others, has registered the most spectacular failure of them all. So rampant and inclusive has greed become, and so triumphant, that those who have been going through the motions of checking it feel ridiculous and ineffective when they lay hands upon any single individual and say, "You are guilty."

There have been other causes; but these two will suffice to explain the world's present predicament. The world is hungry! The problem of the moment is bread! This is an economic consideration. Everybody is thinking, talking, writing economics! We must produce more food; plough more deeply; sow more grain; develop a larger arable acreage through fertilization, irrigation, and other reclamation activities; increase the merchant marine, build more gondola-cars; and entice young men into the open country. Food! Bread! That is our need!

In this penitential period of 1921, we turn naturally to the story of our Lord's temptation which provides a reason and a setting for this Lenten season. And we find, to our surprise, that the ancient narrative is vital, vascular, directly apropos of our present anxiety. The temptation followed the baptism immediately. Rising from the water, bearing in his soul heaven's confirmation of his messiahship, Jesus went into the wilderness. Apparently he felt that he was not ready to face the crowd whom John had astonished with the announcement that the Messiah was among them, or any crowd, until he had struggled further through the problems vexing the world he had come to save. The first question thrust into the active consciousness of the young Galilean, after his voluntary exile into the wilderness, was essentially this: "What do men live by?" At the moment, he was able to answer the question promptly, decisively. So far as he was concerned, the greatest thing in the world was bread! Because he happened to be hungry, the world's problem seemed to be a clear case of economics! The cry of his people and the call of his own appetite united to tempt him to command the very stones at his feet to be transformed into bread! We need not debate whether this narrative is wholly, or in part, allegorical. Of course, we are fully conscious of our power to turn stones into bread—at least so long as the saltpeter beds of Chili continue to provide our wheat fields with the nourishment that makes them productive. If we are minded to let the Master have the power to do the same, by processes unknown to any but himself, there is no reason why he should be deterred from it by our lack of faith. If any one sees it simply as an allegory, the lesson still stands inviolate. Those who cannot help viewing it this way rightly resent the charge that they fail to catch the point of the story.

The point at issue was this: Is humanity's problem a question in economics? Jesus thought it through, and decided in the negative. Man does not live by bread alone. Man lives through his discovery and acceptance of the will of God.

From that scene in the Jeshimon Wilderness, Anno Domini, 30, let us return and take another glance at what we have before us in the early spring of 1921. Exactly how did our world get itself into its present miseries? We say that is an economic question. But is it? Well—say that the immediate cause of it was the war. Well—how did the world get itself head-over-ears in war? By walking in the ways of righteousness and brotherhood? By efforts at spiritual culture? By reliance upon his guidance who continually endeavors to attract our attention to the truth about human relationships? No; we got into war—the whole brood of nations—excusing nobody, laying the blame at every door impartially—through indifference to the cultivation of those principles which Jesus said would make for permanent peace!

Even now—with so ghastly and complete a demonstration of the fact that war solves no problems whatsoever; that war not only wastes while it is waged, but leaves a slimy trail behind it through uncounted years—there are plenty of us advocating more costly armies, more big gunboats, more deadly poison gas! In all the welter and wreckage—face to face with the problem of the world's starvation—still—still—“armi virumque cano!”

Fully satisfied that organized greed and diabolical selfishness has not only foisted war upon the world, time after time, but has stood by to loot the pockets of its victims while they went forth hypnotized to death by appeals to their patriotism, still do we sit, complacently, declaring that the world's chief difficulty is “a problem in economics.” Economics?—Nonsense! The world's problem, today, is a spiritual problem! Humanity's soul must be saved!

What may we do about it? There is much that we can do. We can turn the searchlight in upon ourselves to see how far we, as individuals, are menaced by this temptation to believe that our own problems are questions in economics! Do I live by bread alone? What inspired me to my choice of a life work—bread alone? What holds me to my daily task—bread alone? For what reason have I gathered friends about me—that they may use me, or I them? Have I cultivated them for bread alone? What is the main ideal and motive of my life—bread alone? Is success, to my thinking, the sort of thing that has cornered some market; stacked up corn in warehouses against years of idleness; nailed down natural resources to make them inaccessible to other hands as fully entitled to them as myself?

We do well who, through these Lenten days, assay the cre of our own characters, and assist other people to test the quality of their motives; to see if, perchance, we who have talked so volubly and knowingly of humanity's great needs—the causes of its distress—the reasons of its hunger—may not be housing and arming the forces which make these problems more and more acute and perplexing.

The Master found the complex problem of the world a simple spiritual problem at its root. Taking counsel of the God in his own heart, he found that man does not live by bread alone, but by the discernment and acceptance of his will who “standeth behind our lattice, keeping watch over his own.”

A Field for the Singing Evangelist

MOST of us have a clear memory of the singing evangelist over whom the churches were once enthusiastic. He was an ardent individual, who shook his baton expectantly while imploring us to brighten our particular corner, or to assert musically that the old-fashioned religion was as good as we cared to live up to. We remember his solos, too. There was “My Mother's Photograph,” and “Father's Old Arm-chair.” There were earnest inquiries as to whether we wanted to “go there,” and emphatic assurances that the singer not only wanted to but that he meant to and expected to. There were some solos in particular which were considered wonderful as crowd-attractions, particularly those modern and fetching ones which likened life to a railroad. In one the admonition was:

“Keep your hand upon the throttle,
And your eye upon the rail.”

Another ended in a splendid burst:

“Jesus is your Conductor
Leading through Beulah Land;
Soon he will guide you safely
Into the Deep-oh Grand!”

Usually the singing evangelist was a fine fellow, and in love with his work. Often he liked better music than he sang. He had merely fallen a victim to the popular idea that people would come together in the church to sing only when they were given something perfectly new and in many instances utterly foolish.

Is the singing evangelist needed today? Yes, as never before. That is to say, his supreme gift is needed, the gift which may perhaps be said to have justified his work in the past in spite of its many crudities—the gift for inducing all the people to sing.

In our studies of community life and especially of the community church, nothing is demonstrated more plainly than that one of the surest means of unifying the different elements in any country or village neighborhood is song practice. When people begin to forget their self-consciousness through joining their voices in song, the sense of social aloofness begins to disappear.

The church will miss much if it does not take advantage of this opportunity. It has a place of meeting which is suited to a community musical program and it already uses, in its regular services, the music which is most universally known. What is needed is the leader who can get the people to sing themselves into forgetfulness of themselves and at the same time can awaken in them a real spirit of worship.

Do the people really care for the good old music? Do they not? For example, the other night a director who has studied the subject of community singing widely, both in this country and abroad, was leading a great audience in a village church, apparently with every person singing and the selections were: "Adeste Fideles," "St. Christopher," and the "Italian Hymn." Certainly no congregation ever sang "The Old Fashioned Religion" with more fervor. The special music was from "Elijah" and was sung by a women's choir; and the people really seemed to like it better than "The Mountain Railroad." (The railroad, by the way, is out of date, and the evangelistic singer, if he were keeping up with the times, would be obliged to change the illustration to a flivver or a plane, whereas the juniper tree—there will always be a juniper tree!—which is one but not the only reason why "Elijah" is preferable.) Community singing does not depend upon novelty but upon quality, and if there shall arise an evangelistic singer who will add a recognition of this fact to his genius for inducing participation he may make the church of our day immeasurably his debtor.

The Musical Education

A Parable of Safed the Sage

ONCE upon a time there was a man who had a daughter. And he loved Musick. And as the damsel grew, she sang; and the singing gladdened his heart and the heart of her mother. And they bought her a Piano and hired a Teacher, who came to the house and gave her lessons at Fifty Cents an Hour. And the lesson was worth every cent of it. For the damsel soon could play Scales and Exercises, and between times would pick out Tunes with one finger, to the great joy of her father.

And when the time came that she could take the Hymn Book and sit down on Sunday afternoon, and play The Sweet Bye and Bye without very many Mistakes, her father wiped his eyes and thanked God for his daughter and for her Musickal Attainments. And there were evenings when the young folk gathered, and she seated herself at the Piano and played the Suwanee River and Seeing Nellie Home, and they all sang and were glad.

Now there came an evil day when one spake unto the father, saying, Thy daughter hath Musickal Ability. Now therefore, send her away that she may study Musick.

So they sent her away to a Conservatory; and they shut down the cover of the Piano. And on Sunday afternoon her father said, It is lonely, but when she returneth she will play to Beat the Band.

And it came to pass that at the end of certain days she returned with a Musickal Education. And I was among Those Present on the evening when they gave a Welcome Home Party. And the father said, Tonight we shall have Musick.

But on that night none of the other girls dared play, for they had not been away to a Conservatory. And the daughter would not play, for her Sheet Musick had not arrived. Neither would she sing, for she said that she was Out of Practice, having recently studied only Theory and Composition and Fugue and Counterpoint.

And I said unto her, It is not an Excess of Musical Culture that aileth thee, but the need of Chastisement. In the days when thou couldest barely play The Sweet Bye and Bye so that it might be told from Yankee Doodle thy Musickal Talent was good for something. Thou wert a joy unto thy father and a comfort to thy mother; and thou couldest add happiness to the life of thy friends. But now thou knowest just enough to be Useless.

And I asked, Knowest thou any of the sweet old Ballads, as The Last Rose of Summer, or Coming Through the Rye?

And she said, Yea; but they are very Old and Simple.

And I said, Go thou to the piano, and play and sing. Thou hast given this party a Frost, and chilled the heart of all present. Go thou back and warm them up with something that they love.

And she did as I told her. And the heart of all present was warmed. And certain of the other girls played.

And as the hour waxed late, some of the young folk said, Let us sing some of Those Good Old Timers that we used to like. And she played for them.

So her Musickal Education did not quite spoil her after all. And when she hath a Musickal Education that is much better, she will know better the worth of my lesson to her.

The Dreamer

HE knew the curse of poverty,
But, lighted by his dream,
He could not see the clouds of night
That covered him. The gleam
Of high ambition led him on Through cruel years of fate
Until he entered, heaven-led,
The pathway of the great.

He found, amid the sloughs of youth,
A path of blessedness,
And, as he walked the stony road
Of eminent success,
He kept his lofty dream of truth,
Nor left her righteous way
Until the crown of martyrdom
Brought sunset to his day.

O tender ruler of our hearts,
Bequeath to us the grace
That shone from heaven's inmost shrine
Upon thy saintly face.
On selfishness and greed and pride
We rear our mighty State:
Inspire in us again the Dream
That made thy leading great.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

For the Church Door

THIS is God's House.
The Master's spirit broods about.
Keep silence as ye enter here;
Wait till his blessing ye have caught
Then burst these doors with cheer!

WILLIAM WORTHINGTON.

Is Our Civilization Christian?

By Charles A. Ellwood

IN the autumn of 1913 the writer spoke before a large church in one of our great cities pointing out the trend in recent years toward a recrudescence of pagan ideals and practices in our civilization. To his surprise he found, the next morning, not only that he was denounced in the city's newspapers as a "pessimist," but also that all, except two, of the Christian ministers of the city who had been interviewed on the subject disagreed with him and apparently thought that he was attacking the church. Within a twelvemonth, however, the Great War had broken out, and the atrocities of the German army in a score of Belgian cities had given startling evidence to the world of the existence of pagan elements in our civilization.

PATTERNS OF CIVILIZATION

Every civilization is a complex of innumerable "patterns," as anthropologists and sociologists call them, or of "ideals," as plain people say. These patterns go back in many cases to immemorial antiquity and are very seldom in complex civilizations entirely harmonious. The patterns or ideals of Western civilization, while derived from many sources, have come to us mainly from three ancient cultures—that of the Hebrews, that of the Greco-Romans, and that of the ancient Teutonic tribes. The Christian pattern or ideal was, of course, a development from Hebraic culture. On the other hand the patterns furnished us by the Greeks, the Romans, and the old Teutons were distinctly of a different stripe. The Greeks, with their childlike joy in life, their love of pleasure and amusement, their sensuous æstheticism, gave Western civilization a set of patterns distinctly antagonistic to the ideals of the great Hebrew thinkers. The Romans, with their frank acceptance of power as the only end of the State, with their brutal predatory militarism and with their subjugation and exploitation of weaker peoples, gave the modern world again another set of patterns distinctly at variance with the ideals of a social life based upon love, as demanded by Jesus. The ancient Teutonic tribesmen, with their joy in battle and in the exercise of ruthless might, furnished again another set of patterns opposed to the Christian ideal. We cannot deny these facts and we should not ignore them, because civilization is a product of tradition; and these facts are living, vital forces still in our world. Modern civilization has thus far been an inharmonious synthesis, or rather a continuous conflict, of the antagonistic ideals of social and moral life of the three ancient cultures from which our civilization is derived.

How shall we explain the existence of pagan ideals and practices in our civilization? Sociologically, only in one way. They are "survivals" of the ancient cultures from which we have derived our civilization. It is true that the best thinkers of Greece and Rome approached to Christian ideals, even though they did not quite reach them. But the continued influence of Greece and Rome upon our civilization has not been altogether that of their "best thinkers." Rather it has been more the influence of the "mass impact" of their civilization upon ours. And from the standpoint of social evolution there can be but one judgment regarding the main features of Greco-Roman civilization, even though it had many excellent traits; and that is, that it was but a step removed from barbarism in its moral characteristics.

PAGANISM AND BARBARISM

All barbarous peoples possess as a dominant characteristic of their culture crude ideals of power and pleasure as the proper ends for action of both individuals and groups. Indeed, other ends of action scarcely occur to them; and, as these are the ends set before both individuals and groups, such peoples are possessed by illusions of advantage to themselves in the domination, spoliation, and exploitation of others. "Paganism" is therefore the moral and religious equivalent of "barbarism" as a cultural term. Sociologically, Christianity is an attempt to get rid of the patterns of conduct established in barbarism, and to replace these by universalized humanitarian standards. Evidently, however, it was the patterns of "paganism" which underlay, in the main, the culture of Greece and Rome. Evidently, also, these same patterns still persist in our civilization. This is not an accident. We must strip the halo from Greco-Roman civilization before we can have a Christian world!

Modern civilization is troubled by the recrudescence of pagan ideals only because it has not definitely accepted the Christian ideal of life. Power and pleasure still remain its chief ideals. Even when they are not held up as ends for individuals, they are held up as ends for groups. We must not, of course, blame the civilization of Greece and Rome, or the cruder culture of our ancient Teutonic forefathers, too much for this. While the world has never succeeded in ridding himself of the traditions of barbarism, the conditions of our own time are perhaps even more responsible for the recrudescence of paganism among us than the traditions of the past. Many conditions in the modern world have released and powerfully stimulated the original selfish and animal impulses of human nature.

CIVILIZATION AND ACHIEVEMENT

Man is not by nature a civilized being, to say nothing of a Christian. He attains civilization and Christian living only by slow and painful discipline, only by the careful building up of the habits, standards, and values of civilized Christian living. But when the old supports of these habits, standards, and values drop away, men may easily revert to the barbarous, and even to the savage, level. Now, external authority in both Church and State has been on the wane in Western civilization for the past three centuries. At the same time through new inventions and discoveries and the opening up of unexploited regions of the earth, wealth has increased to an extent beyond the dreams of previous ages. Even though this increase of wealth did not occur in all classes, the increase has affected the standards of living and conduct in all. A greater number of individuals have found it possible to devote themselves to selfish ends, to the getting of money, of power, or of pleasure than ever before, and they have set patterns for the imitation of individuals in all classes.

Thus by the decay of external authority and the increase of wealth human nature suddenly emerged in the nineteenth century from its swaddling bands, as it were. The flood gates of human selfishness were opened wider than they had ever before been opened to the mass of men. A gospel of individual and national self-interest was preached everywhere. Material standards of life came to dominate among the masses. All these things made a swing back toward paganism inevitable.

In the later years of the nineteenth century literature began to take on a pagan cast, such as it had not had even in the Renaissance. In commerce, in business, in polite society, and in amusements pagan standards came more and more to the front, that is, the standards of power and pleasure. A large element in the privileged classes refused to recognize or to conform to any standard at all save their own pleasure and their own wishes. They belittled, by contemptuous indifference, if they did not ridicule outright, Christian standards in living and in conduct. Scandalous divorces and marriages became common to an extent that the world has not seen since the decadent days of Rome. The wealthy set examples of extravagance, luxury, and fast living which inevitably demoralized the rest of society.

STRAWS UPON THE SURFACE

But these were only straws upon the surface of society. The program of self-interest, material satisfaction, and brute force came to extend through and through the fabric of Western civilization. It was not simply the moral standards of individuals which were re-barbarized, but, as we now know, the life of whole nations. It was in the realm of politics and international relations, a realm which had never been greatly influenced by Christian standards, that the recrudescence of paganism was chiefly to express itself. It made the coming of the Great War inevitable.

Men may strive to ignore it as they may, the real causes of the Great War were in the pagan "mores," or standards, of our Western civilization. In concrete terms, the causes of the Great War were pagan mores in political life, in business life, and in social relations in general. Anti-Christian politics, anti-Christian business, and anti-Christian ideals of life, not pressure of population upon material resources, not geographical conditions, not biological necessities connected with race, were the real causes of the great conflict. These causes were everywhere in Western civilization, but they particularly came to a head in Germany. Germany, however, can be blamed for the Great War only to the extent that Germany led in repaganizing the world. The dominance in Germany of the militaristic tradition, the rise there of imperialistic commercialism, and the undermining of Christian ideals of life among the German people by these two causes, and also by the rise of a destructive criticism of religion and of ethics and of a materialistic science, fitted Germany to bring to a focus all of the anti-Christian forces in modern civilization. She thus became the "scourge of God" to show the nations the evil of their ways.

GERMANY NOT ALONE

For, of course, these pagan tendencies were not confined to Germany. At the very time the odious pagan political philosophy of Germany was taking shape, Great Britain and Russia were permitting no ethical scruples to stand in the way of their imperialistic ambitions. European nations in general, whatever their attitude toward Christianity as a private faith, deliberately accepted the thesis of its social impracticability. The statesmen responsible for the diplomacy of the various countries took it for granted that self-interest must be the supreme law of nations, and public sentiment sustained them in this attitude.

Back of this anti-Christian politics stood anti-Christian business. In an era of the world-wide expansion of industry and of the economic exploitation of the earth, it was easy for the economic doctrine to grow up and receive general acceptance that business was for profits only. An imperialistic, capitalistic industry set before itself, as its one end, the domination of the world's markets for the sake of profits. This imperialistic capitalism found a ready tool in Machiavellian politics, and in the growth of a hypernationalistic spirit. The whole commercial and industrial world became organized on essentially pagan lines. Profits, dividends, economic success were aimed at no matter what the expense to humanity. Self-interest was held to be the only possible basis for business enterprise, and the self-interest was usually interpreted to mean merely the interests of the business men as an individual. The obligations of business even to the community were overlooked, to say nothing of its wider responsibilities to humanity at large.

GOSPEL OF SELF-INTEREST

The gospel of self-interest came to dominate practically every phase of life. Self-interest and class-interest became in the nineteenth century the maxims of the laboring class also. The ideal of public service in laboring class movements was subordinated or forgotten. As the gospel of self-interest dominated the relations of employer and employee, the interests of the two were held to be diametrically opposed. Consequently there grew up a doctrine of class war, with at least an implied correlated doctrine of class hate. Christianity, rationality and altruism began to be scouted and even scorned as possible means for the solution of economic problems. The only solution of the problem of the relations between economic classes, Marxian socialism held, was the forcible overthrow of the capitalist class by the working class.

In other words Marxian socialism openly advocated the settlement of economic grievances between classes by resort to force. By the end of the nineteenth century, accordingly, Western civilization was confronted by a well-organized movement among the laboring classes which was openly anti-religious, materialistic, and consciously aimed at class domination. But it is well to remember that this adoption of the predatory standards of paganism by a part of the laboring classes in Western civilization was largely, if not entirely, a reflex of the practices of the socially more fortunate classes. In other words, anti-Christian business was largely responsible for the anti-Christian phases of working class movements.

MARXIAN SOCIALISM

Deeper than anti-Christian politics or anti-Christian business were anti-Christian ideals of life in Western civilization in general. Civilization is made up of traditions and traditions are made up of thoughts. The thinking class in any cultural group, therefore, are ultimately responsible for the guidance of its civilization. That the mores of our civilization are still largely pagan is abundantly evidenced by our literature, our art, our philosophy, our science, and even our religion. We can but glance at a few of these.

If we turn to literature first, we find that a large part of the literature of the later nineteenth and early twentieth century was totally regardless of Christianity, that it derided or ignored Christian ideals. We are not, of course, speaking of Christianity as a theology, but of Christianity as a system of ethics and social life. Christian ideals in the family, in business, in politics, and in general social relations were regarded as worthless or impracticable. The representatives of these tendencies were not a few minor literary men with no standing, but included the foremost names in the literature of the day. Moreover the writers who exploited these tendencies were usually the most popular ones, especially among the educated classes. These classes revelled in writers whose works, as one of their ardent advocates says, it was irrelevant to criticize as immoral, because they did not intend to be anything else.

INDIVIDUAL STANDARDS

While the best of nineteenth century philosophical thinkers sought strenuously to transcend pagan ideals and put philosophy upon a truly social and humanitarian basis, yet the more popular philosophy of the nineteenth century remained enamored of pleasure and power as the chief values of life. It sought for a standard of right in these abstractions, and ignored the social life of man. It contended that the standard of right lay wholly within the individual, in his own happiness or self-development, and not in the interdependent life of all men. It is evident that this popular philosophy of the nineteenth century was more pagan than Christian, and it made it impossible to discredit the predatory ethics of barbarism.

Even the Christian church itself became subtly affected by the pagan tendencies of the times. We do not refer to the growth of "worldliness" in the church (though "worldliness" is usually only a euphemism for paganism), nor to the growth of merely negative criticism, but rather to the whole spirit developed by nineteenth century

Protestant Christianity. As one of the most enlightened religious thinkers of the present has said: "There grew up a conception of Christianity . . . in principle largely self-centered and individualistic. The energies of Christians found sufficient outlet in the preparation of the individual for the life after death, and the winning of new candidates for the citizenship of the future kingdom. Not transformation of this world, but escape from it became the Christian message; not social leadership, but protest the function of the church."

CHRISTIAN MYSTICISM

Alongside of this comparatively common unsocialized type of Christianity existed less common but even more unsocialized and pagan types, such, for example, as so-called Christian mysticism. Mysticism belongs to paganism, rather than to Christianity; yet it was rampant in pretty nearly all branches of the Christian church during the nineteenth century.

The statements thus far made seem to the writer indisputable facts. They are not made, however, as a basis for any pessimistic conclusions. They are offered simply as evidence of what all intelligent observers of our civilization know without elaborate proofs; namely, that it is as much pagan as Christian. But our civilization has now come to a point where it can no longer remain half pagan and half Christian. Science has put in the hands of man such tremendous weapons of destruction that civilization can no longer tolerate pagan standards in business, in politics, in education, in art, literature, science and philosophy without running the risk of encompassing its own destruction. The half and half standards of our civilization will no longer work in the complex and tremendously dynamic social life of the present. Good will is needed in the world as never before. We dare not leave self-interest and class-interest longer to guide us.

THE CHRISTIAN IDEAL

The remedy is simple. We must get rid of the mores of barbarism, or paganism, which still survive among us. We must get rid of the power and pleasure standards of life in business, in politics, and in our social life generally. We must put in their stead the Christian ideal that the only possible service of God is the service of humanity. It is just as possible to bring our children up in the ideals of humanitarian service as it is to bring them up in the standards of self-interest. The thing which is needed to begin with is a revival of vital faith in ideals of Christian living within the Christian church itself. While it is perhaps not true that as much paganism exists within the church as outside of it, yet it is a truism that in our day it is often difficult to distinguish the church from the world.

The world, to be sure, through the so-called Christian centuries has been slowly approaching the Christian ideal. In the nineteenth century we find the dawn of a better civilization breaking everywhere, in spite of all the pagan tendencies which we have described. Indeed, it was only in the last few decades previous to the beginning of the great war that there was marked retrogression in certain circles and classes toward pagan and barbarous ideals of life. This rekindling of paganism found the world poorly organized to resist its spread. Everywhere practically the forces of good were disorganized. Good men emphasized their differences, and instead of pulling together, pulled apart. This was especially true of the Christian church. Surely by this time the church should have learned its lesson! A disorganized and divided church made possible the war. But now even greater tasks confront the church than if there had been no war, for temporarily at least, the war has rebarbarized and repaganized the whole world.

Let the church, while it is advocating a League of Nations, see to it that it is united within itself! Let it envisage its true task, that of the redemption of the world, and then center its undivided energies upon it! Let it find unity in essentials and leave liberty in non-essentials. Let it lay aside, therefore, theological disputation and devote itself to the practical application of Christian ideals to every day living. Let the recognized basis of religious fellowship, accordingly, become full consecration to the service and redemption of mankind. Then the church will get rid of the paganism within itself! Then, too, the church will be able to win the moral opinion of mankind, and to create a public conscience which will sweep away the violence and fraud which characterizes present civilization, and to create a true, that is, a Christian civilization.

A Messianic Portrait of Jesus

A Lenten Appreciation

By James Austin Richards

THE greatest and most prophetic fact in the world today is the reappearance of the historical Jesus before the imagination, thought and conscience of the race. Out from behind the church that has often hidden him whom it was meant to reveal, out from behind the creeds that have often obscured him whom they were meant to explain, the actual historical Jesus who was born at Bethlehem and reared at Nazareth, who labored at Capernaum and was slain at Jerusalem, has, as by a second resurrection, appeared again before the astonished gaze of mankind. This phenomenon is in part the result of the new historical spirit which is reconstructing the entire past. It is in part due to the unrequited labors of our New Testament scholars, now all in hell or hasting thither! It is part due to our weariness with the pretensions of ecclesiasticism and of dogmatism. The actual historical Jesus is more clearly seen now than he has been at any time since the first half of the second century.

The results of this vision are manifold and fascinating. In great areas the Christian life has been redefined. It is not a bargain for the escape of future punishment. It is not purely intellectual, or even primarily so. It is not getting aboard an ark of salvation, certified as the one boat fit to ride out the coming gale. Christian and churchman are not synonyms. The Christian life is again conceived to be what it was when Jesus was here among men. It is following Jesus. It is toiling for his purposes. It is thinking out all the problems of life, great and small, eternal and transient, at his feet and in clear recognition of all he said and did and was. It is sharing his faith, trusting him enough to trust as he trusted.

JESUS AND HIS BACKGROUND

Can we see the events of this swift and tragic career as a unit, bringing one consistent meaning to the world? Can we in all reverence draw a consistent spiritual portrait of Jesus? I want particularly to study him from one definite point of view. The direction of my approach to his essential personality is determined by his background.

I see Jesus against a background of messianic ideas. With the origin and the history of the messianic ideas of Jesus' time we need not necessarily have much to do. It is not with their origin and history, but with them as they actually existed in Jesus' time, and chiefly, I suggest, with two diverse elements within them, that we have most to do. Their antiquity, however, must be invoked to explain their complexity. When we recall how old they were, how long and stormy had been their history, we cannot be surprised that in Jesus' time some men expected the messianic era to come gradually and others expected it to come catastrophically. Some expected the messianic reign to be the direct rule of God, others that it would be the rule of a nation, others that it would be the government of one in human form. Some expected the messianic method to be that of force—Jesus taking precedence over Rome and the Messiah out-Cæsaring Cæsar—while others expected the method to be that of service, suffering and sacrifice. Of principal importance for our present purposes are the facts that many, if not most, expected the Messiah to appear in human form and that almost everybody expected his methods to parallel those of

THE BAPTISM

Against this background Jesus appeared, born, we believe, in Bethlehem, reared, we have no doubt, in Nazareth. It was at Nazareth that he "advanced in wisdom and in favor with God and man." Though the wisest of beings and the best of teachers, he was not an intellectual freak. He "advanced in wisdom." His books were nature, humanity and the Old Testament. His schools were the village synagogue, the home and his own conscience. As an intellectual Hebrew lad, he of course learned early of the messianic system of ideas prevailing in his day, and something of that system's inconsistencies.

JESUS AND JOHN

Then one day it was noised abroad that John was baptizing at the Jordan. He brought a symbol of penitence and forgiveness. Jesus felt neither any place for penitence nor any need for forgiveness, but he did desire to identify himself with the best movement of his time. So he, who was ever identifying himself with men, came in consecration to the baptism of John. Then it was that he also came to one of the crucial hours of his life. Mark describes it as inward and private. In that case, Jesus was the reporter of his own experience. He felt there at the baptism the down-rush of the Spirit of God, yet gently, as a dove alights. He felt there there he had no longer to ponder and await the coming of the Messiah. "Thou art my beloved Son." He who had been advancing in wisdom now came to the full knowledge of the meaning of his life. You can liken that hour to the hour of Isaiah in the temple when he saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up, or to the hour on the Damascus road when Saul of Tarsus saw a great light and became Paul of the Roman Empire, or to that hour in the garden at Domremy when Joan of Arc heard the voices that made her the heroine of France. You may liken this hour to any of the others, and yet it is more than them all. For they gave us but Isaiah, and Paul and Joan. This hour gave us Jesus Christ. In his own thought, Jesus is now more than Jesus. He is Messiah. In this young man there now lives the amazing conviction that he is the One for whom ages have waited, One destined for a unique part in the world's redemption.

But for Jesus to hold this idea was for him to face a dilemma. What was to be the method of his messiahship? There was no doubt what method the people expected, what would be popular! They were all for armies, for political revolutions, for earthly thrones. But that was not the only possible method. Jesus' mind was full of echoes from the nobler paragraphs of the prophets suggesting the place of service, suffering and sacrifice in the divine working. Moreover, in those thirty years upon which he could look back with no reproach of conscience, years in which he knew God had been well pleased, he had spent much time—shall we say all his time?—in communion with God, and in that fellowship some things had been written in his heart. Here, then, was the necessity for reflection. What method should he use? Yes, here was the certainty of moral struggle. The popular expectation had its appeal, both because it was popular—who does not like to go with the crowd?—and because of its content. To command seems pleasanter than to serve, to rule more desirable than to suffer, to sacrifice better than to be sacrificed. Therefore, from the scene of his baptism Jesus goes yet further into the wilderness.

THE TEMPTATION

There is no place where the messianic background leaps into the foreground more insistently than here. To be the Messiah of the popular expectation was to be princely, spectacular, to vault into world dominion. That is exactly what the temptation of Jesus was. Indeed, two out of three of the temptations are prefaced with the words, "If Thou art the Son of God." It is with the interpretation of the messiahship that Jesus is struggling. "If thou art the Son of God," make these stones into bread. Surely a prince ought neither to hunger nor to labor. "If thou art the Son of God," amaze the people by a leap from the pinnacle of the temple. Surely the Messiah ought to be spectacular. From the spirit of the occasion we may supply the same words for the third temptation. "If thou art the Son of God," take immediate imperial rule without being too careful of the means. Vault into authority. But steadily, step by step, Jesus chose God's way instead of man's. He would eat bread on the same hard terms as his fellows. He would wait until the spiritual perceptions of man grew up to an appreciation of him, although his heart break in the meantime. He would make no compromise with Satan, even to win a world.

We who are so little trained in the messianic ideas and who so little appreciate the imperial consciousness of Jesus, have all too dim an imagination of the struggle that Jesus fought out in the wilderness. But we might at least grasp its critical nature and see its connection with the messianic circle of ideas. Had he yielded—(and he might have yielded, let us insist on that. This is no stage nonsense; it is a real struggle)—had he yielded, we might have known him as one like unto Judas Maccabeus. We should never have known him as the spiritual leader of the world.

THE CONFESSION

Two great steps have now been taken. Jesus is aware that he is the Messiah. Jesus has determined the method of his messiahship and is sure the method he is taking is God's own way. But the first of these steps was, according to the oldest authority, private to Jesus. It is certainly best understood by us. The second step is by all the accounts an experience in solitude. Jesus can have no significance to the world until others know what he knows.

I fall back here again upon the chronology of Mark. I find in Mark no clear assumption of the messiahship before the visit to the parts of Cæsarea-Philippi. To be sure, in the second chapter he is twice called Son of Man. The second instance has to do with the lordship of the Sabbath, and is probably an editorial note. The first instance has to do with the forgiveness of sins and, in view of a silence running into the eighth chapter of a book only sixteen chapters long, may surely be considered as out of order. Moreover, every time in the first, third and fifth chapters where the demons get too talkative about Jesus and approach to messianic language, Jesus either orders silence or abruptly changes the subject. In other words, Jesus carries his unique self-consciousness and its interpretation as secrets in his heart. Then came the journey to Cæsarea-Philippi. Again, as at the baptism, it is a crucial hour, only here more and different persons are involved. It is a dramatic hour, too. I wonder that the painters have not revelled in it. He asks his disciples what men have been saying about him. Either because of their tact, or because such things seem to them absurd, they do not remind him that he has been called a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, nor of the taunt of his being a friend of publicans and sinners, nor that he has been called a blasphemer and a libertine, nor that Beelzebub has been quoted as his source of power over the demons. Instead, they tell him the great things that have been said about him, that he is John the Baptist, or Elijah, or Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. We can think of Jesus listening to see if anyone has hinted at the full truth. No one has.

"WHOM SAY YE THAT I AM?"

But perhaps his friends have done better. "But ye, whom say ye that I am?" To get the tenseness of that moment, remember that Jesus has not told them who he is, and they have not heard any other one name him correctly. We can almost see him leaning forward and peering into one face after another waiting for the proper answer. That word which no rational person has as yet spoken of him, shall he hear it now? That secret that has long been pounding in his heart, shall someone share it now? "But ye, whom say ye that I am?" Then a very wonderful thing happened—a thing so wonderful that Jesus said it was not the doing of flesh and blood, but that here, as at his baptism, the Father above was whispering to his children. On the mind and in the heart of one of them the great truth dawned, and from the lips of Simon came the words, "Thou art the Christ."

We of today are standing so very far away from that scene at Cæsarea-Philippi that we can hardly begin to grasp its dramatic significance. But we can at least propound to ourselves great questions for reverent reflection. How much must it have meant to Jesus? How much joy must at that moment have come into his lonely, ardent heart? How much must it have meant to the spokesman and to the world? Two words are symbolic here. Here in Mark for the first time except in the catalogue of the twelve, Simon is called Peter, and never again is he called Simon except when he failed his Lord in the garden. Here for the first time in the New Testament the word "church" appears. When Jesus is seen as the Messiah, then it is time to build. Jesus was baptized at the Jordan. Christianity was baptized in the parts of Cæsarea-Philippi.

THE TRANSFIGURATION

But as the baptism of Jesus brought the necessity of the temptation, so the baptism of Christianity made necessary a struggle within the disciples like the earlier struggle within Jesus. They, too, must reckon with the two inconsistent elements in the messianic ideas of that time. Jesus sees this. His experience is a prophecy of theirs. At once he begins to tell them of the great sufferings he must undertake, sufferings even unto death. How acute was the struggle this precipitated is shown in the promptness with which Simon, who has just won the name of Peter, earns also the name of Satan.

The temptation of Jesus continued with him throughout his ministry and even into the Garden of Gethsemane. The corresponding struggle of his disciples was also long-continuing, but in the experience called the Transfiguration, it touches a point of triumph. I am utterly impatient with those who tarry over the physics and the chemistry of this high scene. There is here something much better than that. There is a disclosing of a necessary step in the development of Christianity. Men who believed that Jesus was the Messiah, but who were far from accepting his interpretation of the messiahship, went with him up a mountain. There he was transfigured before them. There they saw him glorious. There they perceived a Christ about to die as being surpassingly great. There they saw such a Christ no longer as an isolated puzzle. They saw him in the company of Elijah and Moses. They saw him in the sweep of history. They saw him fulfilling both prophecy and law. Yes, and as we read of the heavens opened at the baptism, of the ministering angels in the temptation, of a revelation from the Father above at Cæsarea-Philippi, so here also we learn of divine help. The "cloud" which is but a Hebrew way of naming God, overshadows the mountain. They have there a special realization of the presence of God. Out of this cloud—out of this Presence—they are taught to think of Jesus as greater even than Moses and Elijah. "This is my beloved Son." A serving, suffering, sacrificing Christ—not now a princely, spectacular, domineering Christ—but a serving, suffering, sacrificing Christ, is now seen as glorious, as standing nearer to God than any one in the past experience of the race. To be sure, the disciples did not hold steadily to this vision. But they had seen it, and that meant quite enough to give point to the remark that the transfiguration on the mount was not so much the transfiguration of Jesus as it was the transfiguration of his disciples.

THE CRUCIFIXION

The messianic approach to the interpretation of Jesus has been useful thus far. But we note at the same time that, as we use it, we discard it. We are moving from the messianic toward the universal, from politics toward morals, from theocracy toward fatherhood. It remains to speak of the crucifixion and of the resurrection.

The crucifixion narratives are permeated by messianic ideas. We need those ideas to understand the triumphal entry, to understand Gethsemane and the trial, to understand Judas and Pilate. But our present concern is that we need them to understand Jesus. He believed in something mightier than kings and governments had yet learned to use. He believed in a better kind of messiahship than his times were able to comprehend. He believed that to die in love is actually mightier than to slay in hatred. Therefore, when his sky darkened with storm, he remained quite unafraid. Indeed, he felt an impulse toward the storm rather than away from it. He steadfastly set his face to go up to Jerusalem. His friends feared that he was traveling toward his death, and he spoke only to confirm their fears. But even they could not fail to see that he walked as toward a throne.

A DEMONSTRATION OF FAITH

I do not like to call Calvary a test. This is the language of unbelief. It was not that of Jesus. For Jesus it was a demonstration, a demonstration of the faith that Jesus in some sense brought to his baptism and heroically affirmed in his temptation and which his disciples had at times seen clearly. It was a demonstration of the faith that that service and suffering and sacrifice are more God-like than anything else, that God is on their side more than he is on the side of anything else, and that to die in love is actually mightier than even to slay in hatred. These two ideas, both of them in the circle of messianic thought, come into clash when the respectable people of Jerusalem—the men whom you and I would have liked to call upon had we been tourists in the city—cried, "We have nothing but Cæsar!" and hung Jesus on the tree.

It was a demonstration for Jesus, a completion of his revelation of God, an unloosening of God's power on the world as it had never been unloosed before, a finishing of the work that God had given him to do. But to the followers of Jesus it was a test, and a test before which for the moment they utterly failed. We are all familiar, but can never be too familiar, with the plight for the disciples when Jesus was laid in the tomb. All that we know of them then is a picture of unrelieved gloom. They "had hoped" that it was he that would redeem Israel. They knew nothing better than to embalm him and then return to their fishing, to be twitted for the rest of their lives as the erstwhile followers of a now crucified hope.

THE RESURRECTION

But by and by they bring hope out of the past tense and into the present, and affirm it as they had never done before. They know other interests than to embalm him. They do not go back to their fishing. They go out into the world to preach Christ and him crucified. And why? Since they do, may not we put it in messianic terms? They preached the Messiah and him crucified. They reached the conviction that he was the Messiah even as he had learned at baptism and they had learned in Cæsarea-Philippi. They preached the conviction that to be crucified was the highest conceivable expression of the messiahship even as he had seen in his temptations, and as they had seen on the mount of transfiguration, and as they now were convinced forevermore through an experience they called the resurrection, an experience over whose physics and chemistry we may hold endless and fruitless debate, but whose meaning we may not doubt, and of whose reality its effects are sufficient proof. They, too, believed that service, suffering and sacrifice are more God-like than anything else, that God is on their side more than he is on the side of anything else, and they, too, had the faith that to die in love is actually mightier than to slay in hatred.

VERSE

Home

MASTER, I know that there are many mansions
Prepared above, of which Thou art the light,
Where no wild tempests shake their noble stanchions;
Across whose towers falls no wing of night;
I know it hath not entered our conception
The things which there Thy tender hands have formed;
Sweet feasts of heaven waiting our reception,
Hearth fires of love where cold hearts shall be warmed.
And yet, I pray that here upon this sojourn,
While weary oft', the pathway hence I trace,
Thou'lt grant a little respite at each even',
The refuge of one dear, love-hallowed place.
A haven separate from the world's confusion,
Whose sheltering walls close out its strife and din,
Far from all tawdriness and bold intrusion,
Guarding affection's holy reign within.
For less, I think, our pilgrim feet would falter
Could we resume that steep, ascending way,
Rested, refreshed at such a wayside altar,
At morn's rebirth, and through the long, long day.

Lincoln the Democrat

UPON him fell a heritage of hate,
And he, who loved the fields of rustling corn,
Took up the load; and then a Thought was born—
A Thought that soon would shake the walls of state.
The dream was his, that government should be Unselfish, open as the morning sun;
Unwearying, alert, lest wrong be done
To any man or child. No vanity
Of pomp and power could move him from his will
To champion the cause of truth in public life.
He bent him to his task; but in the strife
That noble form was felled. His foes could kill
The mortal man, they could not stay his dream,
Which now, on darkened earth, casts far its gleam.

Reciprocity

I DO not think that skies and meadows are Moral, or that the fixture of a star
Comes of a quiet spirit, or that trees
Have wisdom in their windless silences.
Yet these are things invested in my mood
With constancy, and peace, and fortitude,
That in my troubled season I can cry
Upon the wide composure of the sky,
And envy fields, and wish that I might be
As little daunted as a star or tree.

Aftermath of the Steel Report

SIX months have passed since the Investigating Commission of the Interchurch World Movement issued its report on the steel strike of 1919 and on labor conditions in the industry. A brief review of the reception accorded it and an inquiry into influences it has aroused may be of interest to those who believe it is the business of the church to exert pressure on untoward industrial or other social conditions.

Readers of the Report will recall that it found against the twelve hour day, the seven day week, the denial of the right of organization and collective bargaining, and in favor of the rights of representation and conference on the part of the men. It also found that the strike was not a "radical" movement and warned that all the conditions that brought it on still persisted as fruitful source of further trouble, and pointed out that the next strike could much more easily be delivered over to radical influences.

So far as partisans to either side of the controversy are concerned the effect seems to have been simply to bring them to take a more determined grip on their adopted course. The steel magnates proceed with grim determination to carry on their autocratic labor policies while the A. F. of L. is perfecting organization to unionize the mills. The labor leaders have accepted the criticisms of their tactics in good temper, but the steel employers have reacted rather bitterly to the criticism of their tactics.

Meanwhile the Report itself has been one of the "best sellers" and has furnished the funds to make possible the second volume, or the "Sub Reports," which is now being prepared for the press. It will cover the "undercover" or spy system in the industry, the manner in which the Pittsburgh press reported the strike, the immigrant mind as involved in the situation and perhaps some other matters of interest. The type of subject treated in this second volume may prove even more disturbing to the bourbonistic temper than did the first volume.

The Answer of Steel

Senator Walsh of Montana recently introduced a resolution in the Senate to make the Report a public document. It was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, of which Senator Kenyon is chairman. The Investigating Commission and the steel employers were invited to present to the Kenyon committee their respective sides of the case in person. The commission attended a committee meeting in person and answered questions frankly without advocating the Walsh resolution. The steel employers sent a lengthy document prepared by W. S. Horner, president of the National Association of Sheet and Tin Plate Manufacturers. As a matter of information it deserves more space than can be given it in this article. Suffice it to say that it makes no defense of the twelve-hour day, the seven day week or the denial of conference and representation, but covers many pages with diatribes against the commission and their special investigators. From this document down through the Wall Street Journal, the Iron Age and other financial and trade journals to the depths of mental obfuscation displayed by certain clerical defenders of medieval labor policies there has been no other answer.

The most direct answer of employer temper in Pittsburgh, not to the Report but because of it and all that sort of thing, is displayed in the attack of the "Employers' Association of Pittsburgh" on the local Y. W. C. A.'s campaign for funds. "After the misuse of funds by the recent ill-fated Interchurch World Movement, we have felt it to be our duty to advise you of some of the purposes to which your money will be put if you contribute to the Y. W. C. A.," they say.

The reader will recall that at the Y. W. C. A. convention in Cleveland last summer the "Social Ideals of the Churches" as adopted and twice confirmed by the Federal Council of Churches and as adopted by the national Y. M. C. A. convention, was adopted by the Y. W.'s after a rather warm discussion, and that this action was made dramatic by the withdrawal of Mrs. Helen Gould Shepperd from the Association Committee. The Association had previously undertaken industrial work of the social welfare type and had espoused the cause of limited hours, minimum wages and other ameliorative legislation for women workers.

The Employers' Association of Pittsburgh denounces the Social Ideals of the Churches as adopted by both Y's as "quite in line with some of the recent radical and ill-advised efforts of religious and quasi-religious bodies to 'regulate industry'," and while acknowledging that it has done much good work thinks "it is to be regretted" that they have taken this stand which "every man conversant with industrial problems knows to be destructive of America's progress and civilization." These "destructive" things are industrial democracy, collective bargaining, a share in shop control and management by the workers, and experiments in cooperative ownership, the minimum wage, government labor exchanges, protection of the workers from enforced unemployment and labor's desire for an equitable share in the profits and management of industry. All these are named in the letter of warning, but the chief bete noir seems to be those things that look to sharing control, management and ownership, as these are all capitalized in the letter. The Survey reports that only $90,000 of the $200,000 sought has been obtained.

The Answer of the Public

Senator Walsh's resolution is significant of the interest aroused in legislative halls. The leading progressive Senators are frankly desirous of obtaining such circulation of the Report as will give public opinion at large a chance to know the facts as there set forth. The resolution may be crowded out by the over-full calendar and the political filibustering usual at this short session, but its contents will be made known in one way and another. The denunciation of the investigators severally or en groupe will not serve to deflect public opinion to the unanswered facts in the Report, and the revelations of the Lockwood committee in regard to the efforts of steel makers to carry their lock-out against union labor into the building trades will only confirm the public judgment. There are also significant discoveries impending concerning the work of the same influences in the West Virginia miners' war.

The best index to the influence of the Report on public opinion is not to be found in the denunciation of financial and trade journals, but in the editorial columns of the daily press, ninety per cent of which has been of the type here quoted. The practically uniform comment of the religious press favorable to the Report has perhaps a more prophetic significance, but that of the daily press reveals the attitude of the larger public. Christian Century readers will be interested in it and we here give a few quotations from clippings that fill a large volume:

Brooklyn Eagle: "(The Report is) a challenge for the right of the churches to hold business morality to the standard of Christ's teachings, and the question raised is whether business men inside the churches will permit that right or will try to prevent its exercise."

Chicago Post: "It carries a weight and influence that cannot be ignored."

Oklahoma City Leader: "It was an audacious thing for organized religion to do, but if more clergymen understood and sympathized with the aims of labor it is possible it might be easier to fill pews."

Springfield Republican: "A challenging document," and lengthy editorial argument in its favor.

N. Y. Tribune, in a criticism of the church for doing such work: "It carries a weight and influence that cannot be ignored" (the answer of a very conservative paper to criticism of the investigating personnel). It adds that the commission had adequate technical equipment and honesty.

Rocky Mountain News: "The most significant achievement in recent years in the field of religious activity—it carries a weight and influence that cannot be ignored."

London, Eng., Statesman: "The Report is a gallant and resonant deed."

Kansas City Star: "A searching inquiry."

New York World: "The Report is a challenging document, not to be set aside by any suspicions of radical prejudice on the part of the commission or its agents or by any theory respecting the proper sphere of church activity."

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, January 24, 1921.

THE various parties in the churches have never been more interesting and never more mixed than they are today.

If the few stern, unbending followers of the varied traditions are excepted there is movement everywhere. New groupings are discerned; new estrangements between old friends. The Catholic party in the church of England is showing itself concerned not only with its relations to Rome and the Eastern church, but also with its bearing to the free churches. It sees the weakness of a church which is between two communities, one of which it cannot recognize and by the other of which it is itself unrecognized. It shows signs that it is becoming tired of this isolation on both sides.

But even more remarkable is the movement in the evangelical party within the church of England. They have just had their annual conference called still by the name of "Islington," though it meets now in Westminster. It is true that there is still an old guard amongst them, uncompromising in its attachment to the traditional views of biblical inspiration; but the younger evangelicals show a willingness and even an eagerness to understand and to learn from the others who do not share these views. And they are bent upon bringing the great evangelical inheritance of theirs into the common store, unencumbered by the "anise and cummin" of other ages.

* * *

"The Gloomy Dean" Triumphant

Evangelicals met in conference seem to have given a cordial welcome to that very fearless broad churchman, Dean Inge. It is difficult to explain to those who hear of this country chiefly from its press, how great a place the dean has come to hold in the national thought. In his first days at St. Paul's he was dismissed by some lively pen as "the gloomy dean." The adjective dogged him like an assassin, but he escaped, and in our usual English fashion, when we have done our best to dismiss a teacher, and he will not be dismissed, we take our places humbly at his feet. So the "gloomy dean" has become one of the greatest forces in the spiritual and intellectual life of Great Britain. Before the evangelicals he spoke candid words upon the Lambeth proposals for reunion. Quite clearly he believes that the gulf between the Anglican church and other Protestant communities is the first that must be bridged.

"It is the ignis fatuus of reunion with Rome which blocks the way to reunion with our Protestant brethren and I maintain that we cannot allow the road to be permanently blocked in this way." But even more important was the dean's declaration that "the disruptions of Christendom have been mainly political, not religious."

Many of us believe this to be profoundly true. We find no difficulty in sharing the religious treasures of others not in our own church. "In the purely religious sphere there has been no schism. No form of Christian piety has separated itself from Christ and therefore there is nowhere any real obstacle to prevent Christians from returning through their fellowship with Christ to fellowship with each other." The diagnosis stands. The facts are clear in the history of the past and in the experience of today. And yet just because the dividing motives are political and not religious they have a strange power of survival; they find great allies in the natural man. Then there is always the machine in every church—and the engineers who work it. They naturally consider the machine most sacred. Yet still we move.

Canon Barnes and the Evolutionary Doctrine

Dr. Barnes, Canon of Westminster, is another of our leading preachers whom it has proved impossible to silence, and now that this is clear, the multitude settles down to listen to him. When he preached upon "The Fall of Man" before the British Association, he must have hesitated from the fear that he was only saying what everyone believed already. But the storm burst upon him and the letters of protest probably threatened to break his waste paper basket. But such storms are not what they once were. Still it was evident that by vast numbers of Christians and non-Christians the changes made necessary by evolutionary science had not been grasped. The orthodox were horrified; the opponents of Christianity rubbed their hands with glee. Some defenders of the faith declared that with the surrender of the Pauline doctrine of the fall the entire scheme of redemption toppled to the ground. "Exactly," added the opponents of the faith, "we always told you so; it all hangs together." But Canon Barnes is not only an accomplished scientist, he is no less a brave preacher, one not to be moved by popular clamor. Therefore he has returned to the charge and in Westminster has developed his teaching upon evolution in its bearing upon the Christian faith. This is a service which is of value to the whole Christian church; and it is an illustration, if such were needed, of the practical fellowship which is in being. Canon Barnes preaching in Westminster is not preaching to his own church or indeed to any church or group of churches. He is preaching to the soul of a people, troubled and hungry for truth. It is no small gain to have a preacher ready to bring knowledge out of the academies to the untrained and perplexed man in the pew or in the street. This is the sum of the preacher's message:

HASTINGS' ONE-VOLUME Dictionary of the Bible

Cleas, concise, popular and yet scholarly. The skill of its able and experienced editor, Dr. Hastings, is in evidence at every point. Unimportant subjects are treated briefly, making it possible to devote more space to vital themes. Among its contributors are found 100 of the leading Biblical scholars in England and America and each gives the results of his own special knowledge and research. The articles on the different books of the Bible are especially valuable. The point of view is that of progressive, modern Biblical scholarship. Extreme theories are avoided. In general, the conclusions which are destined to be the basis of present-day preaching and teaching, are fairly and convincingly set forth. The historical, geographical, and archæological data are also classified and presented with rare skill and effectiveness.

"Thinkers with whom I range myself are forced to believe that life was endowed with its capacity for evolution for a definite purpose by a being who had that purpose in mind before the process began. It is to them inconceivable that the whole course of evolution has no meaning. It must be, they hold, due to a settled plan; it bears, for them, clear evidences of design; and, as man is obviously at present its final product, we must interpret the end which evolution serves by the highest qualities which have come to exist in humanity. Thus they are led—and they see no satisfactory alternative—to the view that God, a being who has the necessary power, will and purpose, designed, set in motion and sustains the process of evolution; and we must derive our knowledge of the nature of God primarily from a study of the most distinctive elements in ourselves."

Turning of the Tide

To turn to other matters, it is encouraging to learn that the melancholy drift away from the free churches, so far as their roll of membership is concerned, shows signs of arrest. The Baptist handbook for 1921 reveals a turn in the tide. There is the large increase of 11,000 in the number of Sunday School scholars; more than 1,300 new teachers are reported and there is no falling off in membership. For some years the Baptists have had to report a falling-away. It is good news that they, the first to report their returns for the year, have good news for us. May this be a happy omen for the others!

The new Chairman of the Congregational Union, the Rev. A. J. Viner began his year of office in January. He is already moderator of the Northwestern Province, which includes Lancashire of whose County Union he is secretary, and now he takes the place in the chair of the Union for which he has worked most unweariedly for many years. Mr. Viner is an excellent speaker, a sound counsellor in committees, an administrator who inspires confidence; one of those enthusiasts who try in vain to hide their enthusiasm beneath an appearance of stoical calm; a fighter who rather likes a good fight, and yet a man and a brother to whom ministers and other hardy northerners in Lancashire look never in vain for sympathy and counsel. Altogether the new Chairman is a representative of a type of which British Congregationalism has no need to be ashamed.

A New Style of Debate

A new style of meeting was planned by the Life and Liberty Movement for the week beginning February 6. This movement is beginning Chapter II of its life. The plot of Chapter II is to bring before the nation the need of Fellowship between the churches, between the nations and in industry. At each meeting there will be a challenger or challengers who will be followed by the speakers for the evening. The interest of this method will be seen from the programme of the meetings which is interesting enough to give in full. At each meeting Dr. Temple, the new Bishop of Manchester will preside.

Monday, 7th—Fellowship Between the Churches. Challengers: Maj.-Gen. Sir F. Maurice, K.C.M.G., and Mr. A. Clutton Brock. Speakers: The Archbishop of York, the Bishop of London, the Rev. Principal Selbie.

Tuesday, 8th—Fellowship in Industry. Challenger: Mr. Ernest Bevin ("The Dockers' K. C."). Speakers: The Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy ("Woodbine Willie"), Miss Maude Royden, the Rev. Dr. Orchard, Mr. Rigby (chairman, Stockport Labor party).

Ash Wednesday, 9th—Penitence for Broken Fellowship. Speakers: Unnamed.

Thursday, 10th—Fellowship Among Nations. Challenger: The Rt. Hon. Sir John Simon. Speakers: Lord Robert Cecil, the Rt. Hon. W. Runciman, Miss Ruth Rouse.

It will be a gain to the liveliness and reality of public meetings if this method proves to be a success. It might even be adopted in churches. The only instance known to the writer of such a practice in church service was reported from the east end of London where in a Catholic mission service one priest took the part of the man who objects to Christianity and the other priest answered him. But there it was an arranged affair. The real thing would be more exciting and in our more conservative churches has not been tried.

International and Interracial Discussion

The first anniversary of the League of Nations has been observed in London; the chief prophet of the League in this country, Lord Robert Cecil, spoke hopeful words about its progress. An Aspiration, a Hope, a Fact—these were the three stages which he reported. It is not denied by the best friends of the league that it has only touched the fringe of its work. But they rejoice in that beginning, and the League of Nations' Union is full of life and go, and it can be claimed by the most sober observers that there is a growing concern for the League in the heart of the average man, and this is the man who decides things in the end.

If we remain in the dark about the racial problem of today, it is not for lack of counsellors. Every week new books appear on one or other aspect of the one problem upon the solution of which the immediate future of the world depends. Those of us who are committed to the missionary cause find our own peculiar fields of knowledge and interest explored by many strange feet. We are like those who find their by-paths becoming highways. The politician is beginning to see things which the missionary student has known for a long while. There are many, for example, who are reading "Darkwater" and the sheets of our greatest journals are open to discussions of such a question as this, "Are the Whites Doomed?" And even if there is some danger of extravagant fears, it is a gain to have the mind of a people exercised in the great matters which are before the world now.

One of our best "Internationalists," Mr. Basil Matthews, the editor of "Outward Bound," has been ordered away for a couple of months by his doctor and he is now sailing for Madiera. He has done much and he has still more to do as a mediator between the missionary societies and the men of goodwill outside their range. His countless friends wish for him a prosperous voyage and health completely restored.

Alexander Whyte's Preeminence

The amazing tributes to Dr. Alexander Whyte from statesmen, writers, scholars, ministers and others confirm the faith that the pulpit may still be the mightiest force in the life of a people. Dr. Whyte was a preacher first and foremost and all the time. Almost all his books were preached first. He lived for Free St. George's and he had his reward at the last. We are given to criticism of our preachers. We make fun of them; we bitterly lament the idle word when we hear it. But our very bitterness and severity are evidences of the real value we put upon the pulpit. It might be so great: that is why we cannot bear it to become so small. Let a man like Whyte live among us and we give to him a place above other men because we know that he is at work in the real power house of the world.

Fidelity*

IF there is one word in the English language which I love it is this same word, "Fidelity." I like fidelity in a dog, I love fidelity in an associate. It is eloquent not only of trust in you but loyalty and devotion to you—even unto death. God has that element and Paul thrilled to it when he said, "I know whom I have trusted and I know that he will guard what I have trusted to him." Christ has this element and Peter felt it when he said, "You know that I love you." Within a week I have talked to a man, the fire of whose eye, the tone of whose voice and the grip of whose hand filled me with exaltation—Fidelity. "A friend is one who knows all your faults—yet loves you just the same."

I am not surprised that Jesus placed the value upon fidelity which he did. Brilliance is not to be depended upon. Brilliant men join the church, flash across the sky and vanish in the blackness of night. Women of surpassing charm shine in their own splendor for an hour and then fade into shadows. Wealth, personal attractiveness, striking talent, dazzling mentality—flash and die. Judas was the aristocrat of the disciples. The Rich Young Ruler was the decoration of the synagogue. Both failed.

Are we not glad that Jesus did not say: "Blessed are the brilliant," but that he did say, "Blessed are the faithful?" We can all be faithful. This is the reason that the first shall be last and the last shall be first. How many high-talented people use all their talents upon themselves; how many one talented people make the churches succeed. The tortoise outruns the hare. Success is thus set within striking distance of all of us—we can all be faithful.

One does not need to be dull because faithful! It is not the dull scholar that is the regular attendant; it is not the dull member that is loyal to the services, it is not the sub-normal that keeps his dues paid up—there is no implied inferiority in faithful folks, rather there is a sense of proportion and balance. The faithful put the emphasis in the right place. In days of health they devote themselves to God's cause and dying they have an abundant entrance into heaven. I protest against this false notion that something is lacking in the faithful soul. The lack is to be found in the brilliant soul. Insanity and brilliance are not far apart oftentimes. Brilliance is often combined with sin. Think of your artists, musicians and writers. Was Byron brilliant? Do not eat your heart out because you are not some striking, unusual, flashing sort of person—no doubt you are better just as you are. You have read the story of Louis' court? Enough!

The disheartening factor in all church activities is to be located precisely in the quarter of the fluctuating, uncertain, undependable membership. Make a study of that Sunday-school class. If there are ten scholars you will find two or three who are noted for fidelity, the others vary perversely. They are here today and away tomorrow. They drive the teacher to distraction. Does a church possess one thousand members? Then you may count upon three hundred and thirty-three who will be fairly regular in attendance and giving, but the other two-thirds follow every passing breeze; they motor when the sun shines; they stay in bed when it rains; they go to the theatre when the missionary rally is to be held and to the concert when the annual meeting is in session. They pay when it suits their convenience, they entertain visitors on all important holidays instead of celebrating at the church, and they go to New York at the most inopportune times so far as church dates are concerned. Some of the unfaithful are business men, maddened by the pursuit of gold, some of the unfaithful are society queens seeking the place of influence, some of the unfaithful are careless young people chasing the fleeting phantom of pleasure, some are older folk who have sinned so often that their wills are broken. Running his eye over the church roster the average minister almost yells in sheer dismay—what an army he has. Fidelity, FIDELITY, FIDELITY—God give us that!

MOFFATT'S Translation of the New Testament

THE author is recognized as one of the most distinguished living scholars of the Greek new Testament. His translation is notable for its apt usage of words as well as for its originality of thought. A new meaning is given to the old version which is supplemented and not supplanted. It is the only version which makes use of the recent discoveries in Egypt and the Holy Land. No Bible student's library is complete without this marvelous translation. It will elucidate difficult passages and call forth expressions of surprise, delight and gratitude. Its every phrase is a new text for the preacher and a new idea for the Christian layman.

CORRESPONDENCE

Wanted—A Definition!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The Associated Press makes a recent announcement that the American Legion has set out a program to rid our educational institutions of 8,000 disloyal teachers, 2,000 of whom are said to be in colleges and universities. Such an astounding number of persons slated for the pillory causes one to wonder what the definition of loyalty might be. Does it mean that any teacher who does not subscribe to the economic views of Judge Gary is less than one hundred per cent American, and must be crushed under the new Inquisition? No doubt, all the stock watering and melon-cutting corporations are elated over this new St. George, who has come to kill the dragon.

If such is the fate of the teachers, what of the preachers who have heretical social views? Here, also, is a field of investigation. Hosts of ministers are alive to the moral challenge of the present social crisis, and are keenly aware of the far-reaching social implications of the gospel of Jesus.

A well-known writer tells of some working-girls who asked Gypsy Smith to speak in their behalf in a strike which they were conducting to obtain wages to permit them to live decently. The evangelist is said to have replied: "Get Jesus into your heart, and these things will settle themselves."

We wonder what Jesus would have said to those girls, and what he would have said about their employer. Many preachers are now in the business of interpreting Jesus in terms of social righteousness. And so, perhaps, someone will next be setting up an Index Librorum Expurgandorum through which publishing houses shall be compelled to leave out of the Bible such radicals as Micah, Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and James. They are not one hundred per cent loyal. It depends upon what is meant by loyalty.

Readers Should Beware!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Recently I have seen several copies of The Christian Century, and I have read with interest your editorials and contributed articles. I note that the paper is "published not for any single denomination alone," and that it is "an undenominational journal of religion." But I have noted also that The Christian Century is published by "The Disciples Publication Society" and that it is being quoted by the Literary Digest as a "Disciples" publication. Furthermore, I am informed that every member of the editorial staff as listed on your title page is a member of the one communion. There is apparent inharmony.

Surely there is no intention on your part to "Disciple" the churches insidiously, taking unfair advantage of them by your cloak of undenominationalism. Surely it is not your plan to publish a "Disciple" message while pretending to be undenominational. After reading your paper I have found nothing so far that even suggests "Disciples views." But then I have not read much, and it may be that The Christian Century with its claims to be an undenominational magazine, is but a journal of camouflaged Disciples propaganda. I surely would like to know the real truth of the matter.

Am very anxious, along with a number of others, to have this matter cleared up, and am the spokesman for a group of Christian workers. You will find enclosed a self-addressed envelope for reply.

To Balance the "Knocks"

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Enclosed are seven names and addresses of people to whom I have spoken of The Christian Century. I believe most of them will certainly become subscribers. I'm sending in these names because I believe your magazine is worthy of a much wider circulation. I'm delighted with it! I read every word of it. You get "knocks" enough, judging from your "Correspondence," but they really don't count, for the writers have evidently been dead a long time, and are altogether unaware of the great movements of religious thought and life so ably dealt with in your columns.

It is difficult to interest men in a religious magazine, because they know the "piffle" usually found in its pages, but I'm trying to persuade a few that The Christian Century is different.

From Overflowing Hearts

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I cannot resist telling you how much I appreciate your paper, its crispness, saying much in few words, and above all its outspokenness. The poems too are quite different from the usual ones found in the religious press. I read them first usually.

There is certainly a place for a weekly like yours. Some of the matter it brings out—like that reference to the Sunday school by Professor Hoben—is not to be had elsewhere.

It is balm and refreshing to me to find a weekly which is through and through liberal and forward-looking. May nothing interfere with the long and useful life of The Christian Century!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I just want to express my appreciation of The Christian Century. It is my ideal of a religious paper, as it deals with current problems in a manner that stimulates thought and also aids one's thinking. I read it through and then wish there was only more.

Ambassadors of God

By S. PARKES CADMAN

In this book, just from the press, Dr. Cadman, well-known Brooklyn preacher, maintains that the outstanding truths for preachers to proclaim are few, simple and experimental. He bids them find these truths in the Scriptures and shows how their greater peers in the Christian church through all the centuries have taken this Scripture material, and shaped it, each to the needs of his own generation.

BOOKS

WHAT'S ON THE WORKER'S MIND. By Whiting Williams. Mr. Whiting Williams' new volume "What's On the Worker's Mind," is a timely and important piece of work. It throws first hand light on the baffling industrial problem, and upon that phase of it which is least understood and least under control, namely, the worker's psychology. Its observations are especially important on the causes for the slowing up of production, the importance of his job to the worker and his insecurity, the inefficiency and tactlessness of most foremen, the dangerous overstrain of long hours and Sunday work, the inequalities under which foreign born workers suffer, the evil effects of bad housing, the essential integrity and good will of the workers and the importance of preserving that good will. Because of its importance to the employer who wants to understand his workers, and to ministers who want an insight into these human relationships, one could wish that every employer, every person who manages groups of men, and every clergyman might read this book. It can be recommended the more unreservedly because it is a fascinating human document, and well written. (Scribner's. $2.00.)

THE ACQUISITIVE SOCIETY. By R. H. Tawney. In the state of Colorado it is not possible for a man to hold any property rights in the irrigation systems except what is known as a use right. No man can own what he cannot use. The whole system of absolute right in private property has given way to this system of use right and this fact alone probably stands between Colorado and a gigantic monopoly in the ownership and control of water. R. H. Tawney in his book, "The Acquisitive Society," applies this principle to the use and ownership of land and the great business corporations which have grown up under modern industry. He shows how the theory of individual rights was adequate when economic conditions were simple. As an alternative for a system which has, however, broken down, he suggests that rights of property and industrial organization should be based upon the principle of function. "What nature demands is work; few working aristocracies, however tyrannical, have fallen; few functionless aristocracies have survived. In society, as in the world of organic life, atrophy is but one stage removed from death. In proportion as the land owner becomes a mere rentier and industry is conducted, not by the rude energy of the competing employers who dominated its infancy, but by the salaried servants of shareholders, the argument for private property which reposes on the impossibility of finding any organization to supersede them loses its application, for they are already superseded." With a logic which is keen and thorough, the author follows this line of argument through all the problems of modern industry. The book is a splendid application of ethical theory to modern problems. The conditions of a right organization of industry are, therefore, permanent, unchanging, and capable of being apprehended by the most elementary intelligence, provided it will read the nature of its countrymen in the large outlines of history, not in the bloodless abstractions of experts. The first is that it should be subordinated to the community in such a way as to render the best service technically possible, that those who render no service should not be paid at all, because it is of the essence of a function that it should find its meaning in the satisfaction, not of itself, but of the end which it serves. The second is that its direction and government should be in the hands of persons who are responsible to those who are directed and governed because it is the condition of economic freedom that men should not be ruled by an authority which they cannot control. The industrial problem, in fact, is a problem of right, not merely of material misery, and because it is a problem of right, it is most acute among those sections of the working classes whose material misery is least. It is a question, first of function, and secondly of freedom." (Harcourt, Brace & Howe. $1.50.)

THE RURAL COMMUNITY. By Newell L. Sims. Anyone who has looked into the literature of rural sociology must be impressed that the number of titles is all out of proportion to the aggregate contribution which the books contain. Good books have been written, but the task of assembling the worth while literature has been very great. Professor Sims has done a much needed piece of work in compiling a number of the more important treatises and building them, with the addition of original interpretative material, both historical and critical, into a handbook that no rural educator, preacher or social worker can well afford to be without. Among the authors drawn upon are the well known experts—Butterfield, Wilson, Vogt, Bailey and others who have intimate knowledge of the field.

A historical and analytical section is followed by an extensive treatment of "community reconstruction"—the problem, the program and the agencies. The discussions are for the most part non-technical, and the whole area of rural community life is covered—the school, the church, the county fair, the community institute, and the many expressions of social impulse to which no formal name can be given.

The editor-author is one of the younger and one of the most vigorously critical thinkers who have devoted themselves to rural sociology. He presents the history of village life as a progressive social disintegration culminating in the incomparable individualism of the American country community. Even the rural telephone and mail delivery, he suspects, have isolated the farmer by making him a less frequent visitor at the village rendezvous. Rural America, suffering from the "balking" of social instincts and from "folk depletion," requires that its people learn to play together, to work together, to do business together in cooperation, and finally to seek cultural enrichment together.

Dr. Sims' book is a library between two covers. With it and a good textbook on the principles of sociology the country preacher or teacher will not want for trustworthy guidance. The preacher, especially, will find here his field surveyed, his social problem defined, his previous work evaluated and his tools and methods aptly suggested (Scribner's.)

THE NEW FRONTIER. By Guy Emerson. The thesis early announced by the author, but which can hardly be called the theme of the book, is that the distinguishing mark of American life "is the constant possession of a frontier whose creative forces have been continuously liberated—in other words romanticism constantly modifying the tradition inherited from the old world. Now that the physical frontier has well-nigh disappeared, a new frontier is before us, which is defined not in geographical but in social and political terms." Concerning this frontier the author avowedly finds the inspiration of his optimism in the spirit typified by Theodore Roosevelt.

But Mr. Emerson is chiefly interested in defining and applying what he calls "liberalism." To many of his readers it must appear that he is not discussing liberalism but an habitual attitude of compromise. In fact he commends the "policies of the middle of the road." Liberals in general will hardly own the description of them. Yet Mr. Emerson unquestionably has condensed, as a product of wide reading and practical good sense, a good deal of wisdom of the liberal variety in his little book.

The curious lapse from a sustained high moral tone of writing occurs when the author throws in a gratuitous enthusiastic endorsement of universal military training. And his account of Wall Street is naive. But one feels that he is reading in this volume, not without profit, opinions that are held by a large, important, and perhaps a growing, portion of the intelligent American public. (Holt. $2.00.)

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

President Harding Reads the Bible

President-elect Harding has recently given out an interview upon the subject of religion. For many years he has been a member of the Baptist church in Marion, Ohio, while Mrs. Harding is a Methodist. He said recently: "I don't like to talk about religion just for the sake of conversation, but I do believe that we need more of it in our American life, more of it in our government—the Real Spirit of it. I think there should be more of the 'Do unto others as you would be done by' spirit of service. It might interest you to know that, while I have always been a great reader of the Bible, I have never read it so closely as in the last few weeks, when my mind has been bent upon the work I must shortly take up. I have obtained a good deal of inspiration from the Psalms of David and from many passages of the four gospels. Yes, and there is still wisdom in the sayings of old Solomon, don't forget that. I rejoice in the inheritance of a Christian belief. I don't mind saying it, that I gladly go to God Almighty for strength in confronting the responsibilities that face me. I want America to be consecrated to the revival that was apparent in the early days of the republic. I don't think a government can be wholly just that has not in some way a contact with Omnipotence. In the convention of Versailles there was no recognition of Almighty God. I could not hope for a happy relationship among the nations unless there was a common thought among them in recognition of a Supreme Being."

Dr. Shannon the Easter Speaker

It is the custom in Chicago to arrange theater meetings during Holy Week. These meetings are largely attended by business men and shoppers. The Chicago Church Federation has chosen Dr. Frederick F. Shannon, pastor of Central Church of Chicago, and successor to Dr. Gunsaulus, as the speaker this year. The meetings will be held in the auditorium of the First Methodist church from 12:10 noon and continuing forty minutes. The Lutheran Lenten Meetings will be held in La Salle Theatre and will be addressed by Rev. John F. Siebert.

Federation Would Put a Man at Glenwood

The Chicago Church Federation will hold public meetings in many sections of Chicago on February 27 to secure funds for the federation work in public institutions. One of the new challenges is to place a young man worker at Glenwood Manual Training School. This is the school which received last year the 547 boys of Chicago who fell into serious trouble with the law. This school asserts that to "readin', 'ritin', and 'rith-metic" it has added "plantin', printin', and poundin'." At the present time no religious work is done for the boys save some volunteer work by the Chicago Heights churches.

Socialist Mayor Will Speak in Presbyterian Colleges

The Hon. J. Still Wilson, former Mayor of Berkeley, Cal., has been engaged by Coe College, Cedar Rapids Iowa, to hold a series of meetings and conferences during February. Mr. Wilson will meet the students and give them counsel on various life problems, including the choice of vocation, the correction of bad habits and the working out of religious faith. Mr. Wilson was educated at Northwestern University, and held a pastorate with a Methodist church in Chicago. He later became a lecturer and was elected twice as a Socialist Mayor of Berkeley. He has a number of books relating to the "social revolution." Coe College has a thousand students, and is one of the strong institutions of the Presbyterian church.

Dean of Kansas City Ministry

While ministers look to the large cities as the goal of their ambitions, the history of city pastorates is very disappointing. Most ministers last less than two years in a city church. It is the exceptional man that ever stays ten years. The record of Rev. F. L. Streeter in Kansas City is therefore the more remarkable. He has been for 26 years pastor of First Baptist church. During the past nine years he has also been teaching in the Baptist seminary in Kansas City. His first work in Kansas City was in connection with a mission church more than thirty years ago. He has the distinction of being the dean of the ministry in Kansas City.

Ministers Use Literary Characters

Several ministers of Kansas City have recently been illustrating life problems by the use of well-known literary characters. Rev. Fletcher Homan, pastor of Trinity Methodist church, recently preached on "King Lear," talking about the different kinds of women in the play. He declared that the virtues of Cordelia were a dowry above a kingdom. Dr. C. F. Aked has been giving a series of evening talks on the plays of Ibsen. In discussing recently "The Enemy of the People" he declared that majorities were always wrong. He said: "The majority never rules. It is always controlled by the few who are animated by ideals. Hope lies in the fact that the majority can be led by those who are wise."

Who Will Head Trinity Church?

With the election of Dr. Manning, rector of Trinity church, as bishop of

New York, the foremost Episcopal pulpit of the country is left open. There is already considerable gossip around New York with regard to a possible successor to Dr. Manning. The two names most frequently mentioned are those of Rev. Joseph P. McComas, four years vicar of the neighboring St. Paul's church, and Rev. W. W. Bellinger, vicar of St. Agnes Chapel. Both of these men have been serving under the direction of Trinity church and are therefore well known to Trinity people. Rev. Milo H. Gates is also a strong candidate, but is declared to be too liberal for some of the people of the church.

Sunday Rights Association

The drive being made by various secularists in the country in favor of an open Sunday is having the effect of making the American people think as never before as to the investment of the one day in seven which some would abolish. Recently the Sunday Rights Association was formed in New York City. It will undertake to establish itself all over the country, and fight restrictive legislation as it affects Sunday. Martin Vogel, former assistant treasurer of the United States, presided over the meeting at the time the new organization was created. The declared object of the new organization is "to protect Sunday from such restrictive legislation as shall work against the customary enjoyment of Sunday as a day of rest and recreation by all the people of the United States." The new organization sees in Sunday a day of rest and of recreation, but not a day of worship. It would not be a very hazardous guess to suggest that the moving picture interests of the country are behind some of these secularist groups, for it is they who would be most benefited by the break-up of the Christian Lord's Day. Meanwhile many citizens who never go to church are taking interest in maintaining the present laws against secularist assault on account of the interest of their children. The battle on the Sunday question will be for the next year one of the live public questions.

Massachusetts Baptists Are Alive

The Massachusetts Year-Book of the Baptist denomination was published recently. The figures indicate that it is one of the liveliest Christian forces in that commonwealth. The giving to missionary and benevolent projects was last year $13.73 per member, said to be the highest average ever reached by any denomination in that state. The accessions to the churches totaled 6,040.

Ministers Who Write Books

The pet ambition of most ministers is to write a book. The present crisis in the world's life has led many to believe that the time is now. Publishers in the leading cities of the country have their desks piled with manuscripts. Many of these ministers inform the publishers that the Lord told them to write their book. Very often it is an exposition of Daniel, or a treatise on the end of the world. One publisher reports that he handles the manuscript on 750 books per year, and of these thirty to thirty-five are accepted. In spite of the low batting average achieved, the ministers continue to write books.

Congregationalists and Unitarians Unite in Ordaining Minister

When the son of President A. C. McGiffert of Union Seminary was installed in his church, the Congregationalists and the Unitarians joined in the service. Rev. A. C. McGiffert, Jr., is now settled as pastor of All Souls' church of Lowell, Mass. The father-in-law of the young minister is Rev. Samuel E. Eliot, a prominent Unitarian of Boston, who made the prayer at the installation. The installation sermon was preached by Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin, pastor of Madison Avenue Presbyterian church of New York. It was with the latter minister that Mr. McGiffert, Jr., was associated during his student days at Union, as seminary students are often assigned to large churches for practical experience in church leadership. A number of ministers of wide reputation both of the Congregationalist and the Unitarian denominations were present at the installation, and the incident is looked upon as one of the omens of an approaching reunion of the two denominations.

Discussion Club Talks About Armaments

The Discussion Club of East End Christian church of Pittsburg discussed armaments over their oyster stew on Sunday evening, February 6. Nearly a hundred young people were present and almost exactly half of them were young men. The discussion over armaments was not in any way controlled. One young man asserted that the next war would be with Great Britain, and he hoped it wouldn't be long delayed. Another looked for war with Japan. The cause of disarmament was defended by a Y. M. C. A. secretary, while a man from the bureau of ordnance of the United States navy dissented. Rev. O. F. Jordan, the supply minister of the day, in the absence of Rev. J. R. Ewers, the minister, was called upon for the concluding speech. He asserted that there must be an ideal, and then practical steps by which the ideal could be realized. Asserting the ideal to be universal peace, he asked for a gradual reduction of armaments by agreements until the police duties of the nations grew so meager as to permit the abolition of the weapons of force. Every Sunday evening this discussion club takes a live subject and permits the widest divergence of opinion in the discussion.

Will Visit House to House

The whole state of Ohio is to be canvassed from house to house by the Protestant forces this year if the plans of the Ohio Federation of Churches are carried out. In a pamphlet sent recently to all the churches of the state, the following questions and suggestions were made: "How many churchless homes does your community contain? Where are they located? How many times have they been visited by pastors during the past year? Do the children of such households attend Sunday school? Has any real effort been made to enlist the people of these families in any church? With what results? These are important questions to any church. Can you answer them accurately and completely with reference to your community?"

Bishop Vetoes Right of Women to Vote

Radical spirits in the diocese of Texas of the Protestant Episcopal church undertook this year to give women a vote in the diocesan council. Most of the speeches made were in favor of woman's suffrage in the church. The vote was overwhelmingly in favor of woman's suffrage. Bishop Kinsolving heard the arguments, and overruled the action of the

Is the Protestant World Going Over to Liberalism?

SINCE the war the theological conservatism has been "seeing things at night." Many ministers who went into service as conservatives have come back again as liberals. These new liberals may not understand exactly all of the implications of their new attitude. Rev. Clarence Edward Macartney in a recent issue of the Christian Work tells how the progressive movement looks to him. According to his view, the church is in the midst of a great apostasy. He says:

"Yale Divinity School, an old and honorable school of the prophets, and traditionally associated with the Congregational Church, has ceased to be a seminary of Christian instruction, if we may believe its own declaration, and announces itself as a 'School of Religions.' The Congregational Church drifts steadily towards Unitarianism, of which it is still fair to say in the words of Coleridge, 'Unitarianism is not Christianity, but there are Unitarians who are Christians.' In New York the Unitarian Church of the Messiah has changed its name and broken its connection with the Unitarian body, even that pale cast of theology being too strong for its minister and people. It now calls itself a Hall of Worship, or some such name, where a sun worshipper, Jew, Mohammedan, and Christian would find nothing to 'hurt his feelings.'

"The Baptist Church, always independent in its organization, cannot be classified theologically. The former minister of the Baptist church which is my nearest neighbor was sad and depressed when Christmas and Easter came round, because he felt that he had nothing to say about the Incarnation and the Resurrection, as the church received these doctrines. But this man's successor started his work in the same church by calling for, and receiving, Christian decision at the close of an evening hour of worship. Confronted everywhere in the Baptist Church by facts like this, how could I, or anyone else, be expected to tell what the Baptist Church teaches or believes?

"In the Methodist Church we have the worst state of all. Fervor of great convictions brought the Methodist Church into being. Now the fire has died down; cold are the ashes on the hearth of former cheer and inspiration. Even the Presbytery of Denver, at a recent session, thought it incumbent upon them to warn students for the Presbyterian ministry away from Denver University with its Methodist School of Theology. Some time ago, when attending the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in St. Louis, I was asked to preach in the pulpit of one of the Methodist churches of the city. Where were the pious ejaculations, the fervent amens, the hearty singing? All were vanished, leaving not an echo behind them. The minister told of the Centenary Movement in the Methodist Church, an effort to celebrate the centenary of Methodist missions by raising a huge sum of money. The whole campaign, with minute men, and what not, culminated in a blaze of pageant glory at Columbus in 1919, with vast spectacles, tableaux, etc., to the accompaniment of moving pictures. And this from the church of the Wesleys!

"In the Episcopal Church we have the strangest hodge-podge that church history has yet afforded. Under the same skin you will find an out-and-out rationalist and an ultra-ritualist and churchman. I have just been reading a sermon on immortality by an Episcopal clergyman, and not only is there no Christianity in it, but the preacher goes out of the way to deny what Christianity, from the days of St. Paul down, has always taught as to sin, death and the life to come. Yet this same preacher has much to say about altars, sacraments, and so on. The more they strain at what few gnats of theology are left in Protestantism the more these Episcopal rectors swallow the camel of ritualism, incense, rubrics, apostolic ordination, and what not. The chief stock in trade of the Episcopal Church, just now is to talk about church unity, well knowing they themselves, so far as the branches of Protestantism are concerned, are the chief stumbling block in the way of unity by reason of the fable of apostolic succession. In contrast with all this it is refreshing to come upon Episcopal ministers who are more interested in the application of pure Christianity to the people committed to them than they are to changing the name of their denomination to the American Catholic Church."

council as it is his constitutional right to do. The bishop attended the Lambeth Conference, and was unmoved by the arguments that he heard there. He adheres stubbornly to his thesis, "Women were not appointed to be rulers in the church." He admits that the innovation may come sooner or later, but hopes he will not be here to see it. It was significant that Bishop Coadjutor Quinn favored the admission of the women to the council.

Chicago Disciples Rub Elbows with Russian Immigrants

The Brotherhood House of the Disciples in Chicago is located on Fourteenth street and is directed by Rev. Karl Borders. As the neighborhood is chiefly Russian, most of the people coming to the house are of that race. On a recent evening Mr. Borders arranged a dinner at the house which was attended by a considerable number of American Disciples and an equal number of the Russians. The idea was to get the two groups better acquainted. This social contact is the last word in Americanization. Americans have often been willing to patronize immigrant groups, but seldom have they been willing to eat with them. The Russians of Brotherhood House have a better view of American character now than they have ever had before while the American visitors are carrying back to the churches more accurate descriptions of the Russian in America. The Russian colony in Chicago is one of the most diverse of the immigrant groups. There are anarchists, socialists and those of quite orthodox political economy. Orthodoxy in economics has a tendency to go along with orthodoxy in religion.

Chicago Church Federation Has Child Welfare Meetings

A large part of the activity of the Chicago Church Federation is in connection with the public institutions which deal with juvenile delinquency. The annual assembly of the Federation will be held in the Association Auditorium on Feb. 21, afternoon and evening. Distinguished speakers have been secured for this meeting, including Miss Jane Addams, Miss Grace Abbott, Judge Victor P. Arnold, Rev. Theodore G. Soares, Rev. Ira W. Allen and Mr. Wilfred S. Reynolds. On the following Sunday there will be Federation meetings in many churches of the city, often arranged upon the group plan with some special speaker interpreting the work of the Federation.

Seminaries Popularize Their Work

Many of the theological seminaries are popularizing their work this year. The University of Chicago has Monday afternoon and evening courses for church workers which have commanded a considerable attendance through the year. These are taught by the professors of the seminary. Garrett Biblical Institute, connected with Northwestern University, has been sponsor for training courses in the high school building of Evanston at which the Bible, psychology, pedagogy and many other themes important to a Sunday-school teacher have been taught. Union Seminary in New York has shown similar zeal in popularizing its service. A course on Interdenominational Movements has been given by Professor William Adams Brown. Dr. Sidney L. Gulick will lecture during the spring on the subject of international relationships.

Lutherans Not Exclusive

The Lutherans did not make up their minds about the Interchurch World Movement until the collapse of the Movement but they have since passed upon the general position of the church toward other denominations. They hold that "Wherever the word of God is preached and the sacraments administered, the Holy Spirit works faith in Christ. In every such place therefore, there are believers in Jesus Christ, and wherever there are believers, there the one holy church is present."

Decrease of Reverence on Board Ships

The globe-trotter has less religion now than ever. An Episcopal clergyman writing under a pseudonym in the Southampton Times asserts that during the war the attendance at divine worship on board ship was above sixty per cent. Since the war it has continued to fall until it is now about fifteen per cent. The world travelers give themselves to drunkenness, gluttony, gambling and other vices according to the clergyman. He asserts the church is not to blame for this condition but rather the people who have been prospered until they have forgotten God.

Church Union Has Some Set-Backs

The task of the peacemaker has ever been a difficult one and the work of those leaders who pray for the union of the church of Christ does not make uniform progress. Just now there are some disagreeable facts concerning the cause of unity in Great Britain. Some time ago a group of highly influential ministers and laymen of the Wesleyan Methodist church met in London, and held a protest meeting against the proposed reunion of the Methodist forces of Great Britain. It is said that these opponents to a Methodist reunion favor the acceptance of the Lambeth proposals and a union with the state church under the generous provisions of the recent conference. The action of the Presbyterians in Australia has not been favorable to church union. Forty per cent are still in dissent while even in the Congregationalist fellowship twenty per cent are opposed to the union of Congregationalists, Presbyterians and Methodists. The lesson of the set-backs is the need for patience. The Christian union egg cannot be hatched in a day.

Oriental Women in the United States

We are familiar with the large number of oriental men who are studying in the educational institutions of the United States but it is not commonly known that large numbers of oriental women are here also. The Missionary Review of the World has gathered the facts on this subject. It says: "About two hundred girls from oriental countries are students in schools and colleges in the United States. Half of them are from China, and more than one-fourth from Japan, and the others are from India, Korea and the countries of the Near East. Many from China and a few from other countries are supported wholly, or in part by their governments. A few are supported by the mission boards of the schools from which they come."

Mormonism Strongly Entrenched

The Mormons now have a numerical strength of 450,000 members, most of whom are in the United States. Four great temples have been erected. One is in Utah, another in Alberta, another in Hawaii and a fourth is being completed in Arizona. The Mormons have swarmed into Idaho and there are now 80,000 of them in the southern part of the state. The attractive features of this religion in earlier days was polygamy, but in these later days, the binding tie is economic. The sugar-beet business is largely in the hands of the church, and some of the heads of this business have been charged with profiteering. The disintegrating force is the work of modern education. The church is now able to control the school system of Utah absolutely and many of the young people are now going to eastern universities. When they return they are never the same again in their attitude toward the church.

Business Men Form a Church Club

A group of men gathered at the City Club of Seattle on a recent Sunday morning at the call of one of the members, says the Churchman. They were challenged by their leader, Mr. Ben C. Holt, to perform their community duty to the churches of the city. The whole party then set out, and attended the service at the Episcopal Cathedral. A belated member asked at the City Club desk where the "crowd" was, as the club was almost deserted. The reply was, "They have gone to church." "Don't lie to me, I am a member here," responded the indignant member. But he later found that the report was true.

Methodist Church Block in Chicago

The Methodist church block in the loop district of Chicago will soon be a reality. The plans have been completed and the building committee is making arrangements to proceed with the demolition of the old building. Mr. George W. Dixon, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the First Methodist church, gives the following account of their plans in the Northwestern Christian Advocate: "The First Methodist church block will be one of the most commanding buildings in the city of Chicago and will stand on the most strategic site in the very heart of the city's restless life. It is diagonally across from the city hall and county building, and will be, in itself, at once a union of the commercial and the religious. Its position and structure will suggest the marriage of commerce and religion. It will be a twenty-one-story skyscraper, with large space for offices of every kind. Ample provision will be made in the most available, suitable sections of the building for the larger ministry of the church. Convenient Sunday school facilities, attractive social rooms and rooms for small church gatherings, combined with one of the most artistic, beautiful, and churchly auditoriums to be found anywhere in the land will make it a unique building in Christendom. The plans are developing rapidly. The old church for many years has been a source of income for the building of Methodist churches all over the city. One million dollars has been given out by the board of trustees for the erection of Methodist churches. This source of Methodist support must be guarded in the new structure. The trustees are fully conscious of their responsibility to the larger interest of Methodism and to the challenge of the kingdom in these great new days. The cost may run beyond the three million dollar mark."

Servian Bishop Now in the United States

Bishop Nicholai of the Servian Orthodox church is touring the United States in behalf of the Servian Child Welfare Association. He is one of the most eminent scholars of his communion. Taking his rise from a peasant community, he has had a thorough education, including studies at the Russian University at Kief and the University of Leipsic. He holds an honorary degree from the University of Glasgow. He is telling the story of the suffering of the Servians during the war, a story unmatched in pathos by any other, and collecting funds for the children of his native land.

Tribute to Emperor Stirs the Orthodox

An incident in connection with the World Sunday school convention has deeply stirred the orthodox. The emperor's picture was in the hall and all the delegates were asked to bow to the emperor. This was interpreted as worship by the conservatives. By the missionaries and those familiar with Japanese custom it was simply a courtesy. Courtesies to Buddhist workers were also misinterpreted. One of the missionaries of acknowledged leadership and power declares: "Without doubt I think it the biggest thing of a Christian sort that we have ever had in Japan."

Presbyterians Take in Money

The statistics are in for three-fourths of the current fiscal year of the Presbyterian church. The collections for that period were $309,000 better than for the same months of the year before. In addition to this there was a contribution of $363,000 to the Interchurch World Movement deficit. The Presbyterians are now working through their New Era Movement which budgets the work of the different societies together and the plan is working very successfully to increase the income of the church.

Issues Irenic Pamphlet for Jews

Large numbers of Jews are quite outside any religious faith at the present time and within a few years there has been a great renewal of efforts to bring the gospel to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The Hebrew Publication Society announces that it has prepared in Yiddish a pamphlet written by Rev. B. A. M. Shapiro entitled "The Similarity between the New Testament and the Talmud." A gift of three hundred dollars has enabled the society to issue ten thousand copies of the pamphlet for circulation among the Jews.

Wesley Foundation Building Will Be Dedicated

The Social Service Building of the Wesley Foundation at the University of Illinois will be dedicated by Bishop Nicholson on February 15. The building is so correct in its architecture that it recently won a commendation from Lorado Taft. A great number of notables will be present at the dedication, among them being a representation from Lincoln College, Oxford, where John Wesley was a student. One-fourth of the students of the university this year are Methodists, and this makes a group of 1,878 students for the Methodists to care for. The Foundation has been able to interest 1,100 of these students this year.

Trinity church is the University church, and its building has been so crowded this year that many Sundays the students could not get in. A quiet campaign is now going on to erect a new Trinity church building that will be adequate to the new responsibilities which have come to the church. The Centenary fund of the Methodist church has made it possible for Methodists to go forward with their plans while other denominations are still in the talking stage. The Disciples of Christ have a program which calls for $800,000, and a considerable part of this fund is raised, but it may be some years yet before they begin any building operations. It is significant to note that practically every religious denomination in the state has more students at the state university than it does in its own denominationally controlled institutions.

Garrett Men Engage in Evangelistic Work

The students of Garrett Biblical Institute, the Methodist Theological institution at Evanston, Ill., are organized this year for evangelistic work. Gospel teams will visit churches in the middle west. The teams receive no remuneration, but the churches visited pay transportation and other necessary expenses. The services of these young men is bringing new life to a number of churches which need just the rebirth of enthusiasm and consecration which these young men can give.

Chicago Presbyterians Try to Get Summer Camp

The Board of Church Extension of Chicago presbytery has for a considerable time been engaged in giving needy people an outing across the lake, and last year 2,000 people were given a week's outing. These people were scattered in many separate camps. The administration of the camps was in consequence very difficult. The Presbyterians are now negotiating for the purchase of Camp Gray near Saugatuck, Mich. This camp has been previously operated by the Forward Movement Association.

Popular Missouri Church is Over-Crowded

A traveling man visited Columbia, Mo., on a recent Sunday and although he went early, he found only one vacant seat in the Disciples church auditorium. This church recently called W. M. Haushalter to the pastorate and he is proving very popular with the students of the state university. The Disciples there have a beautiful stone building that is architecturally correct, but they will have to enlarge it this coming year to accommodate the crowds. It is said that twenty-five hundred people attend this church every Sunday.

Great Song Leader Recovering from Illness

Professor E. O. Excell, the well-known song writer and music publisher, has been ill during recent weeks in the Wesley Memorial hospital. He so far recovered within the past week that he was able to sing in the chapel service of the hospital. He was accompanied by Professor Charles H. Gabriel. His choice of song was "When I Go Home."

American Minister Will Return from England

Rev. Leslie W. Morgan is a Disciples minister of America who for the past twenty-one years has been residing in England. He maintained American citizenship until the war, when, disappointed at the delay in American participation, he took out his papers as a British citizen. He served for many years as pastor of the Disciples church at Hornsey, North London, but for three years has been in the service of the Y. M. C. A. He has not been in America for many years, but will return this coming year. He is a graduate of Drake University, of Des Moines.

Kansas City Minister Goes Into Service of Near East

Rev. Joseph Myers, pastor of Budd Park Christian church of Kansas City, resigned his pulpit recently to take charge of the Near East Relief work in western Missouri. He has made application to go to Armenia, and may be assigned to service across seas. He is under contract to lecture with the Redpath Chautauqua during this coming summer.

Pan-Presbyterianism Is a Growing Idea

World organizations of the various denominations are coming as a result of the demand for a more catholic fellowship in the church of Christ. The Presbyterians have created the Alliance of Reformed Churches, which is made up of churches which have the reformed faith and the presbyterian system of church government. The Council of this organization will meet in Pittsburgh next September. Some denominations are making application for membership in the Alliance, and their qualifications for this fellowship will be the subject of a quite lively debate at the coming meeting.

Friends Reap Harvest of Good-Will

The Quakers have used the war situation for a powerful testimony to their faith. They have proven that their attitude is no mere negative one of refusing to fight. They have agents all over central Europe distributing relief funds, and no philanthropic work in the world is better administered. This service has turned the hearts of many to Quakerism.

Tells Facts About Missionary Colleges

There was a real sensation in the meeting of the Foreign Missions Council in New York recently when Professor Paul Monroe, of Teachers' College, New York, made the statement that the missionary colleges of Japan got only the second-rate students. He said unless improvements were made in the Christian schools in China, precisely the same thing would be true there. A Committee of Reference and Council has been appointed to visit the Christian schools of China. It is expected that this committee will bring back an exhaustive report on the situation.

Roman Catholics Have Ambitious Plan for China

In proportion to their numbers and wealth the Roman Catholics have not been as generous to missions as their Protestant neighbors. The dream of a Catholic church that unites all the world has but little foundation unless a church is missionary. It is evident that Roman Catholic leaders see this, for recently the plan has developed of raising ten million dollars in the United States and ten thousand missionaries with which to carry out a twenty-year program in China. This money would send out not only priests, but doctors, trained nurses and teachers in the Protestant fashion. Even though the old mother church never changes she has shown an astonishing ability in recent years to learn a lot of things from Protestantism.

Large Prayermeeting in Los Angeles

Immanuel Presbyterian church of Los Angeles has adopted the method of a church dinner every Wednesday evening to increase the attendance at prayermeeting. From three hundred to four hundred and fifty people gather every Wednesday evening. Part of the evening is given to social intercourse and a part to an open forum. After that comes the devotional meeting to which practically all stay. This is believed to be one of the very largest meetings in the country.

Chicago Church Fifty Years Old

The leading Presbyterian church of Chicago is Fourth church, located in the heart of the "Gold Coast," the aristocratic district of the city. The church has about rounded out fifty years of history and the anniversary will be celebrated on Feb. 11. The speakers will be Dr. John Timothy Stone, the pastor; President McClure of McCormick Theological Seminary; and Dr. Gunsaulus.

Quiet Talks in Oldest Methodist Church

John Street Methodist church of New York is the oldest Methodist church in this country. S. D. Gordon, whose "Quiet Talks" have edified an ever wider circle during the past generation will speak in this church every noon for eight weeks. The meetings will last just forty-five minutes each day. As the Lenten period is on, he hopes to make the series have evangelistic value.

Ministers Want Greek in the High Schools

While in some cities there is a protest that the high schools teach nothing of practical value to the pupils, in Pittsburgh, Pa., the Presbyterian ministers insist that the practical disciplines have been given too much advantage. It was found by these ministers that not a single high school pupil in the city was studying Greek. Dr. James A. Kelso of Western Seminary in addressing the ministers recently told of a high school in Cincinnati which had revived the study of the classics, and it had become one of the most popular schools of the city. The classical studies were thought to be a better preparation for religious work than the more severely practical ones.

Well-Known Preacher Ill

Dr. E. L. Powell has been for many years the pastor of First Christian church of Louisville, Ky. His pulpit in that city has formed the public conscience on many questions, and his pen has extended his influence among people who have never known his face. He went to a hospital recently where he underwent a severe surgical operation. At the present writing he is seriously ill, but it is believed that he will recover.

Long Beach Citizens Help Church

Just as the new Disciples church building was nearing completion at Long Beach, Cal., the structure gave way and the building was almost a total loss. The blow was a very heavy one to the congregation but the men's class canvassed the community recently and more than two thousand citizens of Long Beach outside the church contributed to the rebuilding project a total of $35,000. The church is not daunted by its heavy loss, but will carry its enterprise on to victory.

Divisive Theological Movements

The conservative mind among the Disciples is greatly troubled by the advance of liberality and union sentiment in the organization. This has resulted in the organization of various national and state "congresses" and in the creation of a national evangelistic agency which invades the different states and carries on work without conference with the regularly organized church organizations. Recently the city of Indianapolis gave birth to the "Central Indiana Christian Institute." This organization proposes to disseminate "primitive Christianity" in central Indiana where most of the churches and ministers are supposed to have aposticized. The Christian Restoration Society has been organized to teach the young people that salvation is of the Disciples. Meanwhile the great body of Disciples moves steadily forward toward greater brotherliness and better understanding of essential Christianity.

Pleads for More Cordial Relation to Newspapers

Rev. W. H. Cawardine, religious editor of the Chicago Herald and Examiner, asserts that ministers are unfair in their treatment of newspapers. They point out the faults of the papers without ever commending their virtues. This view is also supported by Rev. J. T. Bradner Smith, of the publicity department of the Committee on Conservation and Advancement of the Methodist Church. Mr. Smith says: "Criticism of the newspapers, unless it is just, is harmful and there should be cordial relationship and cooperation between the pulpit and the press. Both, if conscientious, are striving for the uplift and betterment of humanity. They may do it in different ways, but their motive and objective is the elevation of human society. Every preacher should know something about journalism, especially the conduct of the great daily newspapers. Preachers should be taught the elements of journalism. Too many preachers are fond of, and seek public notoriety. The clergy should have cordial relations with the editors and there should be personal contact. Every clergyman should know the editors of the city or country papers in the town in which he lives."

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HYMNAL EVER PRODUCED BY THE AMERICAN CHURCH

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

FOR THE USE OF CHURCHES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

CONTAINS all the great hymns which have become fixed in the affections of the Church and adds thereto three distinctive features:

Hymns of Christian Unity
Hymns of Social Service
Hymns of the Inner Life

These three features give HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH a modernness of character and a vitality not found in any other book. This hymnal is alive!

It sings the very same gospel that is being preached in modern evangelical pulpits

Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is open. They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make a perfect hymnal.

What and Where Is God?

A Human Answer to the Deep
Religious Cry of the Modern Soul

By

Richard LaRue Swain, Ph. D.

Charles Clayton Morrison,

Editor The Christian Century, says:

"I could wish that every uncertain and troubled mind might know that there is such a book as this. It makes God intelligible to men of modern world view. It shows how science prepares the way for a far better, more vital, more spiritual, more personal God than was possible under the older forms of thinking. The author is one of those psychologists—and alas! all too few is their number—who have gone into the technique of psychology and thought their way through it into real life again. He speaks with authority. His book will have the approval of technical scholarship, but it is intended for the lay mind. I know that if any person reads the book on my recommendation he will divide with me a small portion of the enthusiastic gratitude which he will surely feel toward the author. In my judgment it is far and away the most important book on religion that is appearing this year."

Douglas C. MacIntosh,

Professor of Theology in Yale University, says:

"What and Where is God? draws a clearly defined picture of God, man, and the universe to take the place of the fading picture that is becoming such a menace to religious faith. Dr. Swain has produced what will undoubtedly prove to be one of the most notable religious books of the year. It contains descriptions of religious experiences which rival in interest anything to be found in William James's 'Varieties of Religious Experience' or Harold Begbie's 'Twice-born Men.' But its most valuable feature is its simple, vivid, original, and attractive presentation of the most important elements of modern constructive thought. A better book to put into the hands of the religiously perplexed and doubting has not been written for many a day. It is a book that will live."

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By Albert Parker Fitch

"Can the church survive in the changing order?" It is a real question. We have a way of supposing that she cannot perish, but there is no such a thing as permanency of this sort in the social structure.

The question is not only real, it is grave, important. At few other times in man's mental and moral history has he more needed the guiding and steadying leadership of a strong religious organization than now.

Can the church survive in the changing order? Well, the answer will depend upon the extent and character of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reinterpreting historical movements so as to make them unhistorically acceptable; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations of Every Major Text and Dominant Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITORS DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by glean- ing from the master theologians and preachers of the past half century the best exposition on every major text and dominant passage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical usefulness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard-worked pastor will find much gold here for his minting days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

The Outline of History

A Plain History of Life
and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Ernest Baker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Prof. Gilbert Murray. Illustrated by J. F. Horrabin.

HERE is history from the beginning of life on our earth so far as we can trace it by paleolithic records, through the civilizing and decivilizing ages down to yesterday. And much of it is history from the standpoint of common sense. We would hold this view even after you pointed out that Mr. Wells does irreparable damage to many an ancient convention and orthodox tradition. He trains his guns fearlessly on superstition, on corrupting tradition, on historical malpractice.

The author's conclusions stimulate thought. He is an optimist. He sees a new sanity emerging from the hatreds of the war. He looks for a revision of ideas and institutions and the development of a citizenship of the world, with the breakdown of nationalism. Religion to his mind has been obscured by creeds—"the old political and social assumptions, the old religious formulas have lost their conviction." But he expects the future to bring a brotherhood of men rather than of nations, wider education and a religion apart from forms and creeds. Man is to become happier and more contented on earth. He does not seem to fear that, judging by the rate we are going, the old ball may become cold before we achieve that ideal.

This will be the big book of the season. Every thinking citizen of these pregnant times should have it.

Religion and Business

By Roger W. Babson

MR. BABSON is known as President of the Babson Statistical Organization, and as an expert in the science of business. But he is also a sturdy believer in the possibilities of the church. Here is the closing paragraph of his book:

"It is not the purpose of this book to suggest details of a plan for redeeming the world, but rather to emphasize the fact that the world can be redeemed socially, industrially only through religion. Governments may succeed in protecting men in freedom of effort and rights of ownership; but only religion can energize men unto a maximum of useful service and make them content with a simple material reward."

Many Creeds—One Faith

THE confusion of the present time has for many persons but little of cheer. To them modern life is inspired by a spirit of selfishness and hatred that can lead only to chaos. Deeper-seeing minds can detect beneath this unprecedented confusion the tidal heart-beat of a new democracy whose ruling motive is the spirit of brotherhood.

The prophets and poets have usually looked forward in confident hope of this event. The hymn-writers have almost invariably done so. Even when theologians, with their creeds, have divided humanity into groups, the world's great singers have persistently sounded the unifying note of love and fellowship. There is no feature of the new hymnal—

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLETT

which has stirred so much comment as the spirit of Christian brotherhood which prevails throughout the book. Note the following extract from the preface:

"The editors regard as of greatest significance their discovery through these hymns of a spiritually united Church. Many creeds seem to melt together in the great hymns of Christian experience. A true Christian hymn cannot be sectarian. It belongs to all Christ's disciples. From many sources, far separated ecclesiastically, there comes one voice of common praise and devotion. It is from this perception of a united Church existing underneath the denominational order, a Church united in praise, in aspiration and in experience, and expressing its unity in these glorious hymns, that the title which this book bears was first suggested. Hymns of many creeds are here, interpreting, however, but one faith. It is our hope that wherever these hymns are sung the spirit of unity may be deepened and Christians be drawn more closely together as they draw near to their common Father in united worship."

This great hymnal is preeminently fitted for use in churches where there is an aspiration for real fellowship and cooperation among the followers of the Master

The Sword or the Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

THE WAR which was to end war has left the world with more fighting and more expenditures for armaments than before it started. The Assembly of the League of Nations is unable to adopt even the slightest practical step in disarmament. Naval authorities now tell us that the submarine is essential and military authorities proclaim that poison gas is humane. New and more deadly conflicts have swung within our horizon. That this nation may become involved in war in any one of three different directions is more of a possibility than it was in 1914. Yet the one American social worker who has assessed the human costs of the recent struggle soberly declares, after he has footed the totals, that war is the negation of civilization."

Thus writes Prof. Harry F. Ward in his introductory word for this new book. "What?" he then asks, "is to be the Christian teaching concerning war? Is it going to declare judgment on the basis of the principles set forth in the gospels or will it be only the expedient servant of nationalism and continue to exhort its followers to internecine slaughter? Is the American pulpit going to continue denouncing war in general and supporting wars in particular? This question must be fairly faced and answered, one way or the other. And time presses. Mr. Page has faced the issue and has found an answer that satisfies his soul. What he has written, therefore, deserves the thoughtful consideration of all those whose duty it is to teach the people concerning the moral and spiritual validity of modern war."

Mr. Page, associated for years with Mr. Sherwood Eddy, has come close to the stupendous—and unpleasant—facts that must be faced in modern Europe. He holds that "all indications point to further wars between nations." "It is utterly impossible," he says, "to predict the course of events during the lifetime of the present generation. It may be that we shall witness scenes surpassing in horror even those of the recent war."

But Mr. Page is still an optimist—if he can believe that the Church will take itself seriously in its gospel of the Cross as the only weapon effective in bringing about real brotherhood and abiding peace.

Every minister, every thoughtful layman, every alert citizen of the United States should read this book.

A Lenten Prayer—For a Revisioning of Christ

TAKE us up to the radiant mount, O Father, that we may see our Lord in his true character. As we walk with him in valley and field, our eyes are holden. We do not discern the imperial grace and authority with which Thou hast clothed him. The charm of his companionship we feel, and the comfort of his healing touch upon our hearts. But we have not yet fully given over our will and our destiny into his hand and keeping. We hear his voice, but we do not hear him. We are drawn to his side, but we do not obey him. We worship his name and his memory, but our faith falters when he bids us follow him in the great adventure of the cross.

Lift from our eyes, O Father, the veil of illusion which keeps us imagining that we are Christ's disciples though we do not the things that he says, nor trust the invisible forces into whose keeping he committed his life. May we see him transfigured as we tarry with him in the mount. Above the noise of our selfish strife, above the harsh clangor of the market place, above the roar and shriek of our battlefields and the anguished cry of our millions left orphaned and hungry by man's inhumanity, may we hear the voice of Christ calling us to the untried way of love, of brotherhood, of fellowship, yea, and of sacrifice, as the way of happiness and progress.

May Thy church hear Thee, Lord Jesus, in this day of her humiliation. Wavering of purpose, but penitent, we her children confess with grief her failure to guide the state in love and to mould a social order according to the laws of the Kingdom of God. Give the church Thy word of authority to speak to a world still enthralled by its age-old lusts and hates and foolish rivalries. Open her eyes to see in Thee, her Lord and Head, the only solution of the problems that vex and grieve mankind. We wait for Thy word. Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth. Amen.

Honoring Lincoln in Dixie

LINCOLN'S birthday has again passed with but scant recognition in the states south of the one-time Mason and Dixon's line. It was said of Robert E. Lee after the war that if he was called a traitor the world would be made respectable. Is not Lincoln now above all sectional lines and should not his memory be revered without trace of sectional bias? The South which now accepts the abolition of slavery as a boon both to itself and humanity would honor itself by linking the name of Lincoln with that of Washington as its foremost national heroes. The memory of George Washington is now honored in Great Britain far above that of anyone who opposed him. Progressive Englishmen say, "When Washington won your independence he won ours too." So too the South can say that when Lincoln emancipated the slaves he emancipated the South also. Had he lived through the reconstruction days there would have been no carpet-bag rule and there would have been, so far as he could have won it, an application of the loftiest Christian principles of reconciliation and brotherly love. In every land that now seeks republican government after the downfall of kings in the late war the name of Lincoln is the name to conjure by. Lincoln has long been the hero of democrats in all European lands from Russia to England, and the young democracy of China lips his name in adoration. His statue is found in every new republic and he has become a symbol of democracy and the common people's cause. More books and major papers have been written about him than about any other personality in history excepting only the Saviour of mankind. Next to Christ's his name is the most honored and adored in the world today. The South will honor itself when it comes to honor him in every school house and to consent to making his birthday a national holiday as is that of Washington.

Religion in the White House

THE White House will be divided in religion once more as it was in the days of Mr. Roosevelt, but these divisions are never serious. President Harding will attend a Baptist church, while Mrs. Harding will seek a conventicle of the Methodist faith. They will often go together to the same church. We cannot believe that their recent professions of interest in the prayer-life and in Bible-reading are press-agenting. The record of their life is all consistent with the stories we read. If they have never delved much into the modern problems of religion, they are thoroughly convinced of the worth of the church of Jesus Christ. By the side of the President will sit as private secretary a young Presbyterian who is also an ardent church worker. The religion of Mr. Harding has had much to do with the problem of the individual soul, for that is the kind of religion our Protestant evangelicalism is. But the President faces now national and international problems where religion must be interpreted in social terms if it is to be effective. What should a Christian ruler do about armaments? Christians are divided on this in every city. What should a Christian President do in the face of threatening labor troubles? The problem is yet to be solved in a Christian fashion. No man since Lincoln has ever faced more urgent duties. Many have thought the new President is not big enough for the new duties. They said that of Lincoln. Carrying his religion to the White House, the great Emancipator sought to solve every problem that arose in a Christian way. Prayers should arise in all the churches that our new President may in like manner carry to the White House his religious ideals. His reassertion of them at this time is distinctly encouraging.

Knights of Columbus and Y. M. C. A.

THE big war drive left a number of welfare organizations with enormous funds of money on hand at the time of the armistice. The disbursement of the money since then shows the fitness of these organizations to meet new situations. The Y. M. C. A. has continued its service with the soldiers who are still in Germany, and has followed the other men home again. Still possessed of funds, large amounts have been given as grants to men who would take up some form of special vocational training. There are college men this winter that are being aided in their college work to the extent of fifty or a hundred dollars. The money was raised for the boys. It has been faithfully spent on them, even if it could not be spent in France as was originally intended. On the other hand the Knights of Columbus had a large sum of money left on their hands. The organization is largely controlled by the hierarchy. Under the guidance of the priestly counsels, a plan was drawn up to build in Washington, D. C., a memorial building for the use of the American Legion. This clever plan would have definitely allied the Legion to a religious sect. It would have provided Washington with one more fine building to be shown to tourists as an achievement of the Roman church. Money raised for the common needs of soldiers would thus have been made to do duty in the work of religious propaganda. Although the American Legion greatly needs a headquarters building, it is to the credit of the organization that it did not accept the offer of the Knights of Columbus. Meanwhile the Knights of Columbus have on hand several million dollars which they do not seem to know how to spend. They cannot do any better than the Y. M. C. A. has done. They should put their money into vocational and cultural training for the soldiers, making no exceptions among men on account of race or creed. By this means they will keep faith with the great public that contributed impartially, not to a fund for Catholic propaganda, but to a fund for the young men of America.

Libel of Religious Organizations

A BILL is pending in the legislature of Pennsylvania providing that libel against a religious organization shall be punishable in a court of law whether this libel is committed by printing, signs, pictures or other means. It has been suggested that the Roman Catholic church is behind the bill and for that reason certain Protestant influences will oppose it. Probably neither Catholics nor Protestants are considering the fundamental issue in this bill. Roman Catholics have unquestionably suffered at the hands of professional libelers. Whenever a Roman priest has been bad, it has been heralded to the whole country by anti-Roman papers. If a Catholic institution developed abuses, this is likewise the stock in trade of the professional Catholic-roasters. Were all bad Protestant ministers and all unsuccessful Protestant institutions written up, there would be grist for another kind of paper, for a little while at least. Meanwhile the aloofness and anti-social attitude of many Roman Catholic priests subjects them to continual misunderstanding. Most of them are really likeable persons who hold the loyalty of their people through real merit. If they would eat with Protestant ministers once in awhile, they would make the work of the professional libeler quite impossible. Meanwhile we have had enough of the limitation of the freedom of the press. There is no reason why the church should not be criticized quite in the same way as any other institution. If the criticism is unfair, the remedy is clear. Let the loyal churchman reply, arraying his facts. In the long run unfair criticism of the church will be corrected in a free press. On the other hand suppression and threats of libel suits under restrictive laws would leave the public with a permanent impression that something was rotten in Denmark that might not be spoken of openly. Right-minded citizens will want fair treatment for the church, but not preferential treatment.

Students Want to Know About God

A GROUP of Chinese students of the University of Chicago have sent out a questionnaire to a mailing list of a thousand men asking these men whether they believe in God, and what they believe about him, and why. When the responses come in, these oriental visitors will be in possession of certain facts about occidental attitudes toward religion which few of us have in our possession. Their inquiries are very timely just now in view of some contemporaneous books. The past century was chiefly concerned about the person of Jesus. The center of theological gravity has shifted to the study of God. The old apologetic which proved God by arguments from design, miracle and prophecy have been greatly damaged by modern criticism. There is need of a new apologetic, at which some attempts have already been made by Bruce, Clarke and Garvie. The wide-spread differences with regard to God indicate the need of some fundamental thinking. Christian Science holds to an impersonal principle as God. The premillennialist believes in an Old Testament monarchical God. The new theology advocates stress the Fatherhood of God. H. G. Wells, representing in popular literature the pragmatist view, talks about "a human God." In Roman Catholicism and in orthodox Protestantism there is not much talk about God beyond the assertion that he is. He has been overshadowed by the saints in the one case, and by Jesus in the other. Certain secularists are still interested in relegating the idea of God to the limbo of the past. The religious world is nowhere more at sea than in its thinking about God. On what ground can the idea of God be held? Can he be proved like a theorem in geometry, or must we always hold to God as a hypothesis until we prove him in experience? On such questions as these the religious world would likely divide.

The Lord's Day and Commercialized Recreation

NOW that the Lord's Day Alliance disclaims any purpose of promoting any so-called "blue laws" relating to the Christian Lord's Day, one wonders how the clamor arose which has been heard all over the country. Usually in these days of press-agenting, there is something behind such national campaigns of publicity. It is not always possible to trace pro-German propaganda to the door of the Kaiser, for many a red herring is drawn across the trail. Neither is it possible to complete the evidence which traces this national movement of publicity to the door of the promoters of commercialized recreation. There are many, however, who are willing to believe that much of the noise that has been made is a barrage preparing for the moving picture assault upon states where theatres are barred out on Sunday. As is well known, the moving picture film corporations are largely in the hands of wealthy Jews in New York. These gentlemen could hardly be expected to be defenders of the Christian Lord's Day since they are not even good Jews any more, in matters of religion. They have long since forsaken the prophets for profits. Dividends on the capital stock is the urgent thing. There are many states in the union where the shows cannot be given on Sunday. Among these are Pennsylvania, New York and Indiana. In many other states, commercialized recreation is regulated by local ordinances and in many cities the Sunday movies are barred out by local action. The movie theater is a dead investment on Sunday. Most of the labor in these theaters could be commandeered for a seven day week and the same rent and the same labor cost would bring the additional profits of an extra day if the laws were amended. It sounds liberal to some citizens to be in favor of an open Sunday. When it is known, however, that the chief consideration is not human welfare but dividends, liberal-minded men will not be in a hurry to amend our present Sunday laws.

The Churches and Charity

ONE city in America, Toledo, O., has already established the soup kitchen to help during the general unemployment. During the war when every man in America was employed if he really wanted to work, the charity activities of the churches dwindled to nearly nothing. Even such organizations as the Salvation Army and the rescue missions of the great cities were compelled to modify greatly the methods which were employed. Once more the ministers are facing the requests of men who want breakfast, or the price of a ticket to a distant city. The hazard of unemployment is that many men will find how easy it is to live by mendicancy, and not look for an honest job again. The churches and the ministers have done more to make professional beggars than any other institution in America. The literal application of the Tolstoian rule means giving to every man that asks some material thing. The church should give to every man that asks, but to the dishonest man seeking an easy living it should give a thrust in the direction of self-support and honesty. In Evanston, Illinois, the problem of mendicacy grew to such proportions before the war that the Social Service League was organized. The church people bought books of meal and lodging tickets. No money was ever given to strangers, but the tickets were issued. In this way, the professional beggar must continually come back again to the same place. If he really wanted to work, he was set to sorting paper, fixing old shoes, repairing discarded furniture or some other job that he was fit for. From this labor he secured a small compensation until he could find better paying employment. In a year a community that had been infested with tramps from all over the middle west was largely cleaned up. Only honest people really in trouble ever applied. The church in this time of unemployment should never refuse to hear any man's story and investigate it. It should never refuse aid, whether it be physical or spiritual, that is most needed. But it should by no means fall into the easy method of indiscriminate charity which still commands a good deal of public approbation, but which is a socially dangerous policy.

Christian Unity and History

LESS fruitful than any other portion of the finely conceived program at the recent St. Louis Conference on Christian Unity was that session in which representatives of nine denominations addressed the assembly on the subject, "What does my denomination mean by 'the church' and 'Christian unity?'" This session was the one disappointment of the three days' discussion. Looked at in advance, it presented a greater attractiveness and seemed to offer more possibilities of fruitful outcome than any other portion of the unique program. Its actual result was nil. So uninspiring were the contributions of the nine peers selected from as many Christian denominations that not a single reference was made in subsequent discussions to the statements in which the several denominational points of view were set forth. A motion was made to submit the nine documents to a committee with instructions to analyze them for comparative study under certain topical categories, the analysis to be presented for discussion at a later session. So little impression had been made by the documents themselves that the chairman could not decide from the listless vote what the desire of the assembly was.

A similar impression is derived from a perusal of the report of the Geneva Conference on Faith and Order, held last summer. The stenographic minutes of that significant conference have recently been sent out. The work is well done, and the reader of these minutes finishes with a feeling that he was almost personally present at Geneva, actually seeing and hearing the things with which the report so vividly deals. But one cannot avoid a certain sense of the futility of much of the discussion, and particularly that portion of the discussion in which the various denominational groups undertook, as they did at St. Louis, to state their peculiar denominational position on the matter of church unity. Even from the printed pages one can sense an inhibited yawn which only the extraordinary courtesies of the situation kept from finding overt expression. One lays the report aside with the feeling that the business of promoting Christian unity is hard work, requiring endurance and patience of a high order, and that those very estimable churchmen who made the journey to Geneva should by no means be objects of our envy because of their holiday, but should, on the contrary, be paid a substantial salary for their willingness to do a job which most of us would tire at.

The fact is that one could hardly imagine oneself condemned to a day's boredom more dull and unrelieved than to be compelled to listen to a setting forth of the differences among the Protestant sects. These differences have not the faintest spark of vitality for men and women accustomed to realistic thinking. They belong to an age that is dead. A man of our generation has to break his mental adjustment with concrete reality and set up an adjustment with the pale and remote controversies of history before he can even follow these denominational apologetics. He has the feeling of turning his mind inside out, which is more difficult than to turn a glove inside out. And when he returns from the discussion to his every-day, realistic, Christian task he can hardly avoid a sense of the sterility and unprofitableness of the denominational way of approach to the problem of unity.

Considerations of this sort lie at the basis of most of the skepticism with which the efforts of the Anglican and American Episcopal communions toward union are regarded. The whole enterprise of unity seems to be conceived in purely historical terms. Those delegates at Geneva who represented some of our younger Protestant denominations come back to testify as with one voice of the extraordinary emotion with which they discovered that there was such a thing as history! They were enormously impressed with the august claims of those bodies whose doctrines and orders extended into the dim past. The historic creeds, the historic ritual, the historic orders, the historic mood itself,—all this profoundly affected the thought processes of the delegates.

This result is always inevitable when the problem of unity is defined at the outset in historical terms. And this is what happens wherever a Christian unity gathering is dominated by the typical Episcopal influence. The basis on which Episcopal procedure rests is the assumption that each Christian communion possesses in itself some distinctive element or elements which it can contribute to the enrichment of the united church. Hence the favorite formula devised by an Episcopal bishop in 1910, at about the time the American Episcopal church issued its first call for a world conference: "Unity not on minimums but on maximums; not by compromise but by comprehension." This formula has become the common property of all advocates of Christian unity since that day. It is repeated with approval by the most congregational-minded of men whose historic denominational upbringing is of a character the very antithesis of the communion whose churchmanship has produced the formula. Its implications are thoroughly historical, and its acceptance as a platitude determines at once that the problem of unity must be defined in historical terms and that the pathway to unity will be discovered, if at all, by looking backward. In order to understand what the distinctive contribution of each sect may be, one must, so it is assumed, go back to the origin of each sect and retrace its history to the present time.

This overemphasis on the historical creates a burden which the cause of Christian unity ought not be compelled to bear. Unless the minds of church union advocates are emancipated from it their enterprise will be vitiated beyond repair. Its assumptions are fallacious, and its results sterile. We must remember that the causes out of which the movement for Christian unity springs are not historical but contemporary causes. The desire for unity is a modern passion. The demand for it arises out of certain conditions which did not exist, or were not perceived to exist, until our own day and generation. The hope of unity is based upon the partly conscious, partly unconscious, sense that we have passed away from the old distinctions and that those distinctions no longer apply.

In a word, we are all aware, some vividly, some vaguely—all except the ecclesiastical tinkerers and engineers—that we have passed into a new dispensation, a new world of thought and value, and that our problem is nothing less than to create fresh and vital categories for our faith, a new and richer organism for our fellowship, novel and workable instruments for our common labors, and noble and meaningful modes for our worship. We are in a creative dispensation. All things are becoming new. The mood of the time simply will not allow us patiently to re-thread the labyrinthine ways of ecclesiastical history in the hope of finding Christian unity. The solution of our problem is not there. We assert this, not because we scorn history, but because we know history. It is because we of this generation have mastered history that we refuse now to be its slave. It is history herself that has freed us from the futilities of the past and has ushered us into the presence of those creative forces that are symbolized by our modern knowledge of society, of the human personality and of the universe itself.

This is no philistine or nihilistic attitude toward the past. It is no foolish iconoclasm toward ancient institutions. It is the very contrary of all such destructive and blind revolutionism. It would keep the past. It would not let "one accent of the Holy Ghost" be lost. It would break no single thread or filament of continuity. It would venerate the past, but it would not be smothered by it. Its creative activity would be in large part an interpretative activity. It would translate ancient creeds and institutions into modern terms before it began a discussion of them as a basis of union. It would ask, not, What did the Fathers think the church was? or, What did our denominational founders think of the church? but, What as a matter of fact do we of today know the church to be? This way of asking our question makes all the difference in the world in our discussions and our conferences. For a great ideal has come upon the horizon which the fathers did not descry as we have descried it, and it is coloring and determining all our thinking about the church.

That ideal is the Kingdom of God as conceived by Jesus. The church is the instrument of the Kingdom of God. It is a social, human, objective institution, definable sociologically, just as the family and the state are definable. It is here for definable purposes, and its structural elements and activities must submit to the functional tests with which we measure every social institution. It is out of this conception of the church that the movement for Christian unity has chiefly arisen. It is back to this basis that the discussion must be carried. In carrying the discussion back to this basic conception of the church we need have no fear that we shall be sacrificing those venerable and inspiring categories of a visible and an invisible church, of a mystical body of Christ, or of a spiritual institution against which the gates of hell shall not prevail. All these historic ideals are implicit in the social ideal, but the social ideal is a basis of fruitful conference and discussion in terms in which men of today actually are thinking, while the historic ecclesiastical categories lead to endless disputation when they are taken as the point of departure in discussion.

History—and this is the gist of the matter—has failed to give us unity. Why bother her further? Why seek the living among the dead? Unity is a present, urgent duty. Why wait until ecclesiastical conferences allow us to practice it? Why not let the dead past bury its own dead, while we rise up and follow Christ?

Aspects of Mormonism

Editorial Correspondence

ONE of the curious phenomena of American religious life is the presence in one rather large area of the national territory of a compact body of people numbering well on toward a million, and known as the Latter Day Saints, or more popularly, as Mormons. The latter name is derived from one of the characters in the book which by an interesting series of events became associated with the early history of the movement, and gave it its popular name. The Mormons now constitute the controlling element in the population of Utah, and are almost equally dominant in southern Idaho. In entering that region from any direction one finds himself in a different sort of world. And it is this difference which constitutes an interesting study for the observer of the various communities in the republic.

It is the combination of religious and economic elements that makes the Mormon group a subject of interest to the student of society, and a baffling form of organization to all of the non-Mormon population of those localities. From their first leader, Joseph Smith, they derived the tradition of a revelation of his appointment as the apostle of a new dispensation of the grace of God. Along with this came the story of certain metal plates alleged to have been found by him, and translated by the aid of a divine messenger, who plays an important part in the angelology of the saints. This book is the asserted original of the Book of Mormon, and whatever its origin, it constitutes one of the classics of the community. Along with it the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are held to be inspired and authoritative.

The preaching of Joseph Smith and his associates attracted attention in the state of New York by its acceptance of a rather simple type of New Testament religion. But the growing association of the Old Testament doctrine of plural marriage with the practice of the group led to increasing friction with the people of their neighborhoods, ultimately to their removal, first to Illinois, where in a riot Smith was killed, then to Missouri, and ultimately to Utah. There in a valley where they thought themselves secure from outside intrusion, they laid out the city that was to realize for them, under their new leader, Brigham Young, all the hopes of the first prophet.

Today they are a very strong body, compact, organized, and economically efficient. They have made of Utah a region of beauty and fruitfulness. Salt Lake City, Ogden, Provo, Logan, and other towns are prosperous and attractive. The great mass of Mormons are farmers. The church is a great commercial organization, with a masterful control of all the details of the life of the community. The type of religious thought is primitive and patriarchal. It is not strange that plural marriage, which was the practice of the patriarchs, should seem natural and permissible in a people who accept the Old Testament and the legends of the Book of Mormon as of equal inspiration and authority with the New Testament. It is the claim that as law abiding citizens, living in a land whose laws forbid polygamy, they have abandoned the practice. As to the fact, there are various opinions among the non-Mormon residents of Utah. There can be no doubt, however, on the part of an observing visitor that the practice would be thought quite proper by the saints if there was not the unfortunate intrusion of Gentile prejudice against it.

But in all fairness it must be affirmed that plural marriage plays but a small part in either the theory or practice of the Mormon community, if indeed it is at all implicit in their program. It is in other directions that their outstanding characteristics are to be found. Their organization is a marvel of precision and control. Their system of church government, consisting of a presidency, an apostolate, a bishopric and a superintendency or counselling, runs down from the head of the church to the remotest congregation and individual with an effectiveness which, in spite of the claim of entire democracy, amounts to a benevolent despotism. The entire territory of Mormon residence throughout the regions of Utah and Idaho is divided into "stakes" or districts, and these again into "wards," which correspond roughly to city blocks. The blocks of the Mormon cities were laid out ten acres square, and were originally intended to include ample garden space for each home. That makes the squares large, the streets far apart, and the blocks long. The mountain springs furnish abundant water, which flows down the curbs of all the streets, keeping them clean throughout the year.

Over each one of these wards there is an official of the church, who is responsible for the people (the Mormons) in his parish. Each ward is supposed to have its own place of worship, and the services in all are of the same character. In the central square of Salt Lake City there are the temple, where the official acts of marriage and consecration are performed, the tabernacle, which is the great audience room for popular assemblies, the chapel for smaller groups, and the museum for the exhibition of Mormon and other historic relics. The business office of the church is a block away, beyond the Utah Hotel, the leading hostelry of the city, which, like most of the business enterprises of the metropolis, is operated by Mormon capital.

It is the coherence and commercial sagacity of the Mormon institution which gives it its power. There are no loose ends in the management. It deals with its people as one group, who can be directed by church authority to any common purpose. It is a profitable thing to be a member of the ecclesiastical community and be able to take advantage of its favor and partiality. This is a lure which many Gentiles have found it difficult to resist, and to which not a few have yielded. They find nothing particularly objectionable in the Mormon religion, and the business advantages are persuasive.

Another element of strength in the system is its missionary propaganda. It is the practice of the officials of every stake and ward to supply to the higher administrators of the church the names of promising young men who are thereupon urged to go out as representatives of the cult into all parts of the nation and beyond the seas. These young men, to the number nominally of two thousand, but actually a much smaller number, go at their own expense, and remain in their appointed field for two years, more or less, going from house to house with tracts and interpretations of Mormonism, holding street meetings, and otherwise performing the tasks of advocates of the faith. It cannot be denied that this is in many cases both an education and a strengthening of their religious zeal. Their constant defense of Mormonism gives vigor and loyalty to many who at their appointment were not enthusiastic.

On the other hand, Mormonism is fighting the battle of life and death with its environment and with the spirit of the age. Some of the best of its young men go to the universities east and west, and having no classic authorities, save the Bible and the Book of Mormon, they feel free to accept the truths of scientific and philosophical, not to say theological, character which are there offered. These cannot fail to have an enlightening influence upon an intellectual and religious viewpoint as naive and primitive as that of the community of the saints. The critical studies which strengthen the faith of Christian students are fatal ultimately to the theories of Mormonism.

For at heart Mormonism is a doctrine of materialism, anthropomorphic and crude in its tenets. Its doctrines of the physical personality of God, the efficacy of vicarious baptism for the dead (based on the misreading of a single passage in the New Testament), the eternal persistence of family conditions, particularly the marriage relationship (which of course implies the fact of plural marriage wherever there has been a second marriage, and thus provides a "spiritual doctrine" of polygamy), are all parts of a system of belief which cannot resist indefinitely the impact of more rational conceptions of religion and education. If Mormonism could live forever alone, as was the dream of its first apostles, it could survive. Even as it is, the strength of its organization will permit its endurance for a long time. But already within it are the seeds of its own decay. The growing passion of some of its choicer spirits for a higher level of education for all of its children, the process of sending its missionaries, young men at their most impressionable age, out to meet the larger world, and the increasing impact of Gentile influence on every side of the community, in spite of all its struggles for life, are fatal in the end.

Meantime one will find among its closest observers and most careful students the most varying opinions as to its business efficiency, its educational interests, its moral life, and its religious influence. Men who have lived under its shadows for a lifetime differ radically on all these questions. One must not give his testimony with any gesture of finality. But it is always the privilege of an interested bystander to set down what appear to him to be some aspects of an impressive problem.

Life and Modern Fiction

MANY years ago an American literary woman wrote a two-volume biography of her rather commonplace husband. "She is certainly a clever writer," was the comment of one of her readers, "for she has succeeded in writing a six-dollar book about a dollar-and-a-half man!"

Present day fiction, dealing though it does so largely with sordid or at the best commonplace people, undoubtedly shows the cleverness of its authors, but we may wonder whether it is quite fair to the life which it is supposed to portray. That these characters are portrayed with consummate art we are quite willing to concede, but why should art limit itself so needlessly?

Mrs. Wharton surely knows her New York. She knows, too—no one better—what constitutes fineness and nobility of soul. It was this knowledge, this subtle appreciation, which gave distinction to her earlier stories even though they lacked the perfect art which has come to her in later years. That she has not lost this appreciation of the highest values is shown in her essays, and especially in her noble tribute to Roosevelt. But in her later stories she has persistently limited herself to dollar-and-a-half people. As we have said, she knows her New York, past and present, and in the main the clear touch with which she draws the metropolis of the eighties, in "The Age of Innocence," is convincing. Yet we find ourselves in constant rebellion against the assumption that, even in the over-conventionalized first families of that place and time there were no individuals who were broad-minded, intelligent, and concerned about the affairs of a world outside the clan—no kindly human persons who recognized other virtues than those of commercial honesty and family solidarity. In reading "The Custom of the Country," one wondered why interest suddenly died out in the middle of the book, and realized that, the only worth-while character having committed suicide, there was nothing left to make one anxious about the outcome.

Then there is the "small-town stuff," which we have suddenly decided is a characteristic output of our age, though why we have decided thus it is difficult to say, since we have always had small-town stuff, some better and some worse than that which we have now so joyously endowed with that name. The present type of small-town story does indeed picture well the stark, grim unloveliness of the overgrown village, and it gives us a real sympathy with the revolt of youth and high spirits. But it would be far truer to life, as well as infinitely more inspiring to effort, if there were seen here and there a beautiful and gallant soul, conquering environment through sheer goodness and courage. The town must be very small indeed, or the great city sadly lost to hope, in which no such souls exist.

Life is full of ugly realities, and to hide our faces from these betrays an ostrich-like stupidity. But may we not demand of art that it play fair with life, that it give to the portrayal what exists in the reality—the illumination of dullness and evil with those individual instances of nobleness which are at once humanity's reward and its promises?

Keturah in the Blue Dress

A Parable of Safed the Sage

AND Keturah we were invited to a Reception. And Keturah inquired of me, saying, Which dress shall I wear? Shall it be my New one or my Blue one or the One I Wore Last.

And I said, Let it be the Blue one.

And she said, I will wear All Three.

For this is our Little Joke; and her New Blue Last Worn Dress looketh good unto me when Keturah hath it on.

And I said, There will be no woman there as fair as thou. For her Cheeks were red, and she stepped off as if she were Sixteen.

And she said, O my lord, there is nothing more pleasing unto a woman than to look well in the eyes of the man whom she doth love. Nevertheless, I cannot forget the years nor the grey hair which the years have brought. God grant I may always look well in thine eyes.

And I said, Sure thing.

And I said, There was once a Prophet named Mohammed; and there are those who think that he was a False Prophet, but that concerneth not my story. And he had a wife whose name was Kadajah. And it came to pass after long years that she died. And he despaired of filling her place with any one woman, and he married many wives. And one of them was his Favorite, and her name was Ayesha.

And it came to pass that Ayesha inquired of Mohammed, saying, Am I not very beautiful? And he said, Yea.

And she inquired, Dost thou not love me? And he answered, Yea.

And she said, Am not I thy Favorite? And Mohammed looked around to be sure that none of his other wives were listening in, and he answered, Yea.

And she inquired yet further, Dost thou not love me more than thou lovest any of thine other wives?

And again he looked around, and he answered, softly, Yea.

And if Ayesha had been wise she would have stopped there. But there was one question which she wanted to ask more than all, and she made the mistake of asking it.

And she said, Oh Mohammed, thou great and noble man, dost thou not love me more than thou didst love Kadajah? For she grew old and had wrinkles and grey hair, and I am young and fair?

And Mohammed answered with a Great Oath, and he said,

Nay, by Allah! For she it was who first believed in me!

And I said unto Keturah, Though all the fair women in the world were placed in line, and I were led admiring down the length of it, yet would I find no one among them all who could create for me the memories of our struggles and anxieties and economies and our meager triumphs and our sweet and holy joys. Thou in thy New Blue Last Worn Dress art unto thy husband the fairest among women.

And Keturah said nothing, but she found my hand as we walked away together, and she gave it a little squeeze.

VERSE

The Miscreant

THE clock of destiny has been set back.
Some reckless hand has made our times stand still;
Has mastered masteries of industry,
Has set the wheels of progress clanking harsh,
Each gritting on his fellow as they grind;
Has stifled trust, damped hope, turned faith to doubt,
And bred suspicion, cynical despair,
Among the champions of human weal.
Who's done this thing? The rogue? the charlatan?
The despot? gilded plutocrats? the rank
Reactionary? mobs of labor's slaves?
Loraged, hard-dealt-with proletarians?
They've each and all but acted out their part,
Have been themselves, run true to type, have done
Such mischief as they always do and will
When they've the chance, been good as they are good,
As bad as they are bad. Not one nor all
Have gained the power or place to do this thing,
To weave this foul design. The Liberal,
The erstwhile champion of truth and troth,
Of "right for right's sake, though the heavens fall,"
Has wearied of the strain, has broken faith,

Has stooped to sly and cunning ways, become Distraught, lost patience with the orderly
And solid evolution of the right,
Has threatened violence, aye, and practiced it,
Made arbitrary ends his ends by means
Of arbitrary means. The miscreant
Is he. He violates his nature, troth
He plighted; falls from grace. For shame! Oh, shame!

To John Keats

(Died February 25, 1821)

THOUGH sprung from stable folk and schooled with clods,

Your mind was native to the realms of gold
Of which you sang; though wanton tales are told
Of you, John Keats, your home was with the gods
Who on Olympus dwell, with lofty themes Engaged. Where "nymphs, soft-voiced and young and gay,"

Brought pinks and roses, in the early May,
"To Flora's shrine"—there were you, with your dreams.
There was your refuge from the critics' sting:
They, wrought of clay, knew not your faery lore.
You fled from them—too soon! but left the door
Of truth and beauty open for us, following.

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

Mountain Song

I WHO am young and lithe and swift—
Bewildered—restless—wondering,
Who hear with awe the pine-tree's psalm
And know not anything—
Yet sing!—

I hail Thee, Mountain Brother—you who lift
Your head above the ages long,
You who are old—and still—and strong,
Who know all things, have seen Creation:
And art calm.

ELIZABETH ZULAUF.

Tears

WHEN I consider life and its few years—
A wisp of fog betwixt us and the sun;
Recall to battle, and the battle done
Ere the last echo dies within our ears;
A rose choked in the grass; an hour of fears;
The gusts that past a darkening shore do beat;
The burst of music down an unlistening street—
I wonder at the idleness of tears.
Ye old, old dead, and ye of yesternight,
Chieftains, and bards, and keepers of the sheep,
By every cup of sorrow that you had,
Loose me from tears, and make me see aright
How each had back what once he stayed to weep;
Homer his sight, David his little lad!

LIZETTE WOODWORTH REESE.

Christ and Industry

By Earl Dean Howard

THE dissatisfaction of the wage earners with the usual system of relations existing in most industries calls attention not only to the danger threatening our economic civilization but also to the unpreparedness of the church to meet its social responsibilities. The chiefest danger lies in the temptation for the governors of industry and others in authority to suppress the dissatisfaction or, at least, the manifestations of it, without eliminating the cause; in short, to cover up the symptoms instead of treating the disease. But is there any disease?

Whatever may be our opinion of the value of their panaceas, we must acknowledge that the socialists, single-taxers, labor unions, and even the despised I. W. W.'s have shown up some serious defects in the industrial machinery. Most economists and serious-minded thinkers, I am sure, will grant that improvements are possible, nay, that adjustments are even imperative. Failure to make these necessary adjustments may endanger our delicately articulated industrial mechanism upon which modern civilization depends. The needed adjustments are so fundamental as to require profound changes in the purposes, motives and habits of thought which impel the administration of industrial enterprises. A new economic and ethical philosophy may be needed to direct managerial policy and action.

While the pressure of industrial unrest manifested in strikes and disorganization of economic processes will produce changes in managerial policy, these are unlikely to create a satisfactory relationship unless based upon a reformed administrative code. The agencies which form the ideals of men—the state, the Church and the school—must be employed in the task.

DEPENDENCE OF THE INDIVIDUAL

So swiftly has modern industrialism developed, that our economic ideas have been unable to keep up to it and are quite inadequate to present-day problems. The governor of our greatest industry arrives at his judgments on labor questions through concepts appropriate to a farmer dealing with his two or three hired men. We are all more and more dangerously and helplessly dependent upon the efficiency of the running of the machine. When business slows up, hundreds of thousands of men on the margin are cast off, separated from their only possible source of income, with what feelings of loyalty to the system as can be imagined. A railroad or coal strike gradually paralyzes industrial activity and, as by a flash-light, reveals how utterly dependent we are for our very lives upon the proper and continuous functioning of all parts of the mechanism.

The opportunity to earn a living is the primary factor in industrial relations. The extension of private property in natural resources and the development of industry place opportunity more and more in the hands of proprietors or their agents. This gives them power over the sources of livelihood of the propertiless class and creates a responsibility to the people which must ever be joined with power. Neglect or misuse of this power and responsibility will create a demand for its abolition even before a satisfactory substitute system is ready. Is it not the Church which has the best right to remind men of their duties and responsibilities?

PRACTICABLE ORGANIZATION

Opportunity to earn a living, however, is the product of industrial organization; organization is created and maintained by management working with material resources; management is intellectual effort skillfully applied, joined with the assumption of responsibility.

It is probably well within the truth to estimate that three-fourths of the active life of the average modern man is absorbed in business affairs. The majority of men get their living from a business relationship of some sort which they have established and maintain by continuous efforts and adjustments. This is the central fact of their lives, determining their social and economic status. Man's relations to his fellows grows in importance over his relation to his physical environment; he becomes more and more dependent upon social arrangements and organization and is forced to act less and less as an independent, self-reliant individual, more as a dependent member of a body. These economic conditions certainly have more or less influence upon his spiritual life. The pulpit which ignores this fact condemns itself to futility so far as the major interests of the men of their congregations are concerned.

One of the most outstanding symptoms of the changed world is the aggressive attitude of men toward evil which has replaced the relatively passive and resigned attitude of former times. There was probably never a time when men were so hopeful that evil could be conquered. The conquests of science have encouraged the belief that if typhoid, yellow fever, and other ancient and fearful enemies can be overcome, why not poverty and its train of miseries?

RADICAL AND CONSERVATIVE

The radical is the hopeful man, the prophet of better times ahead, the believer in the power of human intelligence in contest with evil, the man of faith. Too often, however, he is willing to gamble with our present stock of good because of his cupidity; he fails to realize the risk because of his intense desire for the winnings and his faith in himself. Fear makes the conservative, the man more concerned about holding on to what little of good he possesses than in crusading against evil. The more malignant the evil, the less stomach he has for a campaign, and the more relentless his persecution of the prophets. The war has made the world fearsome.

The Church, so long preoccupied with visions of heaven and hell, neglected to help in the work of improving the conditions of this world and even came to be thought of as an obstacle, protecting ancient abuses by teaching passive resignation to things as they are to those who suffered the most from them. Naturally, as a new faith in salvation through social science aroused these people out of their hopelessness, the Church lost much of its influence over them. They demand a Church that will assist in making the world better and will help to make ethical righteousness prevail. In the meantime, they will increase their faith in their own religion of collectivism.

Many churchmen, sensitive to the criticism that the Church is indifferent to and even obstructive of social betterment, and keenly sympathetic with the visions of the radicals, are tempted into positions which appear to the indiscriminating to be favoring violence, revolution and destruction.

THE PULPIT'S TASK

Aware of his ignorance of social science, especially in its application to business administration, but nevertheless tormented with the dread of being a slacker in the struggle against evil, the guardian of religion is tempted to avoid the subject as too controversial for the pulpit.

What shall the preacher do?

Preachers and teachers, church and schools, have this function in common: education. Society holds together because the people habitually act according to certain uniform beliefs. Conduct is the automatic expression of the principles and precepts which the mind, consciously or unconsciously, accepts as truth. Education forms these working principles and precepts, thus giving the educator opportunity to control future human conduct and its consequences. These considerations give us a starting point in meeting our problem.

Fortunately, there is fairly general agreement among religionists of all creeds as to the meaning of righteousness in human relations—the golden rule, brotherly kindness, justice. Our difficulties have arisen and this harmonizing principle has failed of effectiveness because of lack of faith, lack of expertness in the interpretation and application of the principle, belief in contradictory political and economic theories (particularly of materialistic origin), and belief in a necessary conflict between individual and social interests.

PANACEAS OBSCURE THE CASE

The industrial problem is too fundamental to yield to superficial treatment, panaceas merely obscure the case. When conflicts of interest generate hatred, particularly when incorporated in class consciousness, the disintegrating poison can be expelled only by a general application of the principle of righteousness, following a renewal of the minds of men.

Faith in righteousness and in industrial plans and policies expertly derived from the principle of righteousness suggests itself as a practical and adequate means of dealing with the situation. Faith may be defined as a willingness to accept a principle or proposition as a working hypothesis until experience can demonstrate its truth or falsity.

The principle of righteousness into specific plans and policies of action must be the joint work of the experts in ethics and religion on the one hand and experts in industrial administration on the other. The industrial world is already a vast laboratory of experiments in economic justice and practicable schemes of cooperation. Research will bring them to light while scientific study will interpret and adapt them to wider use.

Equipped with both facts and theory showing the practicability, even the urgent necessity, of a Christian economics, the Church may then, for the first time, venture effectively to teach and exhort both management and men as to their rights and duties in a Christian social order in which the general welfare is the supreme objective, superior to all private interests.

The function of the clergy should be, first, to understand thoroughly the Christian economics doctrine, then to utilize it in transforming the interests, motives, purposes and wills of men in industry, preparing the way for Christianized industrial relations. The clergy should be able to procure sound technical advice in industrial relations for right-minded business men seeking to improve their management along these lines.

FUNCTIONS OF THE CHURCH

The church has a definite ideal of life which most men acknowledge to be superior to the materialistic concepts implied in our industrial and economic philosophies. If it can translate this ideal into practical precepts and codes to govern human relations, especially in business, it may at once assume leadership in this confused world against the greatly weakened powers and obstacles of the old economic system. The problem of industrial relations is the opportunity of the church. The current unrest and disorganization is not an evil, but social fermentation, to eliminate evil elements hitherto tolerated in our economic system. Workers are conscious of a new self-respect and are in revolt against the servile status into which the old industrial system forced them. If the church will assume the leadership in this emancipation, the dangers and risks which always accompany transitions may be minimized and the half-blind groping of the workers toward a higher and more self-respecting life may be guided intelligently and safely. But the church must understand thoroughly the social forces and institutions with which it is dealing.

The industrial system now passing had very little Christianity in it; in fact, it was largely the antithesis of Christianity. It assumed a world of struggle, of selfish greed, of competition, of the dominance of the strong and the crushing of the weaker, of irresponsible management, of belief in materialistic concepts of life. The roots of the evil are therefore ideas in the minds of men, reinforced by economic doctrines and business codes. Christianity requires that they be displaced by ideas of righteousness. Is the job so big or are our other engagements so pressing that we must pass this by?

Woodrow Wilson

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

ON March 4th there will pass into private life the man upon whom the fierce light of a pitiless publicity has beaten for eight eventful and purgatorial years. This man will give place to a successor who was carried into power by the swollen tide of the greatest popular majority ever received by a candidate for the presidency of the United States. Every true American wishes Mr. Harding well and fervently hopes that during his years of leadership world peace may be made sure and durable. Yet, to millions the outgoing President, white haired, haggard, broken in body, but still undefeated in spirit, is the more interesting and impressive figure. There is something majestic and triumphant even amidst the pathos and tragedy of the great War President's exit from the world arena with "head bloody but unbowed."

It has fallen to the lot of no other man to have been lifted to the dizzyest pinnacle of international fame by the titanic waves of a world war; and then by the same capricious billows flung helpless on the inhospitable shores of bitterest partisan rancor, hate and execration. The man before whose image the Italian peasants burned candles and said their prayers, is one and the same man for whom a little less than a year later, certain American preachers refused to invoke God's blessing, and whose name a thousand newspapers never mentioned save in derision and contempt.

AN INTELLECTUAL JOVE

The sure years will decide how high and ample Mr. Wilson's place in history is to be, but some appraisals of his character and genius have already been made, and these with accuracy and justice. Mr. Wilson's mind is one of the two or three exceptional minds which have adorned and glorified the Presidency. It may be true, as he himself has said, that it is "a single track mind," but if so the roadbed was well laid, for the deadliest curves were taken without a jar—until the wreckers did their worst. Not even Mr. Wilson's severest critics call him a weakling. On the contrary, they pay his intellectual qualities the highest homage. Such adjectives as "unusual," "extraordinary," "exceptional," "remarkable," are used freely to describe the quality of Mr. Wilson's intellect. Mr. Taft and Mr. Harding in the midst of the recent campaign turned aside from the partisan path long enough to pay a generous and exalted tribute to the President's rare intellectual gifts. Dr. Joseph Collins, a distinguished Republican as well as an eminent scientist and author, contributed to Col. Harvey's North American Review, July, 1920, an article entitled "Wilson Psychologically," which deserved the wide reading it received. Dr. Collins' estimate of Mr. Wilson's intellect could scarcely be higher. Thus he says: "He had the mind of Jove. . . . Had he Lincoln's heart and his own brain he would be not one of the great men that America has produced, but the greatest. . . . He is the idealist who has done more to make our government representative of the people, and not of the party bosses, than any one in the memory of man." Mr. Keynes, in his description of the masterful personalities at the Peace Council, called Mr. Wilson "dull" and his mind "slow." Mr. Keynes' book is a notable contribution to the literature of the peace-making period, but it is colored by personal prejudices, possibly for propaganda effect. When one remembers the terrific strain Mr. Wilson had undergone for months, a strain that his associates first observed in August, 1918, and then recalls the wearying round of public affairs given in his honor by England and France, it is not surprising that the President may have seemed "dull" and his mind "slow." That he lived it through was a miracle. Mr. Keynes also alludes to Mr. Wilson as "a lonely man" in Paris. No wonder:

Lonely is the man who understands.
Lonely is vision that leads a man away
 To one fused experience,
That shall control
The courses of his soul,
And give his hand
Courage and continence.

There are interesting men who have uninteresting minds. Mr. Wilson is an interesting man whose mind is still more interesting. Colonel Roosevelt's mind was more scintillating possibly, but less steadily brilliant. Major McKinley's personality was more notable than his intellectual qualities. Mr. Cleveland's intellect was sure-footed but more solidly adamant and not so keen or incisive as Wilson's. Mr. Taft's mind is more judicial and resembles Wilson's only in its international range. To quote Dr. Collins again, "Wilson is the idealist who is a scholar, a thinker, a statesman, a creator, an administrator and a man of vision."

MASTER OF ENGLISH

Mr. Wilson's literary gifts are freely acknowledged to be of a supreme quality. His severest critics agree that his command of English is well nigh perfect. His style is singularly simple, beautiful and accurate of diction. It is modeled after the highest standards and drawn from many a well of English undefiled. His sentences are lights; his paragraphs, marvels of clarity; his speeches, never dull or commonplace. No occupant of the White House has had a greater mastery of the English language—not even Lincoln. No other American President left so priceless a literary legacy—not even Jefferson. To be spokesman for the liberty loving peoples of the world is a surpassingly great honor; but to voice the spirit of democracy in "thoughts that breathe and words that burn," language so noble and lofty as to resemble portions of the Hebrew Prophets, is an honor such as comes to a man only once in centuries. Many of Mr. Wilson's speeches and state papers will live in the white light forever—treasures which time can only make more meaningful and eloquent.

It is difficult to read three of his great war addresses, even now, without experiencing a thrill of strong emotion. These three are his "Necessity of War Against Germany," April 2, 1918; "Fourteen Conditions of Peace," addressed to Congress Jan. 8, 1918; and "Four Factors of World Peace," Mt. Vernon, July 4, 1918. The last named is vested with a solemn grandeur and is couched in phrases as noble of sentiment as they are flawless of diction. Twenty-five years hence and less, school and college boys by the tens of thousands will declaim rapt passages from these memorable speeches; impressive phrases from Mr. Wilson's writings will be woven into many a notable oration; and his aphorisms and epigrams will stud, like the stars of heaven, countless essays and editorials. It is cause for rejoicing when there comes to the Presidency a man who possesses a distinctive and distinguished literary style together with other equally great gifts: his every public utterance becomes an event; his speeches, proclamations and correspondence-gestures worthy of the occasion and the high office. In America the scholar and litterateur in politics is unusual; in England and Continental Europe many leading statesmen are not only scholars, but also, themselves, creators of literature. It will probably be a long time before the United States has another President comparable to Wilson in genius of literary style, wide range of historical studies, and richly disciplined mind.

NO DEMIGOD BUT VERY HUMAN

Contemporary comment on a celebrity is rarely just and always divided. George Gilfillan thinks no really great man is widely and fully accepted as such in his own life time. "Woe unto you when all men speak well of you," said the great Teacher. Mr. Wilson is not a demigod; he is thoroughly human, therefore erring. He has been called arrogant and an egotist. Perhaps he is both. He is said by some to be ungenerous, by others, intolerant. It may be so. It is scarcely possible that Mr. Wilson would suffer a member of his cabinet to talk about him as Stanton talked about Lincoln. But what of it? Neither is it possible to think of William Howard Taft hunting big game in Africa after the fashion of his great predecessor. What of it? One star differeth from another in glory. Mr. Wilson has been adjudged as lacking in heart power, though there are those who ought to know who say he loves his fellow men with a very great love. He has been pilloried for his failure to do team work—despite the fact that he is at his best when he works alone. He has been censured as stubborn; a quitter he certainly is not. If he has given no quarter neither has he asked quarter of any man. If it be true that the world admires a fighter—the world's admiration for Wilson should be unbounded.

THE BLAME FOR VERSAILLES

Numerous are the attempts to account for the political eclipse of so extraordinary a man at so momentous and tremulous a time. To whom or to what shall be attributed the winding of the multitudinous threads of circumstance and condition that bound this intellectual Gulliver helpless, almost over night. Is Keynes correct in his belief that it was the President's "Presbyterian temperament" that laid him low? Was he really too "slow" for so nimble and elusive a side partner as Lloyd George? Did Mr. Wilson compromise with his own soul? Was there some faltering of heart, some weakening of that stubborn will? The eminent English publicist, Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, in the February Atlantic, answers a thunderous "no" to all such interrogations. He says: "What happened in that chamber is only gradually transpiring. I shall not therefore attempt to sum up the sordid and miserable tale. But one thing I feel impelled to say. The ultimate blame rests, not on President Wilson, but on the governments, the governing classes, and the electorates of Great Britain and France, and on public opinion in America. Mr. Wilson may have been, as Mr. Keynes has said, an inexperienced negotiator. He may have antagonized the Republican party in his own country. He may have committed this or that minor error of tactics. But all that is dust in the balance compared to the main fact. That he had vision where the others had passion; that he looked to the future, while they looked to the past; that he drew his inspiration from reason and truth, while they drew their expertness from hatred, greed, and fear. Nor is it only the statesman of Europe on whom the blame must be laid. It falls also on the peoples to whose passions they appealed, and who responded to the appeal. Their electorates were behind them, urging them on, even had they wished to halt."

These are burning words and true.

MARTYRED TO MAKE POLITICAL HOLIDAY

The explanation of Mr. Wilson's Waterloo seems simpler and closer at hand than the more labored and wrought out analyses that were so popular a year ago but are waning now. Was not the cause of Mr. Wilson's fall from his high political estate the nature of his democracy, that "dangerous idealism" which many feared to see unleashed in a world so satiated with myriad forms of despotic and autocratic control and mellow ripe for radical ideas and revolutionary doctrines? The older, stronger, and always subtler forces of conservatism were massed against the President, and his every misstep and misfortune, whether real or fictional, was used against him ruthlessly. Mr. Wilson's liberal attitude toward labor was of itself enough to make him anathema to those powerful persons who dominate and dictate American finances. So much for the cause.

Was not the occasion of Mr. Wilson's eclipse our American party system which provided a weapon for his enemies at once powerful and frightfully two-edged? If the situation had been reversed and the President a Republican, the tactics of the Democrats would probably have been similar but not likely so successful. As it was, the politicians of the opposite party sensed clearly and accurately that if Mr. Wilson's world influence continued to grow, and he triumphed at the Peace Conference, it would mean that his party would continue in power at Washington for a generation; as indeed had been the case with the Republicans after the Civil War. The cue, then, for Mr. Wilson's political enemies was obvious and they acted upon it avidly and unitedly. After the armistice the bitter partisan fire which had smouldered for months burst into red fury. It was anything to beat Mr. Wilson; everything to harass, confuse and defeat him. It is not conceivable that any League of Nations carrying Wilson's colors could have met other than defeat at the hands of a hostile Republican senate, ably assisted by a coterie of Democrats who were never more than lukewarm in support of the President's policies. A decade from now the spirit and method of Mr. Wilson's enemies, in so fateful an hour, will be seen in a stronger and clearer light and the history of the episode will not be pleasant reading. Still, our party system explains it, mollifies to some extent the malignancy of the temper and partly excuses the means employed. The personal attack on the President was an acrid smoke screen, under cover of which the partisan destroyers wrought deadly work. The whole affair was shameful, heartless and unfair, but for the time successful. Mr. Wilson was broken on the rack of political expediency—broken physically, possibly mentally—and all to make a partisan holiday. But already the reaction has set in. The tide "turns again home." Wilson's world ideas bear charmed lives. He set the nations to communing. He started a movement that may be retarded but never stopped until international disarmament becomes a reality. He has saved his life by losing it!

Two years of darkness and this man but grows
Greater in resolution, more constant in compassion,
He goes the way of dominion in pitiful,
High-hearted fashion.

The Church of Silence

By Joseph Fort Newton

"Be still and know that I am God." Psa. 46:10.

SOME years ago an English woman, sorely hurt by the deep stab of death, sought healing in travel. She journeyed far and near, but her sorrow followed her like a shadow, and wherever she stopped it was there. One day in Rome, weary of her walk, she passed into a chapel to rest. On the wall some artist, who had walked the sorrowful way, had told the story of the supreme Sufferer, with a strange and haunting charm. As she sat meditating, the silence and beauty of the place soothed her aching spirit, and she began to find healing. So, again and again, she returned to the little chapel to sit, and pray, and muse of Him whose sorrow was greater than her own, and whose pity was a balm. When she returned to London, she thought to help others mortally wounded, as she had been, to find faith and hope once more. So she built a little chapel, and had an artist retell that sweet story on its walls. It has no pulpit, no choir, and is called the Church of Silence. There the weary, the sorrowful, the wounded may go, and learn to be still.

CARLYLE AND EMERSON

That chapel has hinted to me the meditation of this hour, and it is a theme whereof we need to be reminded in this noisy and hurrying age. We are all for the strenuous life, restless, smitten with "the superstition of being busy." Activity is our ideal. To be doing something, often without thinking whether it is worth doing or not, is the mood of the time. Never has the world been more talkative than it is today. Echoes fill the air, while men run to and fro, hither and yon, each trying to make himself heard above the chatter of his fellows. So clamant is our age that Carlyle, distracted by the din, declared that "Vox is the God of the universe, and all men are his devotees." Words, words, words, cried Hamlet, and he would repeat his cry were he living today. To talk of quietness, especially in praise of it, seems almost an affectation, if not a pose.

Carlyle himself was a sinner in this regard. He talked endlessly, brilliantly, engagingly. One evening Tennyson called to see him, and the grim sage talked the whole time, hardly letting his guest put in a word edgewise. His talk was all about the value of silence! Of impatient and stormy nature, it was with great difficulty that he learned, in his own words, that "the happiest of all men, I think, is he who can keep himself the quietest." How different it was with Wordsworth. He who might, had he willed, lived in London or some other world-center, chose instead

The silence that is in the starry sky,
The sleep that is among the hills.

and out of his brooding among the lakes, came a voice strangely clear, calm, and sweet. As a result, his poems, written with an austere simplicity, have become a part of the sacred writings of the larger faith.

Nature is a teacher of quietness. Goethe makes one of his characters say that, in search of his soul, he will turn away from man, plunge into the forest, and there, with nature, "hold a mute, unfathomable conversation." How wonderful are the words of the nineteenth Psalm, so beloved by Coleridge and Ruskin, both of whom wrote in exposition of it:

Day unto day uttereth speech,
Night unto night showeth knowledge;
There is no speech nor language,
Their voice is not heard.

Early in the morning Richard Jefferies would go to the top of a hill to listen, and then it was that his "prayer-mood" fell over him with its sweetness and calm. Again, at eventide, he was there, a worshipper in the church of silence. No word was spoken, no creed recited, yet he was in the presence of the Infinite. With what majestic stillness nature rebukes the chatter of man who thinks he is heard for his much speaking.

Really great men are always quietest. Although they may stand amid the rush and flurry of things, they have a center of repose, an inner stillness where they live untroubled and unvexed. A true leader, whether in politics or religion, is ever above the agitations of the hour, and while he descends to take part in them his larger self is elsewhere. When he speaks, his words have weight and power, and by a sure instinct men detect the difference between such a man and one who speaks from the pedestal of the hour. When an authentic voice is heard the echoes are hushed. All the great things are unutterable, and until something has gone on within a man that transcends words, he cannot say much that is worth saying. And such men, happily, we have today, though not in large numbers.

THE SECRET OF POWER

Here is a lesson for the pulpit, if it would be a leader of the souls of men. Paul, Augustine and Luther were eloquent in their day, but back of their eloquence lay a deep silence in which they attained to a vital, vivid, victorious experience of things immortal. There they wrestled with doubt and sin. There they wandered in a stony wilderness, often heartsick and footsore, until they came to the mount of vision. One day when Tauler was preaching he turned white as a ghost and left the pulpit, realizing that he was speaking from the outworks of his soul, and that he really had nothing worth the saying. So he went away and was not seen for two years, and when he returned from the church of silence, where he had learned truth, his words swayed men as the winds sway the summer clouds. Quietness is ever the secret of power, and all the revelations are the gift of stillness. There, remote from the tumult, men listen to the voices that speak in silence, and their lips are touched with fire.

If further assurance is needed it is found in the lives of the great mystics. Take, as a single example, Molinos the Quietest, mentioned by Browning in "The Ring and the Book," one of the noblest teachers of quietness. Spanish in origin, he came, racy of the soil, in the succession of the mystics, a disciple of Santa Teresa, but with a voice and message of his own. At first he won favor, because he appealed to devout souls weary of the blinding wastes of formalism; but later he was hushed. Condemned as a heretic, he was consigned to prison, where, after ten years, he died an old man of seventy, in 1690. "We shall meet again in the judgment day," he said, as he was led away to his cell, "and then it will appear on which side, on yours or on mine, is truth."

Nor did he have to wait until the judgment day. Though his voice was hushed, and his golden book, "The Spiritual Guide," was suppressed, his teachings flowed on, now flooding the soul of Guyon and Fenelon, now running into channels already formed by early Quakers, now descending deeply, but never lost. He was a great Prophet of the Church of Silence. His doctrine of passivity was denounced as a doctrine of sloth, though it is, at heart, far otherwise. It is not an avoidance of effort, but its reward; for such a man can become passive before God only after a struggle and a decisive victory of the will. His quietness is not the slumberous rest of the eagle in the cleft of the rock, with wings idly folded, but the rest of the eagle when poised in the sunny air, floating in a sea of light. There, raised and uplifted, the soul finds herself united to the Highest Good, in a most sweet and gentle calm.

A STRANGE STRENGTH

Whatever we may think of the gospel of quietism, it has endowed men with a strange strength both to do and to endure. Here is a gentle power which mere brute force cannot overcome, save to slay what then only dies to live more abundantly in other hearts, and grow. These great quiet men, by virtue of their inner detachment, are deaf to the applause of the world, and above its threats. They are, accordingly, the fortresses of liberty and all the higher interests of humanity, which they preserve and defend with disinterested loyalty and valor. Men of stillness, they have been movers of the multitude, and nothing can defeat them, because there is nothing with which either to bribe or to frighten them. They are baffling figures, incomprehensible to the adversary.

"Do you not fear," cried Modestus to Basil, who, in the fourth century stood out against him for the faith—"do you not fear my authority and the penalties I can inflict?"

"What are they?" asked Basil, quietly.

"Why, confiscation, exile, torture, and death," was the reply.

"Try something else; naught of this kind frightens me," came the calm response. What can mere force do with a man of that kind?

Time does not permit me to speak at length of the teachers of quietness. There are, however, certain laws which may help us to attain, in some degree, to their "holy stillness." They find, for one thing, a way to deliverance from all evil, and it is almost too simple to be found out. The way of it is this. All of us, who are not dead of soul, are aware that we are unworthy and in many ways imperfect, and the nobler a man is the more vivid is his sense of unworthiness. Paul, not Nero, called himself the chief of sinners. What does this mean? What is it within us that thus passes judgment upon our lives? It means that there is a Self within us which stands higher, holier, and nearer to God, and which, because it passes judgment on our lower life as unworthy, must itself be worthy. Else there would be no sense of unworthiness at all. To the extent that we make friends with that nobler Self, and let it have sway over us, we are delivered from evil.

THE SOUL'S HINTERLAND

By the same law, if we obey it, we are set free of world-care. High up in the hinterlands of the soul there is an area of personal life as secure from the cares of the world as is a still and silent lake which lies among the hills, mirroring the quiet sky. That does not mean that a man who pitches his tent beside that still water will never know care. Not at all. He will not be free from care, but he will be free of it. It will not master him, because it cannot climb so high. He will learn the fine art of holding life, as every master holds the tools of his craft, with loose hands, and the stroke of mastery. It is not an accident that the geography of faith is a mountain range. From Sinai to Olivet we may trace the peaks of the mountains of God, because there are mountains in the soul, and he who climbs them finds the quiet waters, and the large outlook. Then he sees life from above, in true perspective, and its petty cares and gossipings are known to be little and of little worth.

And, with this, comes an intuition of union with the Divine life, a sense of unity with our fellow souls, in which the awful separateness of the lower levels of being vanishes. This is the experience of all who seek the highest good faithfully and with honest hearts. To such fine issues our mortal life, with all its bafflements, ascends, when it is lived nobly and with true intent to find its worth. The gold mines of wisdom are in the mountains of God. There the climber breathes the air of freedom and vastness, and the serenity of the great, still spaces, and learns that in quietness there is joy. There we taste the pleasures of believing that Life is boundless,

As we wish our souls to be.

Prayer is the deep heart of religion, and if we only knew it there is in it a sure path out of division into the unity of the spirit. Not long ago in New Zealand a few Quakers began to hold meetings in the chapel of an Anglican church, by the good will of the rector. After a time the rector and his wife joined them, and then others, and all were so deeply moved and exalted that they formed a Fellowship of Silence, of which the rector tells us in a tiny book of that title. Very beautiful is their testimony to the joy and power of reunion through silent worship, as witness these words:

We were but a handful. There was no sound of vocal prayer, no leader of worship, but our service needed no voice to begin it. There came very quietly a sense of the Presence, and the prayer grew strangely easy. We were not resolutely fixing our thoughts on a Friend in a far country; we were listening to One who was very near us. We were in a church, but it was more than a church. The atmosphere was different, deeper, as two substances, united, form a third, different from either, yet including both. Thus the blending of silence and fellowship created an air in which the spiritual man was set free. It was an attitude of still waiting, and listening, with the soul alert. We were of different communions, but it was hard to commit schism or propagate heresy in silence.

From far off New Zealand the Fellowship of Silence has spread to England, Canada, and our own land, and men are beginning to learn the truth in the presence of which all are one in their littleness and longing, and in which differences are dissolved. How significant of the need of an age of noise, of confused voices, and restless hunger of spirit, always seeking without finding, ever learning but unable to come to the knowledge of the truth. If you doubt the revelation of silence, try it. Make a time of quiet in your busy, hurrying life, and listen to those sweeter tones which the din of the day drowns, as at Shechem, when the hush of night falls, one can hear underneath the ancient city the ripple of unseen waters. In the rush and pressure of modern life, when feverish activity is made the measure of things, there is nothing we need more than to learn the high art and sweet secret of times of quiet. For, not only must we pray with honest and earnest hearts, but we must know how to be still and listen for the answer.

SOME THINGS ARE SETTLED

How can we, who have work to do and burdens to bear, attain to that vision which is also victory? Let me give two practical hints. Restless and inquisitive, our danger is that we shall take nothing for granted, and therefore never get anything done. We must take some things for granted in order to get time, power and energy to do the rest of the things that cannot be taken for granted. Some things are settled. Certain great truths are closed questions for thinking men, and to know this fact makes for intellectual peace. The moral law is one such. A man who does not "know his noble from his ignoble hours" is not an inquirer; he is a moral incompetent. Through the very heart of the world runs the law of right and wrong, and not to see it is to be blind. The being of God is a closed question. There are no more philosophic atheists, though there are practical atheists who live as if God were not. Also, there are a few speculative atheists who are as innocent of philosophic insight as though they were babes. Some things are assured, and upon that sure foundation we may build the home of our souls.

Then, too, we must put our whole force into our task and get it done, so that we may have a margin for quiet. No peril is greater than to string our work out until it covers, like a tenuous veil of care, the whole of life, making our toil a prolonged activity and anxiety. Of Emerson, John Burroughs said, "Where he was at all, he was altogether," and never a more quiet and confident spirit has moved amid the crass anxieties of the world. He was altogether where he was at all—altogether active when he had work to do, altogether quiet on those margins of quiet that lay around his toil. Some of you are not altogether here today. Something was left unfinished, and it has followed you to the place of quiet to vex your prayer. Thus our life is divided, distracted, and we are never altogether anywhere, which means that we are really nowhere. Learn, then, in the interest of peace, that we do not have to be always building the world up from the bottom—that some things are settled and sure. Learn, also, that, having a task to do, it must be done with application and dispatch, so that when it is done, we can sit quietly in the Church of Silence.

Let us enter the Place of Hearing with a whole heart, a pure mind, and learn to be still. Then we shall know—nor guess, nor dream, nor speculate—that God is with us, even in our hearts, to heal our hurts and teach us the truth which makes us free of fear, and care, and futile regrets. That Church of Silence! What a symbol it is of the need of an age troubled about many things, unable, or unwilling, to sit at the feet of the Teacher and choose the better, wiser part. Wise is the man who knows how to be still and listen to the unutterable things, ere he goes hence,

To where, beyond these voices,
There is silence.

The Better Way

YOU cannot maintain political democracy and industrial autocracy side by side, says John D. Rockefeller, Jr. The biggest problem in America today is that of industrial democracy. Sherwood Eddy says that after twenty-five years experience in dealing with the moral and religious problems in Asia and after a year spent in the war stricken regions of Europe he returns home to face this as the most menacing situation in the world. Mr. Eddy speaks these words with the utmost deliberateness, and repeats them that he may be fully understood. He pictures the Russia of the Czar followed by the violent reaction into bloody revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat. He compares that with the French Revolution and then applies the lesson to the relentless determination of certain entrenched powers of wealth in this country in their fight on all organized labor. His conclusion is that unless the policy of repression is abandoned and the irrepressible forces of democracy in the industrial world are dealt with according to reason and the progressive tendencies of the times there can be only one outcome, and that is explosion.

Judge Gary came back from England to warn employers of the "dangers" in the English labor movement. Mr. Eddy comes back to warn them of the dangers in their movement to suppress in American labor those aspirations which English workmen are freely exercising. An eminent English churchman says that the greatest moral and religious gain yet registered from the war is the English Labor Party's Reconstruction Report on "Labor and the New Social Order." A prominent manufacturer and leader in the so-called fight for the open shop said recently that they now had organized labor where they wanted it and that they would strangle it. The Wall Street Journal says the laborer will now get down to the level where he belongs, and stay there. Ex-President Taft denominates all this as Bourbonism and warns that it is riding for a severe fall. A big European employer left the President's First Industrial Conference in Washington saying America was "in the Stone Age" of industrial relationships because we "had not settled the question of collective bargaining." He declared, "You have a steel strike because Mr. Gary will not talk to his workingmen." No wonder he called us "a most surprising country" with the finest political democracy and an industrial autocracy that every other civilized nation has abandoned.

The Old Way and the New

On January 27 there occurred in the city of Philadelphia two incidents that illustrate the old way and the new. In the Cramp shipyards 10,000 men were on strike. There was a big force of union pickets trying to dissuade men from entering the yards. Opposing them was a small army of police and armed yard guards. There was violence, loss of property, two men were sent to the hospital in critical condition, production was stopped and losses suffered on both sides. The company refused to go into council and "arbitrarily" reduced wages. The result was war.

In the same city that day there sat in the Estey Building ten men peaceably adjusting the same problem for 75,000 men and their employers, the Atlantic Coast Shipbuilders. Five had been selected by each party to the collective bargaining, they met in a friendly, business-like manner, each recognizing the economic and human rights of the other and dealing with one another just as two great business men would do in discussing a question of mutual consideration. They agreed upon a reduction of wages to meet the changing conditions in prices and in the changing fortunes of the ship building business. There was no violence, no pickets or police, no stoppage of production, and in the place of ill-will there was good-will. On the one side there were arbitrary orders, autocratic temper, rebellious action, violence, injured men, loss of property and wages and a violation of the principles of democracy, brotherhood and Christianity. On the other side was good-will, peace, profit for both sides, and a demonstration that fraternity, democracy and the Christian principles will work in industrial relationships. The "arbitrary" demand was for a 25 per cent cut in wages and was met by an "arbitrary" refusal to accept. The collective bargainers agreed to a 10 per cent cut and saved money for both sides.

When the steel trust "arbitrarily" raised wages 10 per cent the Standard Oil Company met its employees through their representatives, bargained collectively on the basis of the rising cost of living and the company's profits and raised the wages 11 per cent through mutual agreement. On January 4 the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company met the representatives of its employees in Pueblo to confer over the reduction in wages made necessary by falling prices. On December 11 they had made a statement regarding markets, profits, etc., and had expressed their judgment that there should be a reduction of 20 per cent in wages. The representatives of the men had considered the whole matter, held mass meetings of the employees and came to the combined committee with a proposition to accept a cut of 15 per cent and a promise to try to make up in increased production the margin of 5 per cent between them. This the company accepted and pronounces itself highly pleased. Thus does John D. Rockefeller, Jr., show his faith by his works. Will the steel trust "arbitrarily" reduce wages and risk another strike rather than admit the principles of collective bargaining? So far they hold prices double those of pre-war days and are able to avoid cutting wages and facing the troubles possible in so doing.

The Railroad Labor Crisis

Railroad labor represents the front line of labor gain at this time. Because the government took charge of the entire industry during the war it was possible, under an enlightened administration, to put into effective execution progressive policies in dealing with labor. Organization, collective bargaining and arbitration were all recognized and machinery set up to make them effective. All partizan and propaganda opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, the railroad service in the war machine was one of the most efficient and effective arms of that marvelous machine. Labor looks upon the gains made through government supervision as progress that must be maintained, while the managers, now that the corporations again are in control, claim too much was granted and that the labor policies must be repealed to make control effective and profitable.

The public is led to believe that the contest now on before the Wages Board is solely one of reducing wages. It is much more one over the rules and regulations set up by the national administration and a contest to abolish the whole national aspect of control in regard to labor and send all such questions back to the individual corporations. General Atterbery of the Pennsylvania is the leader for railroad executives in this demand. The newspapers carried a fine story recently of his calling all his train operatives together and setting up a system of conciliation and agreement that would make a strike impossible. This is an end that Chief Engineer Stone says was guaranteed under the comprehensive arrangements of the national labor board and Mr. Atterbery is charged with a desire to destroy the Brotherhood strength, make this move a part of the fight on unions and again intrench a united corporation executive against a divided labor organization. In other words if the national rules can be broken and each road deal only with its own men, then without a national brotherhood bond any longer effective the corporation can next deal arbitrarily with its own men.

Without doubt there are war regulations and rules that need amending, but the railroad business is too vital a part of our daily national well being to allow the loss of the enlightened and progressive methods of uniform labor policies or to permit any backward step from the modern program of collective bargaining and arbitration.

CORRESPONDENCE

Y. M. C. A. and Industry

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Will you allow me to call your attention to a misstatement which appears in The Christian Century of February 17, 1921, in two different articles? In the editorial on page 5, "The Employers and the Y. W. C. A.," you make this statement: "Since the Y. W. C. A. at its Cleveland meeting a year ago adopted the social ideals which are now commonplace in church circles, and which are also professed by the Y. M. C. A.," etc. On page 16, in the article by Alva W. Taylor under the caption "Aftermath of the Steel Report," the following statement is made: "The reader will recall that at the Y. W. C. A. Convention in Cleveland last summer the social ideals of the churches as adopted and twice confirmed by the Federal Council of Churches, and as adopted by the National Y. M. C. A. Convention, were also adopted by the Y. W. C. A.," etc. Also in the same article the statement: "The Employers' Association of Pittsburgh denounces the social ideals of the churches as adopted by both Y's," etc.

I herewith enclose excerpts from the convention minutes which even a casual reading would show that there is a very decided difference in the action of the Y. W. C. A. Cleveland convention and of the Y. M. C. A. Detroit convention on industrial policies. You will note that the Y. M. C. A. convention did not refer in any action to the promotion of legislation with reference to industrial policies. You will also note that the Y. M. C. A. Detroit convention did not adopt the four resolutions under the caption "Facing the Social Issues Involved in Reconstruction" which were adopted by the Y. W. C. A. convention. These resolutions have to do with collective bargaining, the sharing of shop control, the minimum wage, cooperative ownership, etc.

You will also note that the Y. M. C. A. Detroit convention unanimously adopted on recommendation of the International Committee and also the convention committee on the international committee's report, the resolution on page 4, which clearly defines the settled policy of the associations as heretofore practiced and as again determined through this resolution by this convention.

Inasmuch as the Young Men's Christian Association has been carrying on for more than fifty years an ever increasing constructive program in the field of industry, where within the zone of agreement there is united cooperation by employees and employers, and inasmuch as the association as such has all through its history refrained from entering into the field of theological, political or social controversy and has confined its deliverances and its activities within the realm of practical agreement, you can readily see that an injustice is done the Young Men's Christian Association by confusing its policies and program with those of the Y. W. C. A., which are radically and essentially different from those of the Young Men's Christian Association.

You will also note in this statement herewith enclosed, the Industrial Work Plan of the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago, through which a far reaching program is carried forward under the direction of employees and employers on railroads and in many industrial communities.

I forward with this letter a copy of the Association Forum of the October, 1920, issue, where you will find an article which I prepared as printed on page 22, on the Industrial Policy and Program of Young Men's Christian Associations; also a copy of the Association Forum of January, 1921, with an article on "The Work of the Young Men's Christian Association with Men in Industry—Possibilities, Perils, Policies, Program," by Fred B. Shipp, General Secretary of the Pittsburgh Association.

A careful reading of these two articles and the material referred to in this letter as to convention action will make clear the industrial platform and policies of the Young Men's Christian Association. I am sure that whatever may be your opinions as to the attitude of the churches or of the Young Women's Christian Association on the industrial situation, you will desire to quote the Young Men's Christian Association accurately as to its exact position on this subject.

Worse than Wasted

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Two contiguous articles in your issue of February 3, constrain a response. The one, "Unity Via the Mission Field," the other, "Fellowship for the Community Church." Out of a ministry of twenty years not one has been anti-or o-missionary. Without missions not only the world but the church is lost. The consciousness of this fact has spurred me to efforts that have been blessed with increasing the missionary giving within my pastoral charge as much as eightfold in two years. As yet I know no reason to lessen my interest or efforts in behalf of foreign missions; but there is a deepening conviction gripping me that much—I would almost say most—home missionary funds are worse than wasted.

To be specific, I will mention a community of a little over a thousand in which there were a Catholic and three small Protestant churches. Only one of the four, a Protestant church, was even attempting the entire support of a minister. In spite of the sectarian spirit of at least two of the pastors last in the service of these churches, upon all three of them becoming pastorless, the leading laymen of all as well as the men of the community generally, signed an agreement to give a community church their moral and financial support, called a pastor from a disinterested communion and proceeded to organize along denominational lines. One of the denominations whose pastor had been forced to leave the field for lack of support with three hundred dollars of his promised salary unpaid, on learning of the community movement, immediately sent in their missionary workers and promised their otherwise vanishing reactionary element $1000 of missionary money to keep the church open.

I am constrained to believe that this is only one of numerous instances where home missionary money in the hands of sectarian supervisors actually hinders the desire of local workers to cease the folly and futility—not to say the curse—of competition over senseless sectarian shibboleths. In fact, we are increasingly persuaded that the utter discontinuance of home missionary effort—save in unchurched communities—would be an almost unmixed blessing, as it would call into effective action a deepening desire among laymen to get together, and there are but few communities too small to be self-supporting, if self-determining and unmolested with divisive outside influences.

Now as to fellowship for the community church, there is a dire need of it. And, as you say, the principle of denominational exchange is not feasible in all communities. I doubt if it is feasible in even a majority of them. It too often leads to denominational jockeying, which in turn leads to sectarian reaction. The one sure solution in almost every case is denominationally disinterested leadership that will neither seek nor permit anything but absolutely democratic self-determination on the part of the community concerned.

Should that self-determination not lead to denominational affiliation, as we believe in the majority of cases it would not, then there should and must be found some form of fellowship for this increasing number of undenominational churches. First of all they need mutual encouragement in their almost pioneer undertaking. Then they need a clearing house for an undenominational or at least an unsectarian ministry, as a continuously available supply of leaders. They need a channel of communication by way of the printed page, which could probably be better supplied by a community church department in some such journal as The Christian Century, than by an exclusive publication.

Finally, they need and must have a channel of missionary activity or they will become self-centered and consequently self-destroyed. We have thought that this missionary need could be supplied by the making of missionary appeals and giving each individual the privilege of designating the denominational channel through which his gift was to go. While this may meet a temporary emergency it will lack the enlightenment of a consistent missionary literature and the driving force of a unified missionary appeal. And the troublesome question is still unanswered. Will the missionary giving of these community churches—which must as yet “come up through much tribulation”—be used in part in the home field to perpetuate that “tribulation” for similar churches in similar communities? Will that portion of their missionary giving be worse than wasted? C. V. ALLISON.

The Community Church—Never!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Ever since the sensational statements of some Interchurch workers got into the press, regarding the overchurched condition in towns and rural communities, many uninformed but would-be reformers have been breaking into print periodically, advocating the elimination of churches by some organized combination. The statements of the Interchurch workers regarding overlapping were tremendously overdrawn; something like the premature announcement of Mark Twain's death, which he declared to be “greatly exaggerated.” The writer has traveled many thousands of miles—not looking for overchurched areas but for underchurched opportunities. Where one case of overlapping occurs, over against it is set a dozen communities without adequate religious instruction either through organized Bible schools or orthodox churches.

This persistent plea, by editors of religious journals, who ought to know better, for what they term “community churches,” by which they evidently mean the conduct of social service and all sorts of community affairs including the public dances, without religious restrictions, superintended or ministered to by “free lances” subject to nobody—not even God Almighty; whose conduct is seldom above reproach, and whose theology borders on rank infidelity with almost an entire absence of Christianity. They have substituted their own sweet wills for the commands of Christ and as to the Bible—it is well enough to read and study it as literature but as to receiving it as the Word of God, they would prefer ancient mythology.

The writer wishes to say that the best way to spread infidelity and freakish semi-religious ideas is by way of the independent community churches. The preacher who has convictions cannot minister to such a heterogeneous mass. It becomes necessary for such community monstrosities to call as leaders those who cannot hold pastorates in orthodox, evangelical churches. “Like priest like people.” The leaders being devoid of conscience, their flocks are also unreligious not to say irreligious. May the Lord deliver our land from the much lauded “community church” which many over-zealous but uninformed editors and churchmen advocate to the exclusion of those that “hew to the line” and really stand for something, religiously, in a community. SIR: Enclosed find check for renewal of subscription. I had intended to drop your publication, not because I do not appreciate it, but through the necessity of decreasing my list of papers.

Two letters discontinuing subscriptions in your issue of December 30 changed my mind—one from a Baptist pastor in Jackson, Michigan, who seems to think Christ came to teach baptism by immersion rather than to bring salvation to men, one from another Baptist pastor of Harmony, Maine, who has substituted verbal inspiration and Bible Institute pharasaism for Christian faith and life.

I do not always agree with your position on every question, but I believe a paper which manifests your fairness and freedom of spirit is entitled to the support of all ministers who have been delivered from the sin of the fixed mind.

A Canadian on Ireland

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The article by Alva W. Taylor, in your issue of February 3, comes as a surprise to some of your readers, although, I suppose, it is explained by your editorial attitude of a wide freedom of discussion. It is a sample of articles appearing in the American press that, whether intended or not, are helping the trouble-raising propaganda between the United States and England and, from another angle, the equally insidious propaganda directed against the British Empire, as such. I, for one, regret that The Christian Century is aiding in this by giving publicity to so one-sided an article as the one referred to. There is no word in it of genuine censure for the cruel and cowardly murders committed by the Sinn Feiners. When the writer includes Sir Hamar Greenwood as a tory imperialist, it is a piece of unconscious humor to all who know this Canadian, who has always been a Liberal, indeed, a radical Liberal.

Or when the writer of the article refers to General Dyer, it is merely a one-sided statement of the case although it is difficult at this distance to act as a final judge in such a complicated matter. Your correspondent's nightmare fear of “tory imperialism” is one that has disturbed the sleep of many a good citizen of the United States ever since the Revolutionary War. Tell him that it is the extreme of improbability that Lloyd George would ever head a Tory imperial government!

Your correspondent's plea for poor Ireland, while it stirs one's sympathies, does not affect one's judgment.

British Table Talk

London, February 1, 1921.

MUCH as Britons are exercised over Ireland, unemployment, reparations from Germany, national finance, disaffection in India, complications in Egypt, and other burdens of empire, no question grips us at bottom more than the joint one of our relations with the United States and the future of the League of Nations. For in it is involved not only the welfare of people now living, but the happiness of posterity, and indeed the fate of civilization. Viscount Grey says, "If you tell me that the Council of Nations is utopian, I reply that I prefer the chance of utopia to the certainty of destruction." Emphasizing "the critical and supreme importance of a cordial understanding between the peoples of the United States and Great Britain," Sir George Adam Smith declares that "nothing less than the peace of the world depends upon it." Every British visitor returning from America brings a mingled story of a strong desire there to strengthen the ties between the two nations and of deplorable misunderstanding and suspicion. The British delegation—Canon Burroughs, Rev. R. C. Gillie, Dr. Alexander Ramsay, and Mr. Harold Spender—to the American Mayflower celebration gave a better report than some others, namely: "There is a predominant section in the Protestant churches of America which is as warmly disposed as ever to Britain. Their good feeling has suffered no check. We were constantly assured not only by the special gatherings we addressed but by people we met that the overwhelming Republican victory must not be regarded as a vote against the League of Nations, but only against 'Wilsonism'; and that the vociferous support of Sinn Fein claims and of anti-British feeling must not be taken as the expression of the heart and mind of the best American thought and feeling or indeed of the majority. There were some signs that the inflammation brought about by the Irish problem had passed its height. But the possibilities of alienation of American sentiment by reprisals and reactionary methods in Ireland are still grave." Mrs. Barnett tells us that on the eve of the Presidential election "everyone declared that whoever was elected the League of Nations was safe, either directly or indirectly." All on this side are agreed that there can be no satisfactory league unless the United States is in it.

The Lion and the Lamb?

With his usual frankness, Dean Inge of St. Paul's, has given his views on the Lambeth reunion proposals. He asserts that, to avoid splitting the conference, the report used language elaborately civil and conciliatory towards non-Episcopalians, while maintaining the rigid principle that episcopal ordination was a necessary condition of recognition. He asked a prominent member of the conference, Do the Bishops really think that the Presbyterians, who set up a separate organization solely because they did not wish to be governed by bishops, are likely to submit to episcopal ordination? He replied that any other policy would have split the conference, and he himself would be quite willing to be reordained and reconsecrated by a Roman bishop if that were the price of reunion. So, comments Dean Inge, the stiffest of the monopolist churches, Rome, is to impose its terms on the next stiffest, the church of England, which in turn will do the same to bodies that do not attach any importance to the so-called apostolical succession; and this is called reunion! "It sounds like the 'synthesis of the lion and the lamb' of which logicians speak." The dean quite accurately says that nonconformists want reunion because (1) they wish to see an end of religious snobbery, and (2) to be allowed on occasions of national supplication and thanksgiving to join on an equal footing with Anglicans, and (3) they regard the interchange of pulpits as a brotherly act. He might have added, the most important reason of all, that a united church would be able to cope more effectively with the forces of evil. Like Bishop Henson, Dean Inge counsels "direct action" in the matter of pulpit exchange without waiting for episcopal sanction. This line is being increasingly taken. By preaching last Sunday, January 30, in Westminster Abbey in the morning and in Westminster Chapel in the evening for Dr. Jowett, Dr. Henson again set an example of Christian catholicity. In the latter sermon addressing a congregation of over 2,500 people, the bishop, who wore cassock, surplice, hood and stole, spoke of the moral bankruptcy of the world, the failure of secularism, and the overthrow by the war of the old shallow optimism of the churches. A dramatic incident occurred at a Wesleyan circuit gathering when the bishop of Litchfield closed a fraternal speech by saying to the superintendents, "I am ready at any time to kneel and ask you to lay your ordaining hands, as representing the Wesleyan church, upon my head." The superintendent and Rev. J. E. Rattenbury declared that Dr. Kempthorne's word removed their "last difficulty." But even if, which is doubtful, such an act would have the same significance and value as the episcopal laying on of hands, the Lambeth Conference certainly did not mean it so. The forthcoming report of the special Free Church committee on the Lambeth proposals will make clear that episcopal ordination of nonconformist ministers is the crux of the whole problem of reunion.

To Christianize Industry

While earnest spirits in all the churches are striving to win the confidence of the workers and have industry conducted on Christian principles, Anglicans appear to be making such efforts in a more zealous and systematic way than nonconformists—excepting the Quakers, who have a splendid record in this regard. The Christian Social Union, founded by Bishop Foss Westcott and for many years led by Canon Scott Holland, has been absorbed by the Industrial Christian Fellowship. The former body consisted mainly of theoretic Socialists in comfortable circumstances; the latter makes a direct appeal to industrial workers themselves. The Bishop of Litchfield at a recent meeting of the new organization urged the church to present the entire gospel to the people and apply the teaching of Christ to every side of life. Canon Donaldson asserted that unemployment could only be cured by transforming the present competitive system, for profit, into a cooperative service, for use. A resolution in this sense was passed, also one demanding for workers a share in business management and responsibility, and another calling upon Christian men and women to translate into action the ideals of fellowship and service which are now widely accepted. The Bishop of Sodor and Man asked why it is that, while Christ is honored by a large proportion of the labor party, the church is disowned if not despised? A changed attitude on the part of the church in general towards the new age and its demands is, he says, urgently needed; it must welcome and support the ideals of the industrial world. Bishop Gore points out that the industrial system, as a national institution, was allowed to grow up on principles which Christ repudiated, and it practically became a slavery of the poor to an extent which no one can realize unless he has studied the conditions that obtained in England a hundred years ago, when the church was silent. Dr. Gore declares that the perpetual conflict between Capital and Labor cannot go on indefinitely, and that we are in danger of drifting into disaster and revolution. What is needed is to translate Christianity into economic terms. And there's the rub! Who will do it? Few of those who advocate the Christianization of industry are themselves engaged in it or have power to control it. A brave effort is a recently started (by Miss T. Wilson Wilson, a Quaker lady) Shareholders' Movement, whose aim is to induce investors to pledge themselves to accept no dividends until they are satisfied that the workers have received a fair return for their toil.

Personal

Recovered from his recent accident, Dr. Clifford, C.H., has resumed public work. On Sunday afternoon, January 23, he addressed a south London Brotherhood and on February 1, preached at the anniversary of the Tuesday Midday Service in Bishopsgate Chapel, which he started in 1902.—Soon after his return from America, Rev. T. Rhondda Williams' health broke down, and he is unable to preach. He thinks that there will soon be a great revival of religion and pacificism in the United States.—Dr. Orchard, "whose plans for the future are uncertain," is resting in the country. He says the Society of Free Church Catholics is already international in a small way, and "there is no telling what its growth will be when it gets hold on America."—The new Canon of Westminster is Dr. V. F. Storr, Canon of Winchester and for fifteen years a Hampshire rector; he is a scholar, a modernist, and a strong personality.—General Booth leaves London about the middle of February for a campaign in the far west of the United States and Canada.—Professor Alexius de Boer, who was professor in the University of Koloszar (now Cluj), Transylvania, and Curator of the Reformed Church, but preferred exile to taking the oath of allegiance to the King of Rumania, proposes to visit America in August to attend the meeting of the Constitution Committee of the World Conference on Faith and Order in Atlantic City and the Pan Presbyterian Council in Pittsburgh.—Bishop Nikolai Velimirovich has left England for a three months' mission to organize the Serbian Church in America.—Bishop Welldon has sailed for East Africa; he will be guest of the Bishop of Zanzibar, who was a pupil of the bishop when he was Master of Dulwich College. Dr. Welldon advocates a much more frequent interchange between the clergy at home and abroad.—Dr. Douglas Adam, whose Talks to Men have been very popular with student audiences in America, is giving some in London, concurrently with preaching at Westminster Chapel.—Mr. Arthur Jones, managing director of Marshall Field & Co., the great Chicago storekeepers, has sent a cheque for 1000 pounds to the Vicar of Llanbedarn, Aberystwyth, for the church he attended as a boy.—Rev. J. Harryman Taylor, who delivers the Hartley lecture in June, is Dr. Guttry's successor at Prince's Avenue Church, Liverpool.—Rev. Carey Bonner, for twenty-one years general secretary of the Sunday School Union, has been elected president of the Union for the year beginning in May.—The three sisters of Rev. F. W. Macdonald, who, aged 79, is seriously ill, married the father of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Sir E. J. Poynter, and Sir E. Burne-Jones, respectively.—Dr. Monro Gibson, aged 83, for many years minister of St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, London, who was trained for the ministry in Toronto, and was for a time assistant to Dr. Wm. Taylor, at Montreal, is in a very weak state of health.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Who Is Christ's Friend?*

YES, here we are doing just what Jesus foretold—lauding the woman who broke the alabaster cruse and anointed the Master. Wherever the gospel shall be preached, throughout the entire world, that which this woman hath done will be told as a memorial of her. It is a pleasure to help carry out Jesus' word.

And what is there about this incident that merits attention? The element of reckless extravagance, the element of abandon, the element of going to the limit in a good piece of business. We are so used to reservations. This friend of the Master teaches us to fling precaution to the winds and to go in full length for our Lord. A small measure of that priceless ointment might have sufficed—would have had the ordinary church member been making the gift. We certainly have our impulses to generosity under remarkable control! This woman and that other—the widow who cast in all that she had, teach the same needed lesson. I know a rich farmer who owns 220 acres of land, who keeps 40 cows, whose barns are bulging with grain and hay, who gave the magnificent sum of three dollars a year to his church. The poor pastor who served that congregation almost starved and had to go without nearly everything. That church needed this sermon. A Massachusetts manufacturer paid thousands of dollars to take a carload of blooded dogs to the St. Louis dog show while little children were starving among the employes of his factory. One hundred and fifty thousand school teachers and twenty thousand ministers have been starved out of their callings while a nation has been passing through an orgy of extravagance. Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey, where wealth piles up or is spent in wild revelings and where the two most essential vocations—teaching and preaching—are starved out. I say this to your everlasting shame. The report on the Steel Strike shows that the steel workers received about three times as much as preachers and teachers. Preachers averaged the munificent amount of $750 per annum. If $2000 is the minimum living wage what have these servants of humanity been doing?

With what reserve we approach missions! One day after a minister had preached a passionate sermon asking for money for the fields of the church a woman, dwelling in a beautiful home and whose husband drew a generous salary said, "Were you not ashamed yesterday to go after the people so hard for missionary money?" "No," replied the pastor, "but I am ashamed of the people who spend dollars for vanity and pennies for Jesus." And that woman opened her pocketbook and made the offering of her life. Churches where the combined annual income of the members would amount into the millions give paltry hundreds to vast missionary causes. We can give when we are touched; witness the war drives. But those days are over and the reaction is in force.

With what reserve we approach the church finances. I know a big business man who for a time handled the church envelopes in a prosperous church. He is himself a most generous soul, but when he saw the dimes and nickles and quarters given by people of ability he said he felt like throwing the whole offering out of the window and quitting the game. Can you blame him? Millions for business and pennies for the church. You know people who spend three times as much per week for movies as they spend for church maintenance. This is atrocious, and the lesson of this friend of Jesus who gave him all is needed. But I knew a stenographer who gave one-tenth of her income to the church. I know several wealthy people who give vast sums for benevolences. Generosity is the supreme test of genuine Christianity. Orthodoxy is no criterion. Often water-tight orthodoxy and tight pocketbooks go together. Reckless giving for the Kingdom is a sure sign of a great heart. No wonder we sing the praises of this woman. Her lesson is needed now—very much.

BOOKS

DARKWATER. By W. E. B. Du Bois. This is a passion-stirring book, a notable contribution to the literature of revolt. It will inevitably arouse deep prejudices, but—perhaps all the more for this reason—it should be widely read in America. As literature alone, both in prose and in verse, it is well worth while. As a demonstration for the benefit of those who do not believe in the intellectual and artistic creativeness of the Negro race, it is indispensable. Further than this, the author depicts in startling fashion both the objective facts of repression which people of dark skin are suffering, North and South, and the ominous subjective consequences in the souls of black folk. There is more than a trace of bitterness, which the sympathetic reader must regret but which he cannot fail to understand.

Mr. Du Bois reveals in one sentence his whole attitude and purpose; his "one life fanaticism has been belief in his Negro blood." He spurns all patronage given to a "backward people." To him the condition of the American Negro is totally without anthropological significance; rather it is a monument to a sociological crime. There is to his mind no special Negro problem, only a problem of exploited and oppressed races—black, brown or yellow. "The world war was primarily the jealous and avaricious struggle for the largest share in exploiting darker races." Over against the rape of Belgium he puts the Belgian atrocities in the Congo. Echoing Mr. H. G. Wells, he finds in Africa a key to future war or peace. In place of the present regime under which "nearly 250,000,000 acres of the best of natives' land" in South Africa are assigned "to a million and a half whites," leaving 36,000,000 acres of swamp and marsh for four and a half million blacks, Mr. Du Bois calls for a new African state, under inter-national control.

It is much to the author's credit that he at no time allows his absorption in the race issue to warp his vision of economic history. The Civil War, he says, was "a duel between two industrial systems, one of which was bound to fail because it was an anachronism and the other bound to succeed because of the industrial revolution." His treatment of the race problem in the North, reveals a comprehensive grasp of the economic factors. An emotional extravagance that expresses itself in ill-chosen literary devices mars the book in places, but it remains a very significant bit of writing with a challenge to any but an wholly impervious mind. (Harcourt, Brace & Howe. $2.00.)

THE WORKERS AT WAR. By Frank Julian Warne. Every minister and social worker can afford to own this book. It contains industrial history in America covering the period of the World War, and includes valuable documents, a knowledge of which all who are speaking on social questions ought to possess. Its social philosophy is wholesome. The last five chapters, entitled "Democracy in Industry," "The Three Parties to Production," "Industrial Autocracy and the Consumer," "Industrial Autocracy and the Corporation," and "The Organization of the Consumer," furnish important information and good theory which it is worth while for any one to read. The writer is not at all afraid to criticize the present system and yet he does it with a fairness and objectivity which carries conviction. (Century Co. $3.00.)

THE SOUL OF JOHN BROWN. By Stephen Graham. The author of this book is an Englishman who has journeyed through the south to see how the former slaves are getting on. He finds a growing racial consciousness which resents the discriminations against negroes. With the impartial eye of the outsider he discerns the injustice of the negro paying the same fare on railroads for inferior accommodations and paying taxes without getting their streets improved. He finds in America a tendency for negro groups in the great cities to become self-sufficient with their own professional men. At the same time he sees in the negro a man hastily introduced to civilization who has a long distance to travel yet. The book makes a real contribution to the race question in this country which is one of our foremost national questions. (Macmillan, New York.)

A PEOPLE'S LIFE OF CHRIST. By J. Patterson-Smyth. The title indicates that the author makes no pretensions to critical scholarship in this work. The problems of the miracles, the virgin birth and the resurrection are quite brushed aside. The contribution to the subject matter is a piece of fine writing which has devotional spirit, imagination and some information about the holy land. The subject matter is homiletical rather than historical. (Revell's, New York.)

OLD TESTAMENT HEROES OF THE FAITH. By Rev. Frank T. Lee, D.D. A series of homiletical studies of old testament characters is the main substance of this volume. That Abraham and Jacob for instance are real historical characters and not tribes is assumed by the writer. In the treatment of the book of Daniel there is the assumption of the modern critical position. The studies are well written and calculated to be of service to one who wishes to realize more fully the homiletical possibilities of the old testament. (The Stratford Co., Boston.)

The Call of the Christ

By HERBERT L. WILLETT

SELDOM has the challenge of Jesus to the present century been presented so earnestly, so persuasively. As a vital, living, convincing portrayal of Christ, scholarly yet simple, positive but not dogmatic, spiritual but not pietistic, it is a delight and an inspiration. A few of the eighteen chapter titles are: "The Authority of Christ," "The New Life in Christ," "The Sympathy of Christ," "The Uniqueness of Christ," "The Fearlessness of Christ," "The Perennial Christ." "The book," says the Heidelberg Teacher, "is the utterance of a heart that has experienced the might and power of the Christ, and burns with a passion for the needs of the rising generation."

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Disciples Delinquent on Interchurch Underwriting.

The Disciples of Christ have received up to the present moment on their underwritings to the Interchurch World Movement $64,490.11 and the goal to be reached is $600,000. The amount already subscribed comes from about 700 churches. The secretaries announce that the campaign for a special fund will be continued. The Baptists had the joy recently of announcing that their underwritings were all paid. The Baptist boards borrowed part of the money, which will doubtless have to be paid back out of future receipts. Of the Baptist money, $300,000 was provided by the Rockefeller family. The Presbyterians have their underwritings arranged for, as have the Methodists, the latter denomination taking the money out of the Centenary Fund. Some of the smaller denominations are greatly embarrassed to meet their obligations.

Presbyterians Will Give Expositions

The Presbyterians have arranged to give missionary exhibitions in various cities of New York during this month. The moving picture will be utilized to present the problems of the mission lands. There will be missionary pageants, exhibits and explanatory lectures in order to set forth fully the work of the Presbyterian denomination upon the foreign field. The pageant which will be most used is called "The Striking of America's Hour." Some of the returned missionaries will help in the expositions and these will appear in native costumes. It is hoped to make the theme of missions the most interesting thing in the city where the exposition is held. These expositions are being modeled after visual publicity methods used in recent years by the Church Extension Committee of the Chicago presbytery. The new financial conditions of the world make the collection of missionary funds more difficult, but the intrepid apostles of world evangelization are never to be daunted by difficulties but only redouble their efforts.

President-elect Kind to His Pastor

President-elect Harding was responsible for the selection of the pastor of Trinity Baptist church, of Marion, O. It was by a mere chance that one evening he heard Dr. T. H. McAfee in a Baptist church in Portsmouth, Ohio, after having spoken that day in a Methodist church. Recently Dr. McAfee was stricken with a stroke of paralysis which has affected his entire right side. The church has granted the afflicted pastor a year's absence and secured a supply for him. Under good care he hopes to be himself again. The supply has been provided for by Mr. Harding and besides this many personal gifts have found their way to the parsonage. Not long before the minister's illness he had preached a sermon which made a deep impression upon Mr. and Mrs. Harding which was entitled "Compelling God to Do Certain Things."

Bible on the Bill-Boards

An unknown layman of Cleveland has provided that during the coming year there should be a continual display of scripture texts upon the bill-boards of Cleveland. The boards vary in size from 10x50 to 20x30. F. M. Barton, editor of the Expositor, is the representative of the layman who remains unknown in spite of various efforts that have been made to learn his identity. The scripture texts so far chosen emphasize the older evangelical view of religion.

Returns to Missionary Field

Rev. Jasper T. Moses was for a time missionary in Mexico under the direction of the woman's mission board of the Disciples of Christ, but for health reasons he had to return to the United States. More recently he has served as secretary of the Editorial Council of the Religious Press, and publicity secretary of the Federal Council. He has recently been appointed by the United Christian Missionary Society for a fresh term of service in Mexico and will serve for a time as secretary to the Committee on Cooperation in Mexico. He will also be manager of the Union Evangelical Press in Mexico City. No one has yet been named to take up the duties being laid down by Mr. Moses in New York City. It is interesting to Disciples readers to remember that Mr. Moses is the son of the former president of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

Negro Would Lead His People Back to Africa

The typical American "nigger-hater" after he has exhausted his profanity usually winds up by saying the negroes should all be sent back to Africa. It is a somewhat new angle in the case to find a negro orator and leader advocating a return to Africa as a matter of racial pride and independence. Marcus Garvey is a native negro of Jamaica who went to New York in 1914. As is well known to those familiar with the West Indies, he found discriminations against the negro in America that were unknown in his native island. He has broken with his Catholic church fellowship, and is now promoting a secularist organization called the Negro Improvement Association, and also the African Communities League. He seeks to promote a racial consciousness among the negroes of the world. He has arrangements with a steamship company for taking negroes back to Africa and hopes to organize native African industries. All of this is quite alarming to Christian leaders, who have always depended upon the negro to stay put in the church. The unrest of the world is coming to negroes as well as whites, and unless some kinds of discrimination are removed, the consequences to religion and to interracial cooperation in industry may be serious.

Church Selects a Staff of Workers

Central Christian Church of Denver, under the leadership of Rev. James E. Davis, is reaching out into many fields of social service. There will be a staff of four henceforth. Miss Katheryn M. Peckham has been called from Kansas City to have charge of the finances of the church. Miss Bertha Hazen has been secured as a visiting nurse. The work among girls will be led by Miss Laura C. Wilcox. The boys will also be given special care, but the worker among this group has not yet been selected. This plan of a staff of workers is already in use among Disciples churches in certain large cities of Oklahoma and Texas, and has proven to be a most effective type of organization. In some churches there are professional visitors and there are other churches which secure the entire time of a musical leader who trains various choruses in the parish to render music in the church service.

Russians and Americans Fraternize

A mixed group gathered about the dinner table the evening of Feb. 15 at Brotherhood House, 180 West Fourteenth St., Chicago. The occasion was a dinner attended both by native born Americans and Russians. The Russians were catalogued as being bolshevists, anarchists, menshivicks and those who are orthodox in their political economy. Among the Russians was a professor and also the editor of a daily newspaper. The addresses of the evening were both in Russian and English. Rev. John Johnson, the Disciples Russian pastor, interpreted for each group. The burden of the short talks, a dozen or more in number, was the need of better international understandings and the growth of the idea of world brotherhood. The socialist editor was particularly keen in assessing the value of various kinds of mission work being done among the immigrants of the city. He referred to the older type whose chief motive was to get the immigrant to join some organization without much care as to what happened to his inner life. He asserted that the Brotherhood House was concerned with service chiefly and for that very reason it would be more successful in moulding the lives of men. He referred feelingly to the "Christ principle in the soul." The dinner was so successful that it will become a monthly feature of the Brotherhood House. Rev. Karl Borders is director of the House.

Comity Will Rule in Spanish-American Work

Since the war the Mexican immigration has continually increased. The recent meeting of the Home Missions Council considered this question as one of the most important before the Council. The following is reported by the organization to be their findings: "The achievements of the Council represent the growing values of effective cooperation between the various churches. Comity rules are applied with increasing force. The Superintendent's Council of Southern California was recognized as the functioning comity agency for work of Christian churches and missions of the southern area of this great state among the large and growing Mexican population engaged in the great railway systems, picking the cotton in the Imperial Valley, working in citrus groves, in vineyards and as walnut, peach and apricot pickers. For other great areas of Mexicans in Arizona, New Mexico and Texas separate comity committees to meet at least twice a year were appointed. The chief duties of these committees will center not upon alleviating friction and overlapping which exists in small degree, but on the task of assigning tasks to responsible missionary agents for unoccupied territory and incomplete work. It was agreed that new work should be begun only after the Committee on Comity in the area concerned has had opportunity to pass upon the advisability of the proposed work."

Pastor Takes Pessimist to Task

The prophets of evil have foretold the downfall of every one of the great institutions of the human race. One by one these have been declared failures. The novelists have been concerned to prove that marriage is a failure. Others say that education is a failure. Just now it is popular in some parts of the world to prove that government is a failure. It is not surprising, therefore, that some insist that the church is a failure. Dr. C. L. Goodell, secretary of Evangelism for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, was speaking recently in Kansas City, addressing some church audiences and also the ministerial alliance. He protested vigorously the pessimistic utterances concerning the religious organizations and asserts that the church is at least sounder than business. The eminent divine says that in twenty-five years he has seen at least two-thirds of the signs taken down from the front of business houses in his section of New York.

Collection Plate Is Abolished

There is sentiment in many parts of America for the abolition of the collection plate. Two Disciples churches have made the change within the past month, substituting a box at the door for the usual offertory service. Rev. William M. Mayfield, pastor of Roanoke Christian church of Kansas City says of his experiment: "Ours is an idealistic program dependent upon the sense of honor and duty of members of the congregation. Certain ones who have always longed to attend church where the collection plate was not passed have voiced that desire. That is how the change came about." While there seems to be no loss of revenue on the part of the churches making the change, one wonders whether there is not a distinct loss in worship. The giving of the sacrificial animal was the center of Old Testament worship. Has not the offertory some rightful place along with the communion service and the prayers? This question will be considered doubtless by those congregations which seek to make the change in methods of gathering funds.

Universalist Laymen Are Organized

Following the success of the Unitarians in organizing their laymen, the Universalists have developed an organization for their men. This is called the Universalist Comrades. It was originated by a Universalist layman of New York, and a member of the Church of the Divine Paternity. From this small start in a few months the society has grown to thousands of members, scattered all over New England. The society will next be introduced into the middle west, promoted by the Universalist headquarters in Chicago. The society is pledged to help allay social unrest while working to better social conditions. It will work with the various civic organizations that have similar ideals. It will especially endeavor to put behind the Universalist churches the enthusiastic support of the laymen of these churches.

Historic Church Continues its Strength

Old South Congregational Church of Boston is one of the few churches that stayed in the trinitarian fold at the time of the theological upheaval a hundred years ago. Though a down-town organization in a city which is now predominantly catholic, it maintains its strength. The annual report shows that the present membership is 996, compared with 1011 a year ago. The collections for benevolences during the past year were $38,626, nearly $6,000 more than the past year. The total budget of the church is $88,827. In addition to this the members of the church contributed to the Pilgrim Tercentenary fund a total of $171,498.49. The pastor of the church, Dr. Gordon, is known for his literary gifts. His prophecies concerning the Interchurch World Movement brought him some criticism, but in the light of later events, no one seems disposed to take him to task for that attitude.

Open Winter Favors the Churches

The open winter which has prevailed over much of the country has been specially favorable to church work. Instead of being ice-bound during January and February, the churches have been unusually active and have secured a long start for the special activities of the Lenten season. At Central Christian church, of Dallas, Texas, the ushers carried chairs into the aisles on the morning of Feb. 6. On the evening of that same day chairs were placed in every available space to accommodate the congregation of Norwood Christian church of Cincinnati, where Rev. C. R. Stauffer ministers. He was concluding a special series of sermons which had attracted wide attention. Norwood church runs a nursery on Sunday morning so the babies and small children may be cared for while the mothers worship. This live church has organized a calling committee which will make a thousand calls in behalf of the church this coming month.

One-Third of Baltimore Goes to Church

Rev. L. W. McCreary is the efficient federation secretary in Baltimore. He recently put on a canvas to determine just how many people in the city went to church on a given Sunday. While the population of the city is 734,000, it is estimated that 600,000 are of church-going age. A count of the morning and evening audiences in 349 of the largest churches showed an attendance of 207,180. Mr. McCreary estimates that 80,000 persons may have attended the services at the small outlying churches of the city. Adding these figures, he comes to the conclusion that 47 per cent of the population was in church on Sunday. Since a number of the more loyal Protestants go to church twice on Sunday, it may be necessary to reduce the percentage somewhat, but it is safe to assert that at least one-third of the citizens of Baltimore were in church on a given Sunday. This figure is probably very much larger than would be found in many of the cities of the land. While some cities have church attendance established as a social custom, quite the contrary is the case in others.

Live Methods in Christian Endeavor Societies

The Christian Endeavor movement still shows originality in method. New modes of service are being devised in various cities. In the Pacific District Union in Oregon the sick are being provided with flowers and the shut-ins in the various cities are being taken to church in automobiles. The society takes an interest in the cleanliness of the city, having special reference to lawns, vacant lots and streets. The Washington Heights District Union of New York is greatly interested in holding religious services where they are not ordinarily held. The hospital service is especially noteworthy. The patients are given a song service, and magazines are distributed at the hospitals. At Greensboro, N. C., there were twenty-nine baskets of provisions given out during the past Thanksgiving season.

Religion on the Upgrade in Canada

The Interchurch Forward Movement of Canada did not fail and the success of this common enterprise has resulted in a great increase of religious interest all over the nation. The annual meetings in the churches are showing fine reports of achievements the past year. In many cases the salaries of ministers have been increased, and old debts have been wiped out. In Toronto the results have been especially noteworthy. A Sunday evening service started last September has grown from week to week until the largest auditorium in the city fails to seat the people who wish to attend. One of the churches of the city has been driven to secure a theater in which to hold the Sunday evening service, and there is now a weekly attendance of three thousand at this service. The Baptists have an evangelistic drive in progress as do the people of the Salvation Army. It is said that the national revival of religion has spread as far as Newfoundland where there is also a deep religious interest. The cause of church unity has progressed farther in Canada than in the United States, and this is the reason that Canadians have been able to cooperate more effectively in the practical enterprises of the kingdom.

Board of Temperance Has New Leader

The Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare of the Presbyterian church has secured Rev. Clarence G. Reynolds, D. D., former pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian church, of Elizabethtown, N. J., as their new secretary. Dr. Reynolds has had a very successful career in the pastorate. In his new work he will be the visiting minister of Bellevue Hospital and will represent the presbytery at Fox Hill Public Hospital for soldiers and sailors. Dr. Reynolds will preach for Fox Hill men every Sunday. The Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare not only deals with prohibition enforcement, but also with the question of commercialized recreation and the family life.

Program Before the Building

When the official board of the Disciples church of Evanston, Ill., came together recently to consider the question of a new building, it developed that no one knew exactly what they wanted to do in that building. A structure costing $150,000 was considered as a contribution to Disciples prestige in the city, but it was argued that building sanctuaries to establish prestige was not a very religious proceeding. The result of the discussion was that the pastor should spend two months in studying modern church programs in communities sufficiently similar. He was instructed to bring back photographs of buildings and complete data on programs. By a study and comparison of the different parish programs, it will be decided whether there is a job for the Disciples in Evanston that is big enough to justify a building costing so much money. If the work is there to be done, it is believed by the official board that the building can be erected. When the pastor has finished his survey of Chicago, he will go to other cities in the middle west for studies. Just now he is hunting the successful church.

Proposes to Interchange Students

The interchange of students is one of the devices relied upon by friends of world peace. Just now Rev. Orwin E. Cook, educational secretary of the Methodist Annual Conference of Mexico is in this country negotiating to get scholarships for Mexican young men who would come to this country to study. The project has the blessing of President Obregon. Already some young men are studying at the University of Texas and Northwestern University has arranged to receive some of the students.

University President Resigns

Dr. R. H. Crossfield, president of Transylvania University, has resigned. Dr. Crossfield has been president of the university since 1908, and in those historic thirteen years has brought his institution up to a position where it is well abreast of the times educationally. In his work he has been opposed strongly by reactionary influences among the Disciples, but has continued to hold the support of the Disciples of his own state. He was some time ago given a vacation, as his administrative duties had been so burdensome as to break his health. He has accepted a position as treasurer of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. In this position he will not be simply a banker, but will endeavor to meet the financial

Bishop Nuelson Reports Methodist Progress in Germany

The war has quite changed the attitude of Germany to Methodism, Bishop John L. Nuelson reports in a recent issue of the Northwestern Christian Advocate. The Methodists are administering relief funds in Germany and the bishop is proud to relate that the first food to reach the Germans was that purchased by Methodist money. The bishop went into the interior, attending two Methodist conferences and found everywhere a great interest in the brand of religion which is so popular in America. The bishop says:

"I have been asked, 'Did you not find our work in Germany altogether demoralized and disorganized?' Let me say that I found our work in a most promising condition. In the report of every one of the district superintendents, the statement was made that in most places our churches and halls were too small to contain the crowds that came to hear the gospel. Although the death rate was very high, and although we lost no churches in Alsace-Lorraine and none in Poland, there was a net gain of church membership in Germany of nearly two thousand and about four thousand joined our churches on probation in the last conference year, the district superintendents report that conversions and accessions are going right on. We could go now and hire the largest hall to be found in a city where we are carrying on work and fill it with people. At the sessions of the two German Conferences we hired the largest halls to be found and they were so crowded that the police had to come to prevent people from crowding into the buildings. I was to conduct a service which we were to hold in our First Church at Frankfort, which is quite a large building. My train was somewhat delayed and when I reached the church I could not get into the building because of the solid mass of humanity. I had to be let in through the fire escape. We have access to the people by preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ as the Saviour and Master. The gospel of Jesus Christ finds hearers and shows its power. Several years ago the average contribution per member to the various enterprises of the church was forty-one marks, which at the normal rate of exchange would be $10. Last conference the report was made that the average contribution went from forty-one to seventy-two marks. The people are perfectly loyal to the church and are supporting it as much as they can. Of course, if you reckon in American dollars, seventy-two marks is less than forty-one marks was before the war. The change into American dollars does not give a true representation of the matter."

With regard to the physical conditions in Germany, Bishop Nuelson says:

"Last year I was very much in hopes that the past winter would be the last of the severe winters, that we would no longer be compelled to render physical relief but could turn our whole attention to constructive work. This hope proved to be futile. We are again facing the specter of hunger, cold, disease, starvation. Every letter which I receive from the district superintendents in my area points out the imperative necessity of rendering physical relief. I am a member of the International Committee on Child Welfare and the reports which come to us from all parts of Europe tell the same story. Herbert Hoover makes an appeal to the American people, stating that 3,500,000 children will perish unless the American people continue their assistance. The Friends' service committee is doing an admirable piece of work, giving a supplementary meal every day to 500,000 school children in Germany. They plan to feed one million during this year. I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to give my testimony to the value of this magnificent work. But we must do something also for our own church members, for the mothers, for the smaller children, for the young people out of school, for our 500 deaconesses, for our 300 pastors. They are in need. They cannot help themselves.

"It is not the question of unwillingness to work. Prices are soaring up still higher. Fuel costs thirty to forty times as much as before the war; clothing, milk, butter, fat are very scarce and exceedingly high in price.

"We cannot let our own people who are loyal to the church, who are the salt of the earth, perish for lack of bread."

problem of the Federal Council which is the one problem of the organization that has never had an adequate solution. Through this fellowship he will become known to thousands who are not acquainted with his gracious personality, or his splendid gifts of leadership.

Ministers Start Fight on Commercialized Amusements

The nation-wide efforts of the commercialized amusement promoters will meet a counter this coming year. The ministers in many cities are considering their duty with regard to this matter. In St. Louis the Ministerial Alliance, composed of all the Protestant ministers of the city, has approved proposed legislation that would stop all commercialized amusement on Sunday. They assert that the day should be kept for the rest of men who labor, for the cultivation of the family life and for the worship of God.

Community Building for Recreation

Richland Center, Wis., has been like many another little city in that it had many churches but few of the modern religious methods. There are five Protestant churches and one Catholic church. The churches agreed recently that something should be done for the recreational interests of the town. A committee that looked around for ways and means found a large auditorium, but no equipment in it. The city council was persuaded to equip the building and to employ a full-time director. The old auditorium now has social rooms, gymnasiums, baths and other modern facilities. The churches support some of the activities, and Richland Center is now one of the most up-to-date small towns in the country.

Methodists Want More Money

It is said by some that a Methodist is never happier than when he is passing the contribution plate. Although the southern Methodists raised their centenary quota, and these pledges are not yet paid, they are already planning a new enterprise. They are asking thirty million dollars for the Methodist educational institutions of the Southland. The campaign is being carefully prepared for with a month of prayer, a month devoted to Christian service, and a month devoted to Christian education. It is planned to make the financial campaign also a campaign for a greater consecration on the part of the people. The financial condition in the country is not what it once was so the handicaps to the new campaign are greater than those of the former one.

Colored Church that Succeeds

Most of the colored churches of Chicago are small affairs of thirty members or so. These small churches fit the habits of the negro for he was used to a small church in the southland. As the negro takes on metropolitan ways, however, he begins to see the advantages of a stronger church organization with better preaching and better music. Armour Avenue Christian church in Chicago is led by Rev. G. Calvin Campbell. Mr. Campbell discovered that he needed more equipment so he has worked his way through a course of study at the University of Chicago. In the meantime in a few years his congregation has increased from 175 to 465 members, sixty new members having been received the past year. Over four thousand dollars is on deposit in the bank toward a new building,

Why People Do Not Go to Church

The problem of empty pews is felt in many denominations and recently the Herald of Gospel Liberty secured from its subscribers a number of letters upon the theme, "Why the Dearth of Worshipers." James S. Frost finds some of our new inventions to blame for religious conditions. He says:

"The moving picture portrays war, crime, and violence. The young see it and take that as their ideal. Burglary and shooting come as natural as night follows day. Easy money and high wages call for more money, and crime follows. The automobile helps the bandit and burglar to escape. Strict censorship, with reform of public opinion, must come.

"The automobile, while it helps some to get to the house of God, draws many away on long pleasure trips on the Lord's Day, thus keeping them from the church services and this always means that they will soon lose interest in Christian things.

"Lack of religious training on the part of parents may be mentioned as another contributing cause among all classes. If the child attends Sunday-school, he is thought to do well; but almost of equal importance is attendance on church service, which, if rightly taught, will follow a child through life."

A writer from Holland, Va., who prefers to sign his initials, charges that the empty pews are due to modern views. He says:

"As I view the situation the following are some of the chief reasons for the dearth of worshippers of which our editor complains in a recent splendid editorial:

"1. Rampant Materialism, which denies the supernatural in Christianity.

"2. The New Theology, which claims that Jesus was only a mere man and not a divine Savior.

"3. Higher Criticism, which in a large measure destroys the authority of the Scriptures in the estimation of many scholars, and the reflex influence of their teaching on the masses leads the masses to doubt the truth of the Bible; and doubting the reliability of the Bible, the people (even many members of the church) feel justified in doing as they please, regardless of the teachings of Christianity, and therefore they do not care so much about going up to the house of God to worship."

The most astonishing charge is that of Hermon Eldredge, who asserts that the dearth of worshippers is due to the dearth of worship. He says:

"One reason there is a dearth of worshippers is because there is such a dearth of worship. In many of our churches today, I have been impressed with the lack of depth in the service which should be the worship of Almighty God and which has (sometimes from lack of preparation and sometimes from a promoted 'light and cheerful' atmosphere) come to be 'shallow' and 'thin' and 'modern,' if you please.

"On the other hand, I was in a service some little time ago in which there was an atmosphere of devotion and a sermon of silence and meditation before the service actually began, which was most helpful and impressive."

Of Dr. Joseph Fort Newton the American Journal of Theology says: "It is a striking fact that from a town of the Central West, whose very name is unknown to England, a preacher should have been called to the City Temple, London, a pulpit made famous by Joseph Parker and Dr. Campbell. Mr. Newton is a mystic, but of a different type. He goes back of the long line of doctrinal and ecclesiastical development to Jesus of the Gospels, to the ideal human life in whom God dwelt and through whom God revealed his redemptive love, the divine Saviour and Master of men. This life of the living Christ, touching every life, the soul of every redemptive movement, actually working in men and with men for the world's salvation. His sermons speak especially to cultivated minds, yet through their simplicity and naturalness and humanness, they make the universal appeal. Here is the real power. They do not speak the language of the church, but the language of humanity. They are real sermons of a warm, spiritual, enthusiastic manhood."

Dr. Newton is one of the favorite contributors to The Christian Century, and his books are particularly popular among our book-loving constituency.

Solving the Minister's Problem

An Extract from Lloyd C. Douglas'

"Wanted—A Congregation"

. . . "Crowds? Do you know of very many preachers, Tom, who are surrounded by crowds, today?" Blue spoke bitterly.

"Not many—no. But there are enough to point the moral. You speak as if the people of Middlepoint were not very faithful in their church attendance. Don't you have a good congregation in your church, Dan?"

"About—one hundred and fifty on Sunday morning, when the conditions are just right—the weather, you know; and the season."

"How many people would your church accommodate?"

"More than six hundred, it is said."

"Ah—so that is the trouble!" MacGregor had the air of one unearthing a secret. "I can tell, by your tone, that you are discouraged, Dan. Now I know the reason. It is because you are seeing no results. You would preach like a house afire if you had a congregation! Lacking a congregation, you haven't very much interest in the job—now isn't that so?"

The preacher nodded affirmatively. MacGregor grew spirited.

"That's exactly what ails the preachers of this country, at the present moment, Dan. Nobody to preach to! Why, I can see the whole problem as clearly as if I were its own mother! The preacher knows that he is going to face a small group of lonesome people, scattered in little squads over a big, three-fourths empty meeting-house. It will be exactly the same bunch that was there last Sunday—a few less, perhaps, but no more. So—he gets to work on a sermon for that little handful. Not much wonder if he can't put his full energy into it. Yes, sir; I can see how it would be. Take my own case: If I knew, as I sat down to write an editorial, that the edition of The Star containing it would be limited to one hundred and fifty copies, I would go at it with utter disinterest. Not that these people wouldn't be worth talking to; but because it would be a confession of complete defeat and collapse if my paper were unable to do a larger business than that. But when I know that every pen-stroke means something to twenty-five thousand people, I spur my mind to its best endeavor! Now, suppose, Dan, that you knew, to a moral certainty, that you would have a crowd, next Sunday morning—a compact, shoulder-to-shoulder, alert congregation—wouldn't you go to your task of sermon preparation, with an entirely different attitude than usual?"

"Yes, Tom," sighed Blue, "It is the old story of 'which comes first—the hen or the egg?' To get a crowd, a man must know how to preach with great vigor. To preach with great vigor he must have a crowd. I defy any man to do his best work with a despairing little handful in a vast tank that is built to hold four or five times as many people. It can't be done! Very well; what is he to do about it? Suppose he decides that a large congregation is the only solution to his problem! How does he go about it to recruit it? I'm sure I don't know. I wish I did!"

MacGregor was reproaching himself bitterly for having permitted and encouraged the conversation to this unpleasant quarter. Fine way, indeed, to spend an hour with his old friend of college days—to hold up a mirror so that he might see how feeble were his endeavors. Yet, he had a feeling that to change the conversation now would mean nothing less than that he considered Dan Blue's case beyond help. No; he had gone into this thing, with his eyes open. He must see it through.

"See here, old chap; you've simply got to buck up! I know you! I've heard you speak! I've heard you pour yourself out, many a time, in a way that sent the creeps up and down my spinal column! You've got it in you to be a successful and happy preacher! Give you a crowd—the promise of a crowd—and you would surprise yourself and all your friends in Middlepoint by the sudden release of a volume of unsuspected pulpit power! I know it!"

Blue felt an instinctive tightening of his muscles, a quick—

Before the Book is finished, the problem of Rev. D. Preston Blue—and your problem, too, Mr. Preacher—is pushed far on toward solution.

Singing the Social Gospel

AN OUTSTANDING characteristic of the new hymnal, HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is its modernness. This has been widely commented upon by the hundreds of church leaders who have adopted the book for their congregations. As an illustration of this quality of modernness we would call attention to the unique section on "The Kingdom of God," with sub-sections entitled "Social Aspiration and Progress," "Loyalty and Courage," "Human Service and Brotherhood," "The Nation," "Peace Among the Nations," etc. In this section are 101 great hymns which sing the evangelical social gospel which the modern pulpit preaches. Many of these have never before been used in a Church hymnal. Here are some of the authors' names:

Emily Green Balch
Nolan R. Best
John Hay
Felix Adler
Charles Mackay
John G. Whittier
Ebenezer Elliott
W. Russell Bowie
Charles Kingsley
Rudyard Kipling
Frank Mason North

John Addington Symonds
William DeWitt Hyde
Richard Watson Gilder
Algernon S. Swinburne
Gilbert K. Chesterton
Washington Gladden
William Pierson Merrill
Katherine Lee Bates
Frederick L. Hosmer
John Haynes Holmes
T. Wentworth Higginson

Think of being able to sing the social gospel as well as to preach it! The social gospel will never seem to be a truly religious gospel until the Church learns to sing it. HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH is the only Church hymnal in which the social note of today's evangelical preaching finds adequate expression. The use of this hymnal will thrill and inspire your congregation with a new vision and purpose.

*A returnable copy of the Hymnal will

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT

Sir. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL. D.

A Commentary as well as a Greek Text and Translation

Its Purpose

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT was conceived by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL.D., and carried out under his careful editorship. His purpose was to produce a work which should include all that was most reliable and sane in the international exegesis of the New Testament and to present it in the form of a critical edition of the Greek Text. Scholarship which was scattered through several languages and many books, so that it was accessible only to the few, he purposed to bring together into one comprehensive survey which should have the harmony of critical freedom combined with reverence of faith.

Its Plan

The preparation of the critical introduction and notes to each book of the New Testament was allotted to a separate scholar who was an expert in that department of exegesis. The notes, printed below the Greek Text, are historic and critical in nature; they are suggestive of the deeper spiritual meaning of the context and keep definitely in view both the needs of a student seeking religious insight and the requirements of a minister engaged in a pulpit-ministry.

Description of Books

The set consists of five handsome large quarto volumes—beautifully and clearly printed on paper specially prepared for this work. Bound in durable red buckram. The price is $25.00 for the set complete, with an additional charge, if sent by express, of actual cost of transportation. The price of any single volume is $6.00 plus 20 cents postage.

New Versions of the New Testament

MATTHEW ARNOLD once wrote to Charles Reade, the English novelist: "The old Bible is getting to be to us literary men of England a sealed book. We may think that we know it. we were taught it at home; we heard it read at church; perhaps we can quote some verses, or even passages; but we really know very little of it. I wish, Reade, that you would take up the Old Testament and go through it as though every page were altogether new to you—as though you had never read a line of it before. It will astonish you."

The reason of the wide popularity of the recent versions of the New Testament is simply that they aid the reader in coming to its messages with a sense of freshness. The pages glow with new interest. We recommend as the very best new translations the following:

Moffatt's New Testament, $1.50 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, gilt edges, $1.75, plus 8 cents postage).

Weymouth's New Testament, $2.00 plus 12 cents postage.

The Shorter New Testament (Kent), $1.00 plus 10 cents postage.

The 20th Century New Testament, $2.00 plus 10 cents postage. (Pocket edition, $1.50 plus 8 cents postage).

YALE TALKS

BY CHARLES R. BROWN, LL. D.

ALTHOUGH these "Talks" were delivered at Yale, Harvard and other colleges, they afford a wealth of illustrative material for addresses and sermons to young people, especially to young men. Among the themes are "The True Definition of a Man," "Unconscious Influence," "The Lessons of Failure," "The Men Who Make Excuse," "The Wrongs of Wrong-doing," etc.

Price, $1, plus 8 cents postage.

A Lenten Prayer—For Fellowship in the Sufferings of Christ

DEAR Saviour, in these thoughtful Lenten days we would keep close by Thy side. In the thick of our work and under the burden of all our cares and duties we would yet find leisure of soul for communion with Thee. And do Thou draw near and open Thy heart to us as Thou didst to Thy friends in the long ago. It is Thy comradeship that we most desire, a true and simple understanding of the mind that is in Thee, that we may walk with Thee in the way Thou goest and share Thy will, Thy vision and Thy victory.

May we not set Thee off from us as a being so remote and singular that we cannot think of ourselves as Thy friends, but can only stand in awe of Thee. Forgive us that we have not known Thee or we ought. And forgive our teachers who have drawn false and unhuman pictures of Thy person, robbing us of our Saviour and giving us a God or demigod in Thy stead. Show us, O friendly Master, how human Thou art, how human thus God our Father is, and how divine are these modest lives of ours. Create in us the sense of oneness with God's family whose dual habitation is both heaven and earth. And may we learn to come not less with boldness than with reverence into Thy presence whose face glows with the radiance of the Father's righteous love.

Talk to us as Thou goest with steadfast purpose up to Jerusalem. May we walk in Thy fellowship all the way from Mount Hermon's transfiguring vision to that little hill outside the city's wall which Thy cross has made sublime. What is this cross to which Thou goest? And why dost Thou refuse all other approaches to men's hearts save only the way of a cross? Thou couldst make bread of these stones and buy the allegiance of men through gratitude and dependence. Thou couldst cast Thyself from the temple's pinnacle and compel their acclaim. Thou couldst shrewdly ally Thy human genius with the secular powers that be, and come thereby into rulership of the kingdoms of this world. Why hast Thou rejected the sword for the cross? What is this foolishness of God which Thou wilt not exchange for the wisdom of men? Show us Thy redemptive secret, O Saviour. This mystery at the heart of Thy life haunts us, and we cannot have peace in Thy company until we share its meaning with Thee and commit our ways to its way. Amen.

Outstanding Thinkers Are Religious

THE contention of the old-time infidel that religion is a kind of superstition destined to disappear before the morning sun of learning, has been thoroughly discredited by events. The swing of the pendulum in the ranks of genius is back again toward theism, and toward an appreciation of the historic religions. Of course one can hardly expect geniuses to be orthodox all the time. It is not the nature of genius to voice other men's opinions, but nevertheless the writings of these men indicate a vital awareness of religious reality much as if they had just discovered it. H. G. Wells was for a time a materialist, but now the apostle of a new interpretation of religion. George Bernard Shaw started out as an atheist and an anarchist. Today he is neither. Maeterlinck holds to a belief in God and immortality, though conscious of dissent from the religion of his fathers. Bergson and James held unique conceptions of God, but both men are profoundly religious. Rudolph Eucken considered the question whether we can still be Christians and answers it in the affirmative. Ernest Haeckel who died recently is a striking exception in not being a believer in religious ideas. Chesterton who is touring our country at this time has given his life to exposing the pretensions of those who trade in heresy. His stock in trade is orthodoxy, though his kind of unorthodoxy is quite unorthodox. There are many other names to call, but it is evident to any thoughtful person that it is at least intellectually respectable to be religious. The only question to be considered is whether the man of intellectual virility will choose to come to terms with the historic religions, or strike out alone into the fields of the new religious cults. Those who understand that religion is an ever changing thing will more likely prefer to go with the main division of the Lord's army instead of setting up independent organizations. The real test of truth is its ability to care for itself in the midst of error. Truth that must be segregated in order to live has something the matter with it.

Give the New President a Chance

THE new president was elected quietly. He chooses to be inaugurated with no fuss or feathers. He is already attacked before he has had a chance to perform a single official act. The professional opposition which sets upon all administrations, has sharpened its weapons for him. He seems to some men too quiet to be great. To others his mystery gives promise, for deep waters flow smoothly. The new President deserves his chance. Last fall he was the representative of a political party. Today he is the chosen representative of the whole nation, elected by a clear majority of all votes cast. He faces problems which he did not create, and problems greater than any that have ever faced an American President. We are now in the stream of the world's life. If our international relations are wrongly handled, we can have another war. Our domestic problems are of peculiar complexity. The "open shop" advocates are trying to wreck the labor unions, and if they succeed we shall then have something worse than trade unions, the one big union with bolshevistic ideals. The President brings to his office a Christian character, and an undoubted desire to give us an administration that will stand the test of history. If he is not big enough today to meet his problems, he may, like several other Presidents, grow under the responsibilities of the office. While Mr. Harding enters upon his new duties the Christian church should not cease to pray for him. The efforts of all good citizens should be to promote the spirit of cooperation and good will while the nation under its new leader seeks to find its way through the complexities and hazards of the reconstruction period.

The Keeping of Lent

WHEN the churches were less Christian, they used to delight to shock each other. The Unitarians flaunted their parish house dance at the Methodists, and the Sunday baseball game of the Episcopalian young men was a red rag to the Presbyterians. The Baptists and Disciples delighted to announce how many Congregationalists had been immersed, and all the evangelicals showed their independence of the church year by giving dinners and entertainments in Lent. The community that has churches acting in such spirit still is somewhat belated, but unhappily such communities may be found. The keeping of Lent by the eating of fish will never appeal very much to those who are not conscious of a "Catholic" tradition, but there is no reason why the whole body of believers in Christ should not unite in making one season of the year so outstandingly religious that Christianity would give a fresh challenge to the community. Hence Protestants have laid to one side their old time antipathy to the Christian year as an unauthorized device and this year as never before the call to repentance will go forth, and the gospel for the sinner will be preached with vigor. The devotional life ever needs revival, and there is something that is seasonal in the very spiritual constitution of man. In many churches there is renewed emphasis upon Bible reading and prayer. Central Church of the Disciples in New York in conducting its every-member canvass is bringing to the attention of its members certain great devotional books which are recommended not only for Lenten reading but for habitual use. These books are: "The Daily Altar," by Willett and Morrison; "A Forgotten Secret," by Dawson; "Great Souls at Prayer," by Tileston; and "The Meaning of Prayer," by Fosdick. Let each church find its own way of deepening its religious life, but it can set no higher task for itself than to start the sap of a spiritual spring-time rising through the whole body of its membership.

Competitive Church Building Programs

A CITY of forty thousand inhabitants near Chicago has church building programs under consideration which aggregate over a million dollars expenditure. The churches of this community will in the next five years build most of the church buildings that will be erected during the next twenty-five. In many cases the money is already pledged. It is being paid in during the days of inflation, and hoarded until it will buy more than at present prices. The one thing that no one has done in that community is to look at the problem of religion from the standpoint of the whole community. In many cases buildings will be erected in order to maintain the relative denominational standing in the community. These will be of the auditorium type to furnish background for the work of a distinguished minister. A number of questions need to be asked in this community. What does the church need to do in the different neighborhoods in the city? What kind of buildings are necessary to the service programs which are outlined? What things should be done in a cooperative way, and what things should be regarded as belonging properly to the sphere of the individual church? Could not the architecture of the community be given some common type while providing for proper diversity, so the town would be known for some noble and harmonious buildings as the home of worship and service? These and many other questions need an answer. Held back by the older customs in church building, the ministers have not dared to face each other around the council table. The laymen of a given congregation are often anxious to "steal a march" on their neighbor churches. The innocent bystander who is outside all the churches, but who is asked to give to them all, feels that he has no right to interfere. And so things are drifting. Unless some powerful influence outside the churches challenges their right to this sectarianization of so great a fund, a large portion of a million dollars of the Lord's money may be wasted in useless and competitive enterprises.

The Church and Irish Outlawry

THE Roman Catholic church maintained an outrageous neutrality during the spoliation of Belgium in spite of the protests of the brave cardinal of that little land. During the unhappy civil strife in Ireland there have been parish priests whose unguarded utterances have added fuel to the flames. It is the more gratifying, therefore, to hear Cardinal Logue, the leading churchman of Ireland, take a strong position against ambush and murder, whether practiced by the Sinn Feiners or the black and tan police. There is evidence of approaching sanity among the Irish when Bishop Cohalan of Cork, in the very district where the Irish have suffered most by night violence, asserts that the Irish republic is not yet a fact which the church can recognize as legally constituted. True friends of the Irish on both sides of the water will counsel reason and moderation. Probably the Irish situation might have been settled by now in some workable if not ideal fashion had it not been for American gold, and the journalistic propaganda which has been going on in this country. Southern Ireland has been led to believe that they might hope for America's support even to the point of a war between Great Britain and the United States. As the evidence continues to come in showing that the great body of American citizenship is not willing to shed blood and treasure over the question whether the government of Ireland shall be a dominion like Canada or a republic of Sinn Feiners, the people of Ireland will become more and more willing to negotiate Irish peace in London and Dublin rather than in Washington. We don't agree with those who define the Irish question as a religious question, but it cannot be concealed that the trouble in Ireland is partly a religious problem. If the Catholic plea for Catholic moderation is now met by moderation among the Ulster Protestants, one may hope to see Ireland dropped from the head-lines of our dailies for awhile.

The Men Who Drink Hair Tonic

A MAN came back to a Chicago drug store recently for the second bottle of hair tonic in a single morning. This seemed like an excessive interest in the growth of hair, so the medicine was refused. The man was followed to another drug store where he secured more hair tonic. It was definitely ascertained that he drank the vile decoction for the alcohol which it contained. This man is probably to be pitied more than censured. We have thousands of men with an inherited or a self-depraved thirst. There is a wrong chemistry in their bodies on account of the sins of their fathers or their own vicious habits. The only wonder is that more men of this sort have not been found. They should be directed to physicians for sympathetic treatment for the cure of their alcoholism. It is an unhappy fact, however, that some physicians in Chicago and other large cities have been willing to profiteer on the weaknesses of the hair-tonic drinkers. Some of these have fallen into the hands of the government, and they are now raising the cry of medical freedom. How hypocritical this cry is one can easily see by finding the number of prescriptions for liquor which were written each month. While many physicians never prescribe alcohol for any internal treatment, and most physicians make a very infrequent use of it, some of the sharks and quacks who are now in the toils of the law are said to have issued seven hundred prescriptions a month. The church must not fail in her duty to the hair-tonic drinkers. Most of the great sanitariums where alcoholism is treated employ the methods of moral education. Drug treatment alone is never sufficient. The church has always believed that she had the remedy for weak wills and sinful hearts. There are a good many thousand men in America who need this treatment.

Hooliganism in the Movies

A NATION-WIDE demand is being heard that the big movie syndicates clean house. Even in journals which are by no means of the professional uplift class, the evils of our present show houses are spoken of in notes of reprehension. It has been sufficiently pointed out that the movies have a definite relationship of juvenile delinquency, because of the exhibition of scenes of violence and lust. The effect of the pictures upon the manners of the young is a question almost equally serious. Even where an excellent drama is shown in proper costume and in good acting, there will be a so-called "comic" in which propriety and decency are outraged. Undressing, rude attacks and crude jokes make up the entertainment. The sense of humor among our young instead of being subtle and refined finds its chief occasion in the barrel stave and bathing suit. Manners are akin to morals. They are really of one piece. When refinement and consideration for the feelings of others go, both courtesy and ethical feeling go also. In legitimate drama the play-house learned a long time ago that it was possible to get a temporary popularity for an inferior thing, but in the long run when public taste was affronted, the house suffered in its patronage. Surely there is no one so pessimistic as to say that our movies today represent the average level of culture in America. They are pitched to the lower levels, and if the movie promoters will not give us better pictures, the play-houses should be boycotted for a season. This is the only argument that really counts with some of the commercially minded gentlemen who sit in New York offices and determine what kind of recreation the rest of us shall have, if we go to a motion picture house.

Religion in the Open

ONE of the most encouraging signs of the new day is the fact that the consideration of religious truth is apparently tending toward that open forum in which all our modern interests are weighed and sifted and judged. Ever since the rise of scientific method in scholarship, religion has deemed itself exempt from those processes of investigation which were utilized freely in all other departments of human life. Her defenders shrank from the cold procedures of science and kept her under the protection of dogmas and traditions. Theological seminaries were kept apart from universities like hot house conservatories maintained for the protection of plants against the irregularities of the outdoor climate. As a result, the Christian ministry is the last of the learned professions to adopt the attitude of freedom, of experimentation and of tolerance. As a further result the church has been kept behind other social agencies in its adjustment to the spirit of the new age.

But more rapidly than the church itself realizes, this situation is being changed. One looks in vain for a more aggressively open-minded group of academic graduates than those being sent forth today from our theological seminaries into the pulpits of the land. They are quite willing for religion to be carried into the conflict of ideas in the burly world because they have themselves learned the speech of science, of distinctive modern culture, and have caught the spirit of liberty and free discussion characteristic of the college and university. Occasionally one stumbles upon an educational institution where a sharp line is drawn between the teaching of religion and the teaching of all else, as at a Disciples college in Iowa whose president has virtually inhibited the teaching of religion by the academic faculties of literature, psychology, philosophy, Greek, and the rest, devolving wholly upon the theological seminary across the way the duty and responsibility of forming whatever religious ideas the graduates of that institution take away with them. But this is an exceptional instance. Nowadays in most colleges as much religion is taught in the class rooms of the professors of psychology as in the seminaries. Religion, that is to say, has come out in the open, academically, and finds to its surprise that the air is not so chill nor so uncongenial as was supposed. The submission of the Scriptures to the processes of historical criticism, the consenting of spiritual experience itself to undergo analysis and judgment at the hands of psychology, and the application of the pragmatic philosophy to the entire range of theological ideas, mark the successive steps by which academic religion has left its sequestered position and come out into the open forum of actual life.

This change of atmosphere in the academic study of religion has not yet been matched by a like change in the church itself. Indeed there is still heard an outcry against the colleges, a criticism of the spirit of inquiry, of freedom and of experimentation which is the vital breath of a modern educational institution. As a result the church lags behind its own leadership. It condemns its leadership either to take so advanced a position that there is no group of people at hand to be led or to make such compromises and adjustments that the prophetic fire is quenched. The hesitance of the church in following its leaders appears less on the level of theology or criticism than on the level of social ideals. Here orthodoxy, in its literature and in its work of instruction, continues to live and operate entirely within its own pale. Its arguments and terminology have been and are yet those of special pleading, and its apologetics have been designed to confirm those who were already convinced. The church has done but little to encourage, if it has not actually disapproved, the spirit of free and unhampered social inquiry and action.

The truth of this is illustrated in that brave little book by Professor Fitch, "Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?" This book and the whole attitude it represents is brave in the sense that it dares to state freely and frankly the whole problem of the church in the modern social order, and to face the complete range of facts. It represents for its author and the great multitude who feel as he does an emancipation from the prison house of exemption, and a coming forth of the church into the arena of free discussion of the ultimate questions of religion in an atmosphere of the freest inquiry and in the presence of anarchists, extreme individualists and all sorts of "liberals" and free investigators. Until Fitch's book appeared there was scarcely any bit of literature extant, representing the church, which dealt with those unconventional ideas that have such vitality in our time. It may be said that all such unconventional people should be ignored by the church, that we need not be bothered by "unbelievers" and what they think. The church hasn't bothered much about them, but it is worth while to remember that while Christian scholars have allowed themselves to be hemmed in by orthodoxies of creed, convention, and authority, even the most liberal accepting formal restrictions, "free" teachers of the type of Bakunin and Nietzsche, not to mention many others, have been shaping the religion, or the *ir*religion, of a great part of thinking Europe. Revolutionary thinkers and leaders, whose very names so-called Christian leaders have hardly thought it worth while to know, are discovered now to have been influential in ways and depths quite unforeseen. If Christian teaching never had even a semblance of chance of struggling with atheistic influences for possession of the soul of young Europe, it was due largely to the limitations of the atmosphere and environment of so-called "Christian thought."

Had the whole church stood with Mazzini, basing revolutionary ideals in religious faith and fervor; had there been even the frank approach to the problems of life and faith that Professor Fitch encourages in his "Can the Church Survive?", there might have been a different story. It is doubtful if anywhere outside of the New Testament there is a writing more beautifully idealistic and profoundly moral than the revolutionary pamphlet, by Prince Peter Kropotkin, "An Appeal to the Young." And yet, in that marvelously appealing document, he begins by assuming that the youth of Europe "do not got to hear parsons and ministers rant." The trouble is that that assumption was too well justified; and yet Kropotkin showed how essentially fair, and sympathetic, he could be toward free, vital Christianity, in the chapter on Tolstoi, in his book "Ideals and Realities of Russian Literature."

One great precursor of Professor Fitch there has been, in the appeal for an uncloistered Protestantism, frankly and fully meeting the phenomena and problems of life and thought, without subterfuge and special pleading, and with a new spirit of sympathy and insight replacing regard for dogma and tradition. We refer to Professor Paul Sabatier's "France Today: Its Religious Orientation." It is strange that this, which seems to us the greatest and deepest of Sabatier's books, appears to be the one least known. Appearing some years before the war, when critics saw in France an irreligious, atheistic and pleasure-loving people, Sabatier discovered, and plumbed the depths of, an unconventional but very real religion, inadequate, and possibly perverted in expression, possibly also misdirected, but none the less present as a great latent force awaiting development and action. And 1914 showed Sabatier to have been a true prophet.

Sabatier stands as a great, living example of the thing for which Professor Fitch pleads. Several years before the war, when the war and all that it implied was unforeseen, he was contending that a church and religious leadership, completely free and untrammelled, free from the dominance of mere ritual and authority, free from the dominance of theological dogma and orthodox tradition, adequately interpreting religion to the people, and the life of the people in terms of religion, might have awakened that glory of honor, service and sacrifice, which the war was destined to arouse, but which the spirit of war never can perpetuate. It is the tragedy of religion that it lags behind patriotism and adventure in its failure to awaken and reveal the moral glories latent in man, made in the image and likeness of God.

It will be evident that our references to Professor Fitch's little book have been not to the volume in itself. We have taken it as a very striking symbol of what is happening in our colleges today. They are doing a great work for the freeing of the human spirit. They are less moved by convention and tradition, and they are encouraging a spirit of free, thorough-going and impartial inquiry, perhaps, we may say, as never before. The forward-looking man, the man who is really concerned about the rendering of honest and impartial service to society, is finding in the colleges an increasing tower of strength. The bigoted and selfish, the partisan—both the respectable and the disrespectable—would like to voice their protest, if not to lay their hands upon the prophets of the new day, but they are increasingly deterred by the fact that if the prophet is thrown out "it is likely they will get someone a great deal worse." To the traditionalists and self-seekers, both in church and society, it looks like a veritable conspiracy of heterodoxy and iconoclasm. But let them not worry, it is the spirit of inquiry that is its own surest anchorage and corrective. If any worthy thing comes to grief, it will be through the repression that seeks to stop things half-through, rather than through the encouragement that leads to well-considered conviction.

The colleges are in advance of the church. It is only natural, and perhaps it is well, that they should be. The man of academic position and habits would probably resent the suggestion that he is a man of leisure, but it is his peculiar business to do what many a minister would like to do, if he had leisure. His judgments have to be made upon a wide investigation, and acquisition of facts, necessarily impossible for the minister, or average intelligent layman; and just because of this his judgments are apt to be in advance of those less able and equipped.

We have with us still the children of them that slew the prophets. But we have prophets, and never perhaps were they so well entrenched, or better supported. Our colleges have become veritable schools of the prophets, and there are not wanting signs that we are on the verge of an age that may become, like the age of the Reformation in England, an era of new learning, new adventure, and new freedom.

The Books of Yesteryear

WHERE are the best-sellers of yesteryear? And, by the way, what are their names? The prevailing note of last year's fiction, says memory, responding rather hesitatingly to the inquiry, was the psychic. There was a great output of stories cleverly contrived to meet the popular interest in occultism. No one is reading them now? Of course not. They are the books of yesteryear. Before that there were stories of the war. We remember them only as a part of the general horror which we are trying to forget by rushing into other horrors. Back of the war there were novels of adventure—of the kidnapping of the princesses belonging to imaginary countries of the Balkans, of the upsetting of South American governments by "virile" young Yankees, of marvelous achievements by cow-boys who turned out to be English dukes.

Back and back through the yesteryears range the "styles" in popular fiction—styles as easily traced as the change from the hobble-skirt to the pannier. We pass all varieties of sociological novels, with their haranguing reformers and haughty capitalists, and with such easy triumphs of talk over facts as never were on land or sea. We reach the "muck-raking" novels, which cut the beef-eating of the country down one-third for a few weeks, and then were forgotten. Finally, we come to the melodrama of our youth, in which the villain was subjected to repeated and various killings, in which the poor and beautiful shop girl had the inevitable reward of poverty and beauty in marriage to the princely-mannered millionaire, and in which the aspiring office-boy became the law-partner, son-in-law and heir of his employer.

Just now we are having a recurrence of realism—not so artistic as that of Howells, not so profound as that of James, but undoubtedly clever and true to American life as it appears on the surface. Sex-consciousness is in almost every chapter,—not, as in the old-fashioned English novel, as romantic lure, but apparently in imitation of the bare, often nauseating sex-consciousness of the modern continental fiction. It must be said, too, that it seems a bit worse in American than in French or Spanish novels, for we are still near enough our Pilgrim forbears supposedly to have retained a decent sense of reserve. Many persons are concerned about what seems to them the decadence of modern fiction, but there is the consolation of knowing that in a few months more these, too, will be the books of yesteryear.

We Americans have a passion for damp printing. We demand that what we read shall be fresh from the press—shall be the latest edition of the daily, the daily always in preference to the weekly review, the last novel or poem in preference to the classic. This fact makes us scanners, not readers, for we have at least intelligence enough to know that the most of what we read is without permanent value. It makes it impossible for us ever to become in any broad sense well read, for we are continually occupied with what ceases to have import almost as soon as it is laid aside.

To read what everybody is reading, even though it is speedily forgotten, is not quite useless, at least for teachers, preachers, and others whose business it is to know what the world thinks it is thinking about. The habit has, too, some slight value for purposes of censorship, for certainly young people should be discouraged from the indiscriminate reading of contemporaneous fiction, and they are coming more and more to resent wholesale prohibitions. But do we not spend far too much time, relatively speaking, on books whose very names are forgotten by the time they have become the books of yesteryear?

Seeing the Fire Engine

A Parable of Safed the Sage

MY little Grandson came unto my house, and he was sobbing.

And I inquired, saying, Why is my little lad grieved?

And he burst into piteous Lamentation, and he cried, I want to see the Fire Engine.

And his mother spake, saying, We came past the Engine house, and the Firemen were Washing the Engine. And he desired to tarry, but I said, We will stop as we return from the Postoffice. And behold, when we returned, the Firemen had taken the Engine inside, so that we saw it no more.

There are sorrows great and sorrows small: but the sorrow of the small boy who hath desired to see the Fire Engine and hath not seen it is the Sorrow of Calamity.

And the little lad cried sore, saying, I want to see the Fire Engine.

And I said, Come with me, for we shall surely see the Fire Engine.

And as we started there came a man to see me, but I said, Tarry thou till I return, or come again another day, for I am busy.

And we went unto the Engine House. And I spake unto the Chief, and I saluted him, and he saluted me. And I said, We desire to see the Fire Engine.

And the Chief took the little lad and set him on high, so that he sat far up on the seat behind the Steering Wheel. And the Chief gave him the Bell Rope and the little lad pulled the rope so that the Bell Rang.

And he saw the Ladders and the Truck, and the Chemical Engine, and the Whole Business.

And certain of the Firemen ascended the stairs, and slid down the Brass Pole that he might see how they descended when there was a Fire.

And the little lad had the Time of his Life.

Moreover, I had a Pretty Tolerably Good Time myself. For I am not too old to remember when I chased the Fire Engine.

So the little lad and I we came again, and I left him with Keturah, and with his mother the daughter of Keturah. And they said, Have you two Small Boys seen the Fire Engine?

And he answered and said, We have seen it. And my Grandson told about the High Seat and the Bell and the Brass Pole and the Chief.

Now it came to pass that night when I said my Prayers, that I spake unto Keturah, saying, Some good things have I done this day, and some it may not be so good. But one mighty good deed have I done: I let my work Go Hang for an hour while I went with the lad to see the Fire Engine.

For he who doeth a kind deed unto a little child, doeth it for all the long years that lie ahead of that young life. Wherefore do I say unto all men, Skimp not thy deeds of kindness to any sort of man or woman, but the good deed that lasteth longest is that which thou shalt do unto a little child.

And moreover, it is an Whole Lot of Fun.

Knowledge and Wisdom

KNOWLEDGE reads books; Wisdom reads men. Knowledge treasures dead men's thoughts; Wisdom, living men's deeds. Knowledge is proud of the books it has read; Wisdom is humble before each moment's revealings. Knowledge says, live to learn; Wisdom, learn to live. Knowledge argues; Wisdom sings. Knowledge strains at the stars; Wisdom wonders at the daisy. Knowledge despairs before the ocean; Wisdom rejoices before the dewdrop. Knowledge says, there is no God; Wisdom, there is nothing but good. Knowledge scans universes, and finds weariness; Wisdom sees dawns and twilights and stars, and finds content. Knowledge despairs that life is so brief; Wisdom is thankful that a day is so blest. Knowledge denies immortality; Wisdom is immortality.

Do We Really Know What Were the Ideals of Jesus?

By Charles Henry Dickinson

THE ideals of a great soul are not mere imaginings, conceptions, or longings. They are the objects to which their servant directs every energy. They are the cause he lives for and dies for. He so becomes theirs that they become the depth and intensity of his own life. His ideals are one in his vital unity of devotion. This meaning of ideals is presupposed in the form of the question which has been assigned me in the series of articles which consider the fitness of Jesus' ideals to our time. For the question is not, what ideals of Jesus do we know?—as if we might know some of them and not others. It is a question of knowing his concentrating devotion. That conscious purpose of his life and death, if ascertainable, may then be analyzed into its elements. If any of these are in conflict they must be corrected and unified by his great purpose.

The continuance of Christianity may not depend upon an affirmative answer to our question. But without the knowledge of the ideals of Jesus, Christianity might become too weak and uncertain for its mission, ineffective against its open and its furtive enemies, and might be forced from many fields by its competitors. We need to know the ideals of Jesus because ideals are personal in their nature: in great souls they live and move and have their being. To know ideals we must know the great soul in which they are. To know them in their sufficiency to destroy the carnal, to create the spiritual, to subdue and transform to themselves every normal constituent of life, we need to know them in the supreme of souls, and to possess them from him. And ideals to be strong against their imposing antagonists must be loved. They are loved in our love of great souls. They are sufficiently loved for victorious devotion in him who is most worthy to be loved.

If we do not know the ideals of Jesus, our ideals will be formed mainly from our own civilization, whose radical defects render its implicit forces insufficient for its own tasks. For the correction, fulfillment, and transformation of these ideals, another inspiration is requisite. And in no other than Jesus can sufficiency be found.

WAS JESUS A HISTORIC PERSON?

The first historic question concerning Jesus is this: Was there an historic Jesus? The negative answer has been worked out in recent years by a number of eminent scholars, with admirable ability, thoroughness, and exhaustiveness. But this destructive criticism, like every other, finds itself committed to the constructive task of accounting for the belief which it seeks to overthrow. By success or failure in the constructive part of such an undertaking, the negative position stands or falls. The denial of the historic existence of Jesus, or of a Jesus of historic significance, has failed to explain how the mysticism of that age could create the Man of Galilee, so uniquely different from its other creations. Attempts to account for the belief in his historicity have so involved the argument in ingenious inventions, hypotheses within hypotheses, exaggerations and distortions of obscure and dubious references, that the colossal mass, balanced upon a pin-point, has toppled over and toppled out of the realm of historical criticism.

This attempt has results pertinent to the question which has been assigned to me. The undertaking has emphasized the historic fact that our traditional christologies, instead of developing from Jesus' historic life, preceded it in the religious aspirations of the time; and their application to him, though it modified them, did not essentially alter them. The ideals of Jesus, then, are not such as might conceivably be held by a deity, a Logos, a Second Person of the Trinity, a God-man. They are the ideals of a human being, and the forms in which they were conceived were those of a man necessarily affected by the thoughts of his own time.

THE GREAT SOUL OF JESUS

The task of recovering something of the historic life of Jesus is then not an impracticable endeavor. How much or how little can be established is to be discovered in the process of historic research and criticism. The question assigned me asks only concerning the ideals of Jesus. These ideals, since they are out of the great soul which he is proved to be by the very attempt to deny his historicity, are, as we have reflected, the purpose to which he gave himself, the cause for which he lived and died. The ascertaining of these ideals is the most important element in the work of constructing a knowledge of the life and work of Jesus. To know his vital ideals is to know him, and the very life, directive, inspirational, creative, which he may live in us.

Our question directs us to the element which is also most simple and discoverable in the task of constructing an historic knowledge of Jesus. The record of events may present apparently insuperable difficulties and confusions. Of all the reported sayings there may not seem to be one of which we can affirm with historic certainty. These are substantially his words. And yet there may be evident an underlying purpose and devotion which reveal the vital ideal of Jesus. This judgment becomes clearer when we reflect that the aim of a great soul is found in his creative effects upon other men and other generations. If we can discover an impulse attributable only to Jesus, in the early history of Christianity, and distinguishable from other elements of its life, if we can discern in the course of the centuries that followed, his working, not altogether overwhelmed by floods of other influences, if we can find in our own hearts and resurgent in our own time, a devotion which calls him Master and Lord, then the historic Jesus lives for us, and we may draw our life from him, whatever mists of uncertainty envelop his words and deeds.

This historic continuance of the ideals of Jesus becomes the chief critical principle to be applied to the accounts of his words and deeds. Whatever report of him is contrary to that effect is self-refuted. Whatever discloses, clarifies, and deepens it, at least sets us on the way to more detailed knowledge of what he said and did. How far it leads in each application, lies beyond the limits of the question assigned me.

THE MAIN SOURCE

The consensus of critical opinion finds the most important documents for the historic knowledge of Jesus to be the Second Gospel, from which much in the First and Third Gospel is taken, and those sayings of Jesus in the First and Third Gospels which belong to another and a common source. Subordinate questions in this field I pass over. A third source, found perhaps only in the Third Gospel, consisting mainly of sayings of Jesus and brief settings of his words, has such beauty and power, combined with an essential consistency with the two sources mentioned—a consistency which is not at all a reflection and repetition of them—that it is associated with them as an important origin for our knowledge of him. The spiritual value of the Fourth Gospel is enhanced when an independent historic value is not forced upon it. The material in the Synoptic Gospels outside those three documents is, in general, different from them, either in its freer popular religious fantasy, or in its theological constructiveness, or in its inferior thought and style.

Readers to whom the above statement is familiar may pardon it when I use it to call attention to this fact: that the historically negligible portions of the Synoptic Gospels, and the Fourth Gospel especially, contain ideals which are absent from the three chief historic documents, and which therefore have small claim to consideration as attributable to Jesus. It is here that we find definite theological constructions. The two soteriological statements in one of the main sources do not seem to me to be an exception; for the reference to "the blood of the New Covenant" has special reasons to be doubted, and the phrase "to give his life a ransom for many" loses, when dogmatized, a greater significance than it gains. In the historically inferior portion alone is found a trinitarian formula. No tendency to such constructions is attributable to the Jesus of the three more historic sources. It is alien to him. Dogma, as far as it was in his thought at all, was held traditionally and uncritically. It was either aside from his deepest interests or was transformed by them. His purpose did not include the formation of dogma. His ideals were not theological.

JESUS' NON-ECCLESIASTICAL MIND

Absent also from that part of the Synoptic Gospels which has the best claim to be used as historic material, is any reference to the church. His ideals were not ecclesiaistical. Nor in them has the sacramental any place. It is important to observe that legendary accretions and exaggerations, which have an open field in the realms of miracle and healing, angelic visitation, and divine intervention, have least motive in the supreme domain of purpose and devotion, which is his vital ideal. How far these judgments must be modified in an estimate of his messianic consciousness and his expectation of a new world-order as affecting his ideals, will be indicated later.

The delimitation of the most important sources for the knowledge of Jesus' ideals makes the problem more acute. How far are these data affected by thoughts from a later stage of the Christian religion? How much of that which is attributed to Jesus in these documents is reflected from early apostolic Christianity? The religious consciousness, thought, and practice of that formative period are, in the consensus of sane historic criticism, accessible to us in the remainder of the New Testament, as interpreted by our knowledge of its world-historic setting. The addition of other sources of our knowledge of early Christianity beyond the New Testament, and the tracing of Christianity into its subsequent formations would clarify these judgments but would not materially alter them. Here we find, beside legendary growths, which affect the testimony to the ideals of Jesus less than they distort the records of the details of his history, many conceptions and organizing principles from the Greco-Roman world, especially from its prevalent religious aspirations. We find Jewish ideas in strange alterations and comminglings with Gentile conceptions, or in startling oppositions to them. Intense experiences in the Christian battlings with the world and winnings of men from it, were prolific of new thoughts and aims, new varieties of character. Even in these things is evident the influence of a great personality, Jesus.

JESUS AND PAUL

All these intrusive impulses, however derived, early Christianity sought to attach to him. It is a testimony to his unequalled greatness that these alien divergencies were attributed to him. Yet beneath all these intrusions his creative power is evident in a regenerated spiritual life formed in vital ideals which are of no other source than his historic life. In the winnowed records of that life, the chief documents of the Synoptic Gospels, these unified ideals meet us, if not unalloyed, yet distinguishable in their creative power. These ideals are essentially social. They unite in a great social consciousness and purpose. They comprise the religious ideal of life from and unto the Father, which is the social apprehension of deity, and of life in him and from him; the individual ideal of the social personality; and the preeminently social aim of the union of these social personalities into a regenerated humanity.

The space assigned me has permitted only the briefest intimations of the principles and methods by which we attain knowledge of the ideals of Jesus. Only a few sentences can be given to the competitive claims put forth for Jesus and for Paul in determining the ideals of Christianity. A preliminary consideration is our desire to find one in whom Christian ideals are disclosed more purely, vitally, and directly than they are in the great apostle. Related to this desire is our certainty of Paul's indignant repudiation of the claim made for him. If he had anticipated any such thing he would have written words of a fiercer flame than these: "If any man would give to me that which belongs to Christ let him be anathema!" The denial, to Paul's advantage, of Paul's deepest religious consciousness, is a dubious historic procedure. Though we pronounce him the originator of Christian theology, the founder of the church, the indispensable instrument in the establishing of Christianity in the Greco-Roman civilization and in the world through that civilization, and add to this homage our loving reverence for his mind and heart, his character and service, yet the ideals of Jesus, which are the very historic life of Jesus, were creative of that which is most significant in Paul, and are greater than he.

I am aware that my thought differs from some present tendencies of that historic criticism which is the teacher of those who seek to know the historic Jesus. One of these tendencies, drawn from an historic theory of which Lamprecht is a distinguished representative, depreciates the historic influence of great personalities, including Jesus. It is concerned in deriving them from their age, rather than in establishing their influence upon it and the ages following. With every appreciation of what this school has illuminated, it seems to me established by history itself, that a great soul, receiving indeed the life of the humanity in which he lives, at the stage of it in which he lives, makes of that which he appropriates a personal new creation creative of other men. Therefore the ideals of Jesus, interpreted as the inmost personality of Jesus, are recoverable from their distinct effects, which include the records of his life. The effects of Jesus' life, then, in the generation and all the generations following him, are separable from other influences, and are a necessary instrument for the historic knowledge of him. It also follows that those who are deeply conscious of his creative power in their own lives possess an indispensable qualification to discriminate that which he was historically. And they may turn to the historic and continually operative source of that which is best in them, in the assurance of finding in each research and from more to more, strength and guidance for the successive historic tasks which they must accomplish by his inspiration, in his name, and unto the realization of his vital ideals.

JESUS' IDEALS ARE SOCIAL

The religious ideals of Jesus are social ideals. The characterization of Jesus as a religious genius is unquestionably true of him, the supreme religious genius. He derived the vital ideals which were his character and power, from the heart of God. With God he lived in unbroken fellowship. Solely to God's will and purpose he directed every moment, every developing energy. From his life in God and God's life in him we learn a divinity of Jesus (though the term is inadequate) in comparison with which the formulations of the creeds are mechanical and misleading abstractions. Yet this characterization of Jesus as religious genius is both too vague and too narrow. It is too vague, for the word religious includes a great variety of meanings, from the most exalted to the most detestable. It is too narrow, for it may connote, as often in religious devotees, a withdrawal from essentials of life. The religion of Jesus was the perfected social fellowship between the Father and the child. And the religious ideals of Jesus were as social as they were spiritual, social and spiritual in one.

Some of Jesus' conceptions of deity were merely inherited, traditional. Among these were the physical attributes of God, as creator of the natural world, or rather of the world interpreted as less than spiritual, a world uncritically assumed to be independent of human thought, and with its events determined by an omnipotence external to it. Whatever conceptions he held because he inherited them are not essential to his religious significance, except as they were affected by his faith in the Father. The progress of reverent thought may divest itself of these with no repudiation of discipleship. But the fatherhood of God was very life of his very life. We need not demand a separative originality for that faith of Jesus. Unless the experience of humanity is found in that faith, culminating in it, Jesus would be false to the human spirit, and dis severed from it. It is enough for the religious leadership of Jesus that he so knew God as his Father, and himself as God's child, that our religious aspirations must forever follow him. And all his faith in the Father is concentrated in this life-task, that the holy love of God, flowing forth unto all men, his children, shall be in each one of them that holy love flowing forth to every man and to all men. The religious ideals of Jesus were social ideals.

THE WORTH OF INDIVIDUALS

The personal ideals of Jesus are none the less social for being ideals of the individual soul. He broke through every solidarity. He knew the infinite worth of every human being, the vastness of each individual responsibility and self-wrought destiny, the indignant recoil of the moral universe against the repression, perversion or exploitation of the least of these little ones. But his flaming devotion to each soul would make each soul a completely socialized personality. When the forgiving love of the Father impels a man to that participation in the divine life which saves life by losing it, and which takes up the cross and follows the Crucified, with heart unshaken by the extreme of shame and agony welcomed for love's sake, there is the man prepared for the Kingdom of God, there the personal consciousness is fulfilled in the social will and passion. The personal ideals of Jesus are social ideals.

Jesus' ideals of a new world-order take us into conceptions strange to modern thought. Here is the expectation of a speedy revolution of the world's life, by divine power. This hope was deep in Jesus' heart, determinative of his career and of his attitude toward civilization and its tasks. Attempts to explain away these facts are labor lost. Yet their significance may be more social than historic criticism has generally recognized.

The Kingdom of God, as Jesus proclaimed it, is a social order to be established on this earth. This expectation is more definite in him than in Paul, or the Fourth Evangelist, or the author of the Apocalypse. His ideals of the Kingdom begin with the redemption of the poor and oppressed from the conditions of an evil age. The ideals culminate in the fulfillment of men's spiritual potencies. His proclamation of the Kingdom prepared men for it by creating in them its principles. Those who accept Jesus' message form themselves into a fellowship which is the vital dynamic of a renewed humanity. Through this enlarging fellowship the social religious ideals of Jesus and his social personal ideals regenerate mankind. The inexhaustible social implications of these vital ideals, and their applications to our time, I leave to my colleagues in this series; adding to my own contribution a few intimations that the limitations of Jesus' hope make it all the stronger and more practicable.

HIS DEEPEST WISDOM

An ideal of social progress incompatible with the deepest hope of his time could not have gained access to the world's life, since it could not have affected the thought of his contemporaries. His deepest wisdom, deeper of course than he was conscious of, was to unite himself with the best hope of his age, to democratize and spiritualize it, and to make it implicitly universal.

If Jesus had accepted any other social task conceivably open to him, it would have been a mission far below that which he accomplished. If he had essayed to reform the decadent social confusions of his own time, his principles would have been necessarily shaped and directed by the institutions which they attempted to amend. The transient labors are ours, as institutions and civilizations pass, as our earth decays, as the physical order of life yields to another whose social spiritual ideals alone can be foreseen. The eternal efficiency is his. It would be a similar misconception of what can be done by the supreme social redeemer, if we demand that his ideals shall fit our time in the sense of accepting as endurable the organizations of our time. His social ideals can not be content with a democracy which is farther below them than it is above feudalism, or with an industrial organization which is farther below them than it is above slavery. Yet because they are committed to no external social order, past, present, or future their mission is not to destroy, but to fulfill. The methods of these progressive fulfillments are left to us. All branches of social science, all developments of instruments for the amelioration of human life, are ours to discover. Yet unfused with his ideals they sink us into anti-social materialism. Filled with his ideals they empower us with the social fellowship of the holy and loving Father, they create social manhood and the fellowship in which the redeemed humanity is permanent. They guide us into the work which is always next our hand in this world and all worlds, in this age and every age, and in whose dominant ends are included always and everywhere the redemption from misery and wrong, the equal and supreme opportunity for every soul, and the fulfillment of all spiritual possibilities in a social universe where each personality forms itself from all others and by the outpouring of itself to all.

PERSONAL DISCIPLESHIP TO JESUS

Nor is the value of his social ideals diminished by his neglect of certain important elements of civilization, and his hostility to others. Examples are his attitude toward wealth, conceived by him and his age as the instrument of luxury, ostentation, and domination; and his judgment against that resistance to evil which is essential to the preservation of human worths. These limitations are in part expressions of his ideals, as of spirituality and humanity against worldliness and unmercifulness, or of the omnipotence of self-sacrificing love. And these limitations are amended by his social ideals. That which fulfills these is Christian. That which opposes their fulfillment is not of his essential gospel. It would be equal disloyalty either to neglect to amend them, or to amend them by any lower principle.

The social ideals of Jesus are best learned in personal discipleship to Jesus. When the immensity of the social tasks committed to us in this time overwhelms us, and their confusions bewilder us, our thought and purpose grow clear and strong as we bring every hard-won knowledge and efficiency to kneel at his feet on the Mountain of the Beatitudes, and to follow him whose face was set steadfastly toward Calvary.

Our Best

AMERICAN society is one
Grand jumble of round pegs thrust in square holes And square pegs squeezed in round. Our social scheme

Is a colossal muddle of misfits.

The German system ordered differently:

The pegs were made to fit. The molds were set,
The human stuff jambed in, round surfaces
Mashed flat, square corners rounded off. The state,
The social scheme, was fixed. The human soul
Was so much stuffing used to caulk the cracks.

A full and true democracy's not this

Nor that. It's round pegs fitting snugly and smooth
In round holes, square holes neatly filled with square.

It's social gladness, pure efficiency,

The human soul-stuff glorified. It's men

And women, boys and girls, all doing what Each best can do, and singing at their tasks.

Nor is this some fool's paradise, a vague

And visionary, cheap Utopia.

It's plainest common sense. It's cleaning out

The springs of joy, and setting all the wheels
Of industry to humming with the power

That's generated from the flow. The chance
To do one's best! There's universal cure

For crime, disorder, every social ill!

JOSEPH ERNEST MCAFEE.

The Emancipation of God

By Ervin Moore Miller

WE are familiar with the description of Jesus as the freer of men's souls from sin. It is he who sets us free from the follies of our own selfishness and whatever other sins may have been thrust upon us by Adam and other careless members of the human family. He is the hope of the world's salvation, both individually and socially. He is the emancipator of all sinful human kind!

Thus does the familiar story of the significance of the life and teaching of Jesus run. I wish to put beside this a less familiar but no less important truth. Jesus is not only and alone the emancipator of men whom sin has bound, he is also the emancipator of God who has been bound by men.

There seems to be an irresistible tendency among the leaders in religion whenever they find God, or become convinced that they have found him, to build at once a theological fortress for his protection. Once having gotten him safely inside they pounce upon him, force him into a straight-jacket of speculative philosophy, bind him with the thongs of tradition, and when they have locked all the doors that lead to his presence, go out with the keys in their pockets and say to the wicked, dying world that needs him so much, "Behold! We have found God! We know where he is and what he wants of you. If you want to find him we will lead you to him, for we not only know where he is, but we and we alone have the keys to his presence!"

KEEPING GOD A PRISONER

Keeping God a prisoner in the citadel of theology has always been the most joy-giving pastime of priest and pious people of both Judaism and Christianity. Getting a corner on the world's supply of wheat doesn't begin to produce a sense of satisfaction equal to having a conscious and well-guarded monopoly of God. While this practice of monopolizing God is an ever-present fact of our religion it is no part of the simple gospel of Jesus.

The familiar story of the conversation of Jesus and the woman of Samaria gives a striking picture of the way in which Jesus set God at liberty. When the Jews ceased having dealings with the Samaritans, the Samaritans began to deal with God on their own account. Denied the blessings and privileges of Mount Zion and the temple, they erected a temple of their own on their own Mount Gerizim. They invited God to meet them there while they worshipped him. The new arrangement proved so satisfactory that they soon thought themselves fools for ever having worshipped anywhere else, particularly in the temple at Jerusalem. Meanwhile the people at Jerusalem pointed with scorn at the Samaritans as the ever-present picture of religion gone to the dogs, saying that only fools and heretics would think of worshipping God anywhere outside of Jerusalem. This most debatable question of where men ought to worship waxed warm under the hot sun of religious enthusiasm until both parties sought rest and refuge in that convenient shelter of all hot-headed arguers, namely, "We won't speak to each other any more forever!"

JEWES AND SAMARITANS

When Jesus stopped to rest one day on Jacob's well, and incidentally got into conversation with a Samaritan woman who came thence to draw some water, he flashed the searchlight of truth on the dark spots in her character so suddenly and brightly that she retreated to the shelter of this ancient, honorable, and unsettled question, asking Jesus to shed a little light on that while she caught her breath. The answer of Jesus was, "Woman, the hour cometh, when neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem shall men worship the Father. For God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth." With the true instinct of her sex the woman sensed the greatness of the words without understanding their meaning. But it made her think of the time when all perplexing questions would be settled by the coming Messiah. Jesus told her he was the Messiah, proving that her instinct was true; for he is the true Messiah who can take God from the ancient strongholds of tradition, bigotry, and dispute, and put him in the midst of humanity, making him accessible to all men who seek him with sincere hearts.

In doing this Jesus gave God unlimited liberty to live with men and win them to himself, and inspired men with confidence that God is near, friendly and always accessible. He had little in common with the religious stock exchange in the Jerusalem temple. He never went there to pray nor to be at peace with God. He fought against it until it finished him as completely as it could, but he never acknowledged that its claim to a copyright on God was justifiable. He never praised its courts, its creeds nor its ceremonies. He saw many people worshipping there, but he saw only one whose worship cheered his heart. That one was neither a priest nor a Levite, but a simple big-hearted woman making a little gift in the right spirit. Jesus commended this, but so far as we know that was the only good thing he ever saw in the temple. The click-clack of its clattering ecclesiastical machinery made him sick at heart and angry. It was to him a dreary funeral service of religious form full of motion but lacking the true spirit of religious life and worship.

GOD OUTSIDE THE TEMPLE

It was outside the trickery and trappings of the temple that Jesus found and felt at home with God. It was there that he told men to seek and find and feel at home with him. He took God to the people! He put him into the world! The world of life where common men do common things! He set God free in the heart of humanity and told men that he was always there, their constant and loving friend! Just as a poet pushes his pen down the straight white streets of his paper peopling them with living images of the poetic spirit within him, making it possible for us to wander there and hold communion with that spirit; so Jesus walked through the streets and fields of human experience leaving everywhere he went such a vivid and vital consciousness of the presence of the living heavenly Father that all men at all times in any place may enter into his thought and experience and be at home with God.

This God is the great, free, spiritual presence which pervades all life and activity. He is the spiritual presence of which all men, mindful of a spiritual presence in life, are conscious. He lives and moves and has his being in the lives and affairs of men. He is the Father of whom Jesus spoke and our Father; near, kind, loving and free. He is never bound except where men have bound him. He is always reachable wherever men seek him in spirit and in truth.

The ministry of Jesus might be described as a series of public receptions to which all classes were invited to come and get acquainted with their heavenly Father. All were invited. No one was slighted. The invitations were all of the same sort, and were issued on the same conditions. The religious Hohenzollerns, the political pirates, the rich fools, the wise virgins, the unhappy and unfortunate Magdalenes, and the foes of his own household, were all told to go into the inner apartment of their own lives, throw off the robes of sophistication, take a cold plunge in the waters of repentance, put on the plain garments of humility, and thus come to meet God in his kingdom. A kingdom, he said, the likeness of whose first and foremost citizen was not to be seen in the countenance of Caesar nor in the face of Pilate, but in the spirit of a little child. Thus did Jesus set God in the midst and gather his children around him, telling them to approach him, to trust him, to love him, to live in his presence and enjoy his company unhindered by stingy-minded professional ecclesiastical officials.

GOD AND ALL MEN

To set God free in the midst of our common life, to fill men everywhere with the consciousness of his presence, and to inspire men to seek, and find, and trust him for themselves, each in his own way, is a great task for present day religion, a task that we must undertake for Jesus' sake.

God lives in the partial and ever moves toward the complete realization of his will of love and righteousness in the lives and relations of men. All men are his. He exists for the good of all men. He is not interested in a heaven of segregated white-robed saints whose dominant trait is self-righteousness bought with a dime's worth of faith. He loves all men as they now are and is ever seeking to help and bless them. He longs for their fellowship, and to see them cooperating with him in his high purposes. He moves in the midst of life bearing and sharing the opposition of evil to his will: suffering and toiling, with toiling and suffering humanity. He sees ever before him his Day; the day of the full coming of his will upon the earth. He counts those who share his purposes and the suffering due to a hand to hand experience with the forces that oppose his will of love as his worshippers in spirit and in truth.

Men must be made to know of this God and of his love and purposes. Men must know that God lives and labors with and for them. God must be emancipated for the good of all men. Many religious people believe that a free God to whom men can have free access would be a calamity. They believe God is good, but that he would not be good for much if he were to get away from ecclesiastical control to wander around among the people unguided by themselves. But the future of humanity demands that God be set at liberty. He is for all men and all men must know it. He must be made free to live in his world so near to men that they can see and know and trust him, and be glad that he is near and friendly. This is the good news of the gospel. The good news that God is the living spiritual Father of all; kind, just, loving and free!

THE SPIRITUAL PRESENCE

Men must be made conscious of the fact that the spiritual presence of their lives is the God of Jesus and the spiritual Father of all mankind. This must be told so plainly that the self-righteous shall come to feel that after all they are only as other men, and that those who feel themselves outcasts shall come to feel friendly toward God. It must be told until all barriers are broken down and all men rejoice together in the knowledge of his presence and his love, and until no place or party feels that it has the exclusive possession of God. This is the good news of Jesus! It must be told to the world!

Fling it out far and wide, on the wings of the wind!
That the poor, and the halt, and the lame, and the blind,
May hear and be glad that their fetters unkind,
Are felt by this God who is Father and Friend!

Blaze it up in the heavens in letters of light!
That the manacled children in poverty's night,
Looking upward for hope may see that their plight
Is known to this God who is Father and Friend!

Cut it deep in the pavements of city and town!
That the folks whom the power of greed has bowed down,
May read and rejoice that the thorns in their crown
Are shared by this God who is Father and Friend!

Let this message of love fill the world with its light!
Casting out all the wrong of sin's madness and night,
Till the hearts of all men in truth, justice, and right,
Dwell together in peace with our Father and Friend!

The experience of Donald Hankey as a soldier in the trenches of the Great War is prophetic. Face to face, side by side, shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart with men who lived outside the traditional kingdom of God, he learned that many of these men were heroic citizens of the real God's kingdom. His whole experience is a moving picture on the reel of present history the title of which is "God is a Spirit and they that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth." His iron creeds were melted by contact with the fire of human sacrifice burning for the common good. His old map of the kingdom of God got sunk in the sea of human solidarity, and he saw a new kingdom without fence or frontier with the common God of all working in the midst. He saw a kingdom whose foundations are in the hearts of men who throw their lives into the breach for the common good at any point.

HEROISM OF COMMON MEN

Some of us have come to feel as Hankey felt. When we heard the stories of heroism and sacrifice that these men made one for another, and often for an enemy, always for the common good, we came to feel that their self-forgetful deeds bore the spiritual image of Jesus and through our tears we saw his cross again. Their loyalty to God can not be measured by what they said for they made no profession. We can measure their loyalty to God and worship of him only by the way in which they gave up their lives after the manner of Jesus, and for the same things for which he gave up his, thus entering into fellowship with him and with his, becoming his worshippers in spirit and in truth. This truth of an emancipated God who is accessible to and found by men even when church people do not realize it is one that must be given to the world now. The features of the fatherly God of Jesus must be traced in bold outline in all the fields of human activity till all men see and recognize him there; and under the impulse of his presence, put their lives to the tasks of his kingdom and so become his worshippers in the truest, highest, and noblest sense.

But for us to engage in a movement for the emancipation of God will be no easier than it was for Jesus. Getting a political government out of the hands of the Hohenzollerns and into the hands of the people is no harder than getting God out of the strongholds of tradition, superstition, and bigotry into the hearts of humble men. The bayonets of bigotry in the hands of heresy hunters are quite as sharp as those used on the western front and are much harder to deal with. The gas of ignorant stand-patters in the trenches of unquestionable authority is worse than the poison German kind, and we must face it without a mask.

THE FREEDOM OF GOD

But however stubborn or stale the opposition we must stand for the freedom of God! We must face our Jerusalem of monopolized, autocratic religion as steadfastly as Jesus faced his. It is a hard job. But they that wear soft garments are in kings' houses; they are not on the frontier's edge with Jesus! The uniform of his followers is made of the haircloth of patience. The challenge that he flings at us is rough and real! It strikes to the depths of the strongest hearts among us and demands of us all our highest, noblest, and best. The cross he holds out to us now bristles with the slivers of sacrifice; and he who dares to seize it with his own bare hands and march after Jesus to make God a naturalized citizen of the great universal republic of humble human hearts, will find new and precious meaning in those old words: "Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you."

VERSE

Humanity

WHAT care I for cast or creed?
It is the deed, it is the deed.
What for class, or what for clan?
It is the man, it is the man!
It is of love and joy and woe,
For who is high and who is low,
Mountain, valley, sky and sea
Are for all humanity.

What care I for robe or stole?
It is the soul, it is the soul.
What for the crown or what for chest?
It is the soul within the breast,
It is the faith, it is the hope,
It is the struggle up the slope,
It is the brain and the eye to see,
One God and one humanity.

ROBERT LOVEMAN.

Caliban in the Coal Mines

GOD, we don't like to complain,
We know that the mine is no lark—
But—there's the pools from the rain;
But—there's the cold and the dark.

God, You don't know what it is—
You, in Your well-lighted sky,
Watching the meteors whizz;
Warm, while the sun goes by.

God, if You had but the moon
Stuck in Your cap for a lamp
Even You'd tire of it soon,
Down in the dark and the damp.

Nothing but blackness above,
And nothing that moves but the cars—
God, if You wish for our love,
Fling us a handful of stars!

LOUIS UNTERMEYER.

Realization

INTO the woods I wandered
One said, "God is there."
Hours and hours I squandered,
Questioning, "Where, where?"

I strayed to the slums of a city;
A child in rags drew near
And fed the birds from pity.
I whispered, "God is here."

Will the Golden Rule Work in Industry?

THE prevailing argument is that profit for self is the only motive in business and that not the golden rule but the rule of gold is its law. Even Christian men forget that Jesus said a man cannot serve God and mammon. If selfish profit is the controlling motive of industry, it will of course be the motive of both parties and labor will make the highest possible wage with the least possible work its aim. The profiteer is a hypocrite when he talks about labor's duty to increase production; labor has exactly the same obligation to increase production that it has to decrease cost. Of course that is just what both should do but neither can until the other does. Thus the godless, mammon-made theory that business is solely for profits begets the struggle between employer and employe to see which can get the most out of the other.

In Cincinnati there is a firm that does not accept this principle. It believes the exact opposite and is building up a large business on the basis of the golden rule. It makes partners of its employes and its patrons. The result so far has been that its business has increased while that of the trade has decreased, and its production made the greatest gain while its competitors were suffering from strikes. It is significant that this business is one of clothing manufacture. While the garment workers of New York are locked out and fighting vicariously to keep the industry from being thrust back into the sweat-shop system of the bad pre-war days the Cincinnati workers in the A. Nash factories are enjoying the largest wages and bonuses and the finest working conditions of their careers. Perhaps the golden rule in industry is not an iridescent dream after all.

The Ethics of the Plan

Mr. Arthur Nash, the chief owner of the A. Nash Co., and the author of the Nash Plan, arrived at the convictions he holds and is trying to work out from a strictly Christian viewpoint. He does not camouflage his approach with any worldly disclaimer of a moral aim as so many do when they adopt modern methods, cynically saying, "We do it simply because it is good business." Such cynical disclaimers frankly reveal the fact that moral conviction and ethical impulse are at a discount in too large a part of the business world. Too many self-styled "practical" men think any consideration based on Christian ethics is Sunday-schoolism and sentimental. Mr. Nash is a frank, plain-spoken Christian man who says that unless the principles of Jesus will work in business and in industrial relations they are not worth a continental.

He approached the question prayerfully and read widely upon the problem from a Christian viewpoint, especially articles by men who were championing human rights but were critical of Christianity. He found that it was not the teachings of Jesus they were condemning at all but the fact that his principles were not being practiced. He made a restudy of those principles. He says, "It was a revelation to me to find how much the Great Teacher, as well as all the prophets, had stressed the gospel of social and economic righteousness. Like millions of others, I had regarded the golden rule as a beautiful expression of impractical idealism, but I have been able to reach only one conclusion, and that is that all our social and economic controversies, hatreds and strifes come about on account of the non-application of the golden rule." The ethical basis he sums up in the following words: The golden rule is the divine law governing human relationships, accepted by all religions and proclaimed by all prophets and teachers of every creed. It is the only infallible, workable, industrial and economic law in the universe today.

Working Out the Plan

The acid test of any ethical program is the discovery of a practical plan by which it may become operative. Mr. Nash abandoned the notion that all the profits belonged to capital, and replaced it by the idea that capital and labor should share the profits. He called a meeting of his employes and told them frankly of his convictions. He had studied the history of garment making and found that in all history it had been one of the most poorly paid. His first proposition was that all barriers between employers and employes should be removed; any worker was to come to him at any time and about anything and he would do the same with them. He stated to them the whole state of the business, and kept nothing back. They knew all about his investment and profits and he offered to share with them. They voted down the profit sharing proposition. But he did not give it up.

A year later he went before them again with a statement that even though their wages were the highest in the industry the firm was making 70 per cent profit and was behind on orders. He attributed this to their cooperation under the new relationships and said: "We felt chagrined because it is our belief that this is an unjustifiable profit to make off the labor of others," and again challenged them to accept a profit-sharing plan. The clothing had been sold on the smallest margins in the trade while others were charging such an enormous margin of profit that anti-buying campaigns were on. In face of strikes and shut-downs in neighboring factories they had increased their business more than ten times, raised wages several times and every employe had remained at work while the strike was on. The working force had increased 600 per cent and the production 1000 per cent. The employes now accepted the overtures for profit-sharing and then the most remarkable thing happened. The highly paid workers sent in a petition that profits should be shared, not on the basis of wages earned but of hours worked. Every man on the petition drew from $60 to $90 per week and they asked that the girl earning the smallest income in the factory should have the same dividend that they would receive. The first half-yearly dividend amounted to a little over $3.50 per week for every worker in the factory. Mr. Nash says that to see the faces of those whose wage was the least was sufficient reward for the Christian act of the highly paid.

What About the Labor Unions?

The Nash factories are not closed shops, nor even unionized, but during the strikes the union pickets treated their employes with respect and did not interfere with their going to work. Any employe may join a union without let or hindrance. Mr. Nash says, "I want to condemn with all the force at my command the system of profit-sharing that has for its motive the erection of a barrier against trade unionism." He defends the union principle, saying: "Labor unions seem to me to be physicians of industrial ills." They exist because there are things to be remedied. Capital and power are like good blood in the head and at the vital central parts of the industrial system while the circulation is poor in fingers and feet. "The little members are cold and unresponsive to the wishes of the head; the head is so congested that it cannot think properly and does not realize that the wrong is not with the cold feet at all but is in the head and heart of the body"—they do not get the proper circulation out to these weaker members. He adds: "I can conceive of no worse condition of abject servitude than for labor to be unorganized so long as the present avaricious organizations of capital continue. I would no more destroy or hinder the work of trades unionism under present industrial conditions than I would hinder or destroy the work of the physician." He knows all about radicalism among labor leaders but he also knows about the same thing in employing ranks, and he calls it quackery. His faith is that the real brotherhood should be within the factory walls and then we will not need Brotherhoods organized on both sides without to fight each other.

British Table Talk

The Outstretched Hand

AT the demonstration in the Royal Albert Hall on January 12 to celebrate the first birthday of the League of Nations, expressions of the desire and hope that the United States would join the league were loudly applauded. Pleading for the universal reduction of armaments, Rt. Hon. G. N. Barnes, one of the British representatives at the Geneva assembly, made a direct appeal to America. "Now," he said, "is the time for the United States to live up to its best traditions by giving the world a lead, as she is well able to do." He referred with satisfaction to the fact that the scheme for a Court of International Justice, endorsed by the Geneva Assembly, was based on that drawn up at the Hague by a body of jurists, "of whom Mr. Elihu Root was a distinguished member." Lord Grey urged that if there are any clauses in the covenant that make it difficult for any nation to join the league, they should be reconsidered. "Do not let the letter of the covenant keep out any nation that in spirit is with us." But there is no sympathy here with proposals to "scrap the league" and start de novo. Lord Robert Cecil, our foremost champion of practical measures to ensure world-peace, depreciates the newspaper talk in this vein here "and still more in the United States." He stresses the fact that the league is in being, that it is actually working as a great instrument of peace, "a thing that has never been seen in the world before," and that its admitted imperfections can be rectified. Destroy the league, he argues, and you may never create anything better, if as good, to take its place. Critics prophesied dire things of the league assembly, but Geneva far exceeded his own anticipations. One eloquent fact was that Greece, which at first strenuously opposed the admission of Bulgaria, actually, after discussion, proposed its inclusion, and was supported by Rumania and Serbia. Under the inspiring leadership of Lord Robert, the League of Nations Union, formed to inform, educate, and organize public opinion in support of the league, is growing by leaps and bounds. Representatives of all that is highest and best in Britain are allying themselves with it. Led by Bishop Temple, the Life and Liberty Movement is campaigning for the league in the church of England, and the Free Church Council is also bestirring itself. Dr. Horton's church has joined the union in a body. It is proposed that the last in June be League of Nations Week, and that organized pilgrimages from all parts of the kingdom converge on London for a mass meeting in Hyde Park on June 25.

Aristocrats as Popular Leaders

If twenty years ago, when the Marquis of Salisbury was Unionist Prime Minister of Great Britain, anyone had foretold that his sons would become popular leaders, such a prophet would have been without honor anywhere. Yet Lords Robert and Hugh Cecil have won an increasing following by their championship of democratic principles and their insistent demand for the application of Christian ethics to state affairs. They have become the spokesmen of sentiments and the advocates of reforms hitherto associated more with liberalism and nonconformity than with the conservatism and anglicism in which they were born and bred. Regardless of the pressure of hereditary associates and the effect upon their political future, they have denounced reprisals in Ireland, protested against secret diplomacy, striven hard for the League of Nations and everything that makes for international justice and world peace, worked for the equal citizenship of women, shown sympathy with the reasonable aspirations of labor, and, in short, identified themselves with movements and endeavors that are inspired by high idealism and are dear to the heart of the common people. These two brothers, noble of mind and soul as well as of birth, intend when parliament reassembles to cross the floor of the house of commons and range themselves, like their brother, the present Marquis of Salisbury, in the house of lords, in opposition to the coalition ministry. It is suggested that the Cecils may form a new party. They are not likely to set out to do that; as Lord Hugh puts it, "political parties are born, not made." But if they did raise a standard, many of the finest spirits in the nation would flock to it. Growing numbers of people, disgusted with opportunism, party manœvering, insincerity, and self-seeking in political life, know how to appreciate disinterested devotion to public affairs, and long for strong and consistent leadership that will give adequate expression to their best aspirations. The League of Nations anniversary meeting in the Albert Hall was preceded by the presentation of an Address to Lord Robert Cecil by Miss Maude Royden on behalf of people who wished to show their thankfulness for his labors on behalf of world peace. One passage in the address ran: "You have convinced us that nations must practice in international affairs the principles of Christ. . . . The common people hear you gladly, and feel for you love and gratitude for keeping alive in our hearts the promise of a better world."

An Anglo-American Link

The cooperation of Americans and Britons in the work of the Red Triangle Hospitality League, which exists to help ex-service men to take a useful and honorable place in social and industrial life, is continuing, if not making permanent, an international partnership in Christian service begun during the war. Two of the chief London centers are in charge of Americans: at Waterloo Railway Station, Rev. Leslie W. Morgan (Disciples of Christ); at Victoria Station, Mr. E. W. Blatchford, a Chicago business man, son of a former vice-chairman of the American Board of Missions. Many of the men dealt with are at the end of their resources. Recently, at Victoria, a man asked for a loan of ten shillings, offering as security his false teeth which he took out of his mouth! In one month accommodation was found for men from France, Belgium, Holland, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Denmark, India, Egypt, Argentine, Burmah, Somalie, China, Australia, Canada, South Africa, America, Scotland and Ireland. During the past year 975,385 men have been served by the league at a total cost of 21,000 pounds; 94,895 men were met and dealt with by street patrols; 42,955 were directed or conducted to lodgings; 2,492 were provided with free hospitality and entertainment in private houses; 61,208 were kept from the streets by being entertained free in theatres; 12,076 destitute men were helped with free meals and lodgings; 7,490 young men emigrants were assisted by the Migration Department, in five months; and in less than four years 29,108 men have been actually placed in positions by the Employment Department. In January a Sunday evening service at Victoria was conducted by one of Miss Royden's assistants, Miss Cicely Ellis, whose telling address made a great impression on the men composing the congregation.

Sunday Opening of Theatres

The curious spectacle was witnessed recently, at a debate at the Haymarket Theatre, of the opening of theatres on Sundays being advocated by an Anglican clergyman and opposed by a famous author and members of the dramatic profession. Canon the Hon. J. G. Adderley does not think that the religious argument holds water nowadays and accuses religious people of wanting to shut up everything on Sundays except their own little Bethels. One day's rest in seven, he says, is desirable, and arrangements should be made for those who work on Sunday to have another day. So that the theatre might not encroach on church hours, services could be held earlier in the evening, "in order to enable people to see the play as well." George Bernard Shaw smote the Sunday-openers hip and thigh. Sunday performances would be a gorgeous thing for landlords and playwrights, like himself, but it would mean seven-day toil for the theatre staff. He advised them to fight the proposal tooth and nail. He insisted that it was a religious question: "fundamentally, all economic questions are religious. You cannot give religion the go-by in this or any other social problem." Once again Shaw has shown that, with all his vagaries, he has the root of the matter in him. The secretary of the Actors' Association stated that the organized actors of the country were determined to fight any suggestion for Sunday opening. Mr. William Poel, who has done much for the artistic and religious drama, proposed that the better-class plays not given on other days should be staged on Sundays. But both proposals were defeated by large majorities and the result is generally approved. As the chairman, Lord Burnham (proprietor of the "Daily Telegraph") said, this decision settles the question for some time to come. The opening of cinemas while theatres are closed is not consistent, but comparatively few people are employed in the former. The Sunday opening of the "movies" is regulated by the county councils; some give, others refuse permission. When opened they have to give a proportion of their profits to public charity. I hope to deal with the church and the cinema in a subsequent letter.

Miss Royden's Problems

When a person who has become famous in connection with an established institution leaves it to work on an independent basis, the result is often disappointing. The services, however, started by Miss Maude Royden after resigning from the City Temple have been so successful as to make acute the problem of finding a large enough auditorium and headquarters where weekday activities can be carried on. The Kensington Town Hall is too small on Sundays and not available on other days. As members of the church of England Miss Royden and Dr. Dearmer, her colleague, tried to get the use of an Anglican church. The ecclesiastical authorities at first seemed disposed to let them have a derelict church, St. Philip's, Buckingham Palace Road, but finally the Bishop of London has refused it. It is an amusing coincidence that the church happens to bear the name of the father of four daughters, "which did prophesy." (Acts xxi. 8-9). Dr. Winnington-Ingram is personally friendly, but has yielded to the determined opposition of high churchmen to the extension of the ministry of women in the Anglican fold. The English Church Union has devoted a special session to consideration of the Lambeth proposals in respect of the ministry of women and unanimously disapproved them. The "Church Times," in the course of an elaborate criticism of Miss Royden's views and activities, announces that it has been "assured on the highest authority" that the Kensington "meetings are not services, nor to be spoken of as services." One of the many nearly-empty nonconformist churches is now the subject of negotiation. Miss Royden's committee has passed a resolution against her going to any church, established or free, where her freedom would in any way be limited. Personally, she would prefer to have a suitable secular building which she could christen Fellowship Hall. She is one of the few religious speakers of the day who have the ear of the people. She is eager to develop her work in London and throughout the country, and it is a pity that she is hampered by a mere question of bricks and mortar. Many of her zealous supporters would like to embark on a building scheme if only some millionaire would help! One of Miss Royden's immediate projects is a Women's Ministry Bureau, where women who are keen on doing definitely religious work in either the church of England or the free churches can obtain advice and help. Recently, at her suggestion, the Kensington congregation provided a New Year's party for about a hundred Austrian children who are now being cared for in England. There was a child host for each guest, and an abundance of toys, fruit, sweets, etc. In December, within a few days, the Fellowship of Reconciliation found homes for 150 Austrian children who arrived in this country before provision had been made for them.

General

Baptist statistics show an arrest in numerical decline. For the first time for ten years there is no serious decrease in church membership and Sunday school pupils. At the end of 1919 membership was only about 400 less than at the end of 1918, while scholars had increased by nearly 11,000. A copy of the first edition of Rev. John Eliot's translation of the Bible into the Algonquinian tongue and printed at Cambridge, Mass., 1661-3 has been sold by auction in London for the Governors of Christ's Hospital ("Blue Coat School") for 550 pounds. Dr. Alexander Ramsay, of Highgate, who attended the fourth Quadrennial Conference of the Federal Council of American Churches, reports that "It gathers an astonishing number of men of note, and it tackles living questions with fearless courage, doing something to function as a social conscience for the churches." "The Vicar on Board," writing in the "Southampton Times," says that in twenty years the number of first class saloon passengers on Atlantic liners who attended Divine service fell from 60 to 27 per cent, and during the five war years to 20 per cent, and since the Armistice to 15 per cent. He avers passengers are "more indolent, selfish, extravagant, gluttonous, fond of liquor and gambling, more unchaste and suggestive in their talk than ever." The bishop wants to see people laugh in St. Alban's Abbey. "Why should we not laugh in God's house? We must get rid of that awful distinction between religion and life. I want to see the church helping to bring courtship on a proper level, instead of kicking it into the dark places of the earth. Let young people find their mates at church." Apropos of ecclesiastical poverty, it is narrated that a certain bishop, who was recently presented with a magnificent cope, confessed sub rosa that he would ever so much rather have had a dozen new shirts!

CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Spargo, Mr. Ford and the Jews

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have only just seen for the first time your issue of February 10 and the letter of Mr. B. S. Levering therein printed. Presumably Mr. Levering wrote his letter after reading the first of my two articles and without knowing that there would be a second. Owing to an error not my own the explanatory line that my discussion was in two parts was omitted from the first paper.

Of course, it is Mr. Levering's privilege not to be interested in the origin or the authenticity of the so-called protocols, upon which the Dearborn Independent bases its charges against the Jews. I merely say that although from Mr. Levering's address I judge him to be a clergyman, I should hate to be tried by a jury controlled by minds like his—not interested in the authenticity of the evidence upon which my accusation was based. Mr. Levering says "Plain statements are made in this pamphlet called 'The International Jew,'" and inquires, "Why does Mr. Spargo not refute the statements made in that pamphlet instead of trying to show that the protocols are a myth?"

I reply: So far as specific statements were made in the pamphlet referred to purporting to connect Bolshevism with the alleged Jewish conspiracy, in my second paper I dealt with these and exposed the mendacity of the Dearborn Independent as fully as space permitted. It was no part of my theme—which was "The Truth About Bolshevism and the Jew"—to discuss more general accusations against the Jews. In a little book just coming from the press I have discussed the more general subjects.

Mr. Levering feels (or felt before reading the second half of my argument) that I "dodged the issue." That has never been one of my weaknesses, I think. But speaking of issue-dodging, perhaps Mr. Levering will explain why neither Mr. Ford nor the editor of the Dearborn Independent has met the challenge of the Jewish leaders of Detroit, and the similar challenge of the editor of the American Hebrew, to submit his evidence to investigation by a competent board of investigators, to be named by himself, the expenses to be borne by the challengers.

May I add that I do not defend the Jews? I would not insult them by assuming that to be necessary.

Have We a New Orthodoxy?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Men who have sought to formulate their religious convictions for themselves, rather than take them over ready-made, have ever based their formulations on the world view of their age. The blatantly orthodox of each generation are those who retain dogmas expressed in terms of the thought of an earlier generation. It is at least a question if we younger preachers, who have not disdained the name "liberal," are not complacently accepting a new orthodoxy which has little to recommend it to contemporary scientific thought. Do we not argue as though monism were scientifically established? Do we not refer to a hypothetical unified system of natural law as though it had a definite, ascertained existence? We go so far as to argue that God, being above all things dependable, would not "break" this objectively existent unified system of "law." Now this is all very well as a matter of faith, but do we not argue as though the whole thing were definitely and conclusively provable?

As a matter of fact, we are passively accepting pseudo-scientific assertions of poetical character for which we are indebted to men like the eighteenth century desists or like Tennyson and Drummond. Before the war we would have sworn to the existence of a unified natural law that, in some mechanical way, would ultimately carry on, until the dawn of the millennium. With the fatuous optimism of a Pippa we believed ourselves on the highroad to the Kingdom. Indifferent, rebellious, we might be, but God was the great policeman who would keep us moving. Latterly we have had our doubts about the basic necessity of willy-nilly evolutions towards the Kingdom. It is a question, however, whether we do not still talk of the objective existence of a "body of law" and rather plume ourselves upon our scientific grasp.

We have no justification for talking as though science had ascertained the existence of a "natural law." Science deals with certain phenomena. She cannot deal with them as isolated facts. She therefore seeks to link them up. She gradually learns the rules of the game which she is playing and finds that these rules can be depended upon—at least as far as she can discover. Many of these rules can be themselves linked up until a regular system is formed. At that point the religious-poetic mind puts in its appearance, seizes the rather fragmentary results of the scientist and presto!—a mystical unified law has come into being. It requires only a step to find the source of this law in the mind of a law-abiding God. These details of a simple body of unified natural law and their source may be matters of faith; they certainly are not science. To quote Professor Dewey, "* * oh, the remoteness of the doctrine that as we learn more facts, the outline simplifies: the vague remoteness of the plea that as science learns more facts, the multitude of details dissolves into general laws! That is precisely, according to the work of every existing living science, what doesn't happen."

"The dogmas of the quiet past," said Lincoln, "are inadequate to the stormy present." Have we liberated our minds from the dogmas of the fourth and fifth centuries only to allow them to become the prey of the dogmas of the nineteenth? Surely this way lies our danger.

Willing to take a Chance

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Thank you for the recent issues of your paper. Enclosed is my check for my subscription. Yours is a splendid journal, constructive, inspiring, and always intelligent. The last quality is a great asset, particularly in a religious periodical. It does not disturb me, as it seems to do in the case of your recent correspondent in Drumright, Okla., that possibly yours is "a journal of camouflaged propaganda" of the Disciples' church. Real Christianity is like the rose—the same under whatever name it is known. The important fact is that The Christian Century is Christian.

Echo Answers—Where?

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I have a plain, straightforward question which I would like to ask. It should be easily answered—at least, by some of those brethren whose letters occasionally appear in your correspondence column, usually in connection with a cancellation of subscription. My question is this: Where are the thousands of young men whose faith has been "shattered" by their courses in the "modern" seminaries (or by reading The Christian Century)? The assertion is made many times that this sort of thing is going on and it is rather difficult for some of us who are in the seminary to understand. Of course I am only a student, but I am nearing the completion of my course in one of these "unsound" seminaries and I am in close touch with the student body. I can't find these men whose faith is being shattered. Instead, students say to me: "My preaching is more vital than it ever was before. My faith is stronger. My religion means more to me. My course here has been one of the greatest experiences of my life." Another student—one of the most brilliant men I have known—said to me: "I came to the school practically an agnostic, but I am finding new meaning in faith and am developing a real religious life." These two statements, Mr. Editor, are typical. If thousands of young men are losing their faith none of them seem to be here. Where are they?

Another Canadian on Ireland

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: As a Canadian of the third generation, having lived almost all my life in Canada, until I came recently to make my home in the United States, I have been interested in the letter in your issue of February 24, signed "Canadian Reader." Under the influence of that letter, I have re-read Professor Taylor's article in the issue of February 3. I am as much interested as "Canadian Reader" in promoting a good understanding between this country and Great Britain, and in encouraging a fair and impartial attitude toward the vexed Irish question, but I do not think that his criticisms are justified.

The general spirit and purpose of Professor Taylor's article, at least so far as reference to Ireland is concerned, have seemed to me manifestly fair, and there is little, in my judgment, that could play into the hands of partisan haters of England. I find no evidence that Professor Taylor has tended to see things from a pro-Sinn-Fein standpoint, but it is too much to expect that he, and other Americans, shall see things from an unduly imperialistic and pro-British-Government standpoint; and I would remind "Canadian Reader" that there is nothing to be gained for the cause of Anglo-American good-will by seeking to palliate acts of reprisal, and the blunders of the present administration in Britain. One does not need to minimize the shocking nature of the Sinn-Fein policy of assassination in order to feel an intense horror that irresponsible and rebellious acts, no matter how extreme, should have led to similar, and more extensive things, on the part of the forces designed to maintain law and order. Few things have happened so calculated to shake the confidence that many impartial Americans, ashamed of lynchings and of the slowness and uncertainty of the operation of law in some parts of their own country, have had in the fairness, persistence, and thoroughness of "British justice." It has seemed to many of the strongest friends and admirers of Britain a sad degradation of a high ideal, for which not even the manifest difficulties of the situation are sufficient excuse.

What I wish especially to point out is that Professor Taylor's strictures are not one whit stronger than those of men like the Earl Lieutenant of Ireland, and many other critics of the policy of the Lloyd George administration. If "Canadian Reader" wishes to know what real radicals think about the situation in Ireland, let him consult the "Report of the British Labor Commission to Ireland." I do not cite it as a document in every respect fair, but it is at least what radicals think. In characterizing Sir Hamar Greenwood as a "tory imperialist," Professor Taylor has erred more nominally than really. Professor Taylor, and Mr. Asquith, are by no means the only people who believe that Lloyd George and Sir Hamar, whatever they may have been, are now doing the work of tory imperialism. "Canadian Reader" must know that, and it is very unfair for him to single out Professor Taylor for that criticism. I do not believe that all who have known Sir Hamar Greenwood will regard his inclusion among tory imperialists as a piece of "unconscious humor." I believe, on the contrary, that many who have known Sir Hamar, and his record, will consider it a very apt, though nominally inaccurate, characterization. I had the opportunity of observing Sir Hamar, in the days when he was "Tom" Greenwood, and I was a fellow-student, at Toronto University. His rise to power has been phenomenal, but I am not sure that it has displayed any strong grounds for setting aside what, I believe, was the general opinion of him among the student body—that he was a man of brilliant, but superficial, qualities, with an element of pose and artificiality about him, a man hardly destined to reveal the sane and cautious judgment, and the solid, ultimate sort of abilities, so necessary in an Irish Secretary, in the present crisis. I speak as a member of the student body, who knew Greenwood slightly, but not intimately. I believe that he had many fine qualities, among which were firmness and strength of will, but these may be as dangerous as useful in his present task.

Approving of the general spirit of Professor Taylor's article, I must dissent from him in some details. I do not believe he is right in suggesting that Sinn-Fein terrorism arose in reprisal against criminal acts on the part of crown forces. Any statement of the case is apt to be partial and one-sided, but I believe the reverse of that is nearer the truth. I would ask him to remember Sir Roger Casement; and the Sinn-Fein revolution of Easter, 1916. Much of the estrangement of sympathy from Ireland, in England, Canada, and other parts of the empire, is directly attributable to that dastardly effort to strike at Britain and the empire, in the very crisis of the war. What, at least, had Ireland to hope for from Germany? If, as the Earl of Aberdeen claims, the vigorous measures with which that rebellion was suppressed had much to do with the furtherance of the Sinn-Fein movement, and the policy of mercy might have proven safer and more efficacious, one can at least feel respect for the judgment of those who believed that rebellion at such a time warranted and demanded stern treatment. Let it be remembered, also, that there are many lovers of liberty in the British empire, who believe in all sincerity, that to grant the demands of the Sinn Feiners would be as fatal, not only to the empire, but to the peace and progress of the world, as it would have been for the union, and for the world, if Lincoln had succumbed to the very plausible interpretation of the doctrine of self-determination upheld by high-minded rebels in the South.

I think, also, that Professor Taylor is apt to see the sinister side of imperialism, without remembering that there is a more glorious aspect, and I use the word "glorious" as attaching to moral grandeur and service. I wish he could hear what two American missionaries, independently of each other, and both after thirty years of service in India, have told me recently, regarding British administration in that country. I have been an anti-imperialist, but I confess that their simple tribute to what British justice means, and to what Britain has done in India well-nigh converted me to imperialism. I wish, also, that all Americans could hear the words that I heard, only last week, from Miss Elizabeth B. Kelley, formerly of our own University of Wisconsin, recently returned from the near East. I do not know that I have ever heard a Canadian pay a higher tribute to Britain, than was paid by Miss Kelley, speaking out of her own experiences.

I am not among those who have become maudlin over "the empire on which the sun never sets," but it is worth while to remember that, prior to the war, during the war, and up to the present hour, on every frontier, and in every British possession, there have been enemies of Britain, sowing the seeds of dissension and strife, encouraging inter-racial and inter-religious warfare, regardless of the consequences to civilization. When we speak of the defects and perils of imperialism, let us have some due sense of what we would have in its place; and let us remember that the story of British imperialism is not all one of power, pomp and profit. It is likewise a tale of dangers, sacrifices, and the acceptance of heavy responsibilities. I have no doubt whatever that many Britons would willingly and gladly abandon all imperial enterprise, if they felt that they could justly and conscientiously do so in the world's present situation.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Missionary Will Head School at Indianapolis

The missionary interests of the Disciples of Christ are in some confusion on account of the death of Dr. Archibald McLean, the trusted vice president, and of Rev. D. O. Cunningham, the recruiting secretary. Rev. Alexander Paul has been compelled to lay down the work at the College of Missions recently for a season, and that leaves another gap in the leadership. Rev. W. Remfry Hunt, a Disciple missionary on furlough in England at the present time, has been called to supply at the College of Missions during the absence of Dr. Paul. He has spent thirty years in China. At the College of Missions he will lecture on the history, religions, and folklore of the Chinese people. His work at the College of Missions begins on March first.

Sacrifices Being Made for the Chinese

The sad case of the starving Chinese is making its appeal to American Christians in spite of the number of other famine appeals that are before them. People's Christian church of Dover, Del., recently fasted a meal, and gave the money to the Chinese. The practice will be continued of fasting one meal each week in behalf of the fund. A prominent Episcopalian paper has recently urged Lenten self-denial in the matter of food in order that the money might be given to the China Famine Fund. Miss Lucille A. Winters, a Baptist missionary, recently back from the famine district, thinks the fasting practice should be taken up all over America in order that people might know in some little way what it really means to be hungry.

Church Supports Soup Kitchen for Mexicans

The Disciples churches started their work among the Mexicans of Kansas City a few years ago by the inauguration of a soup kitchen at the time when there was much unemployment. Conditions are very bad again this winter, and once more these churches have organized to come to the rescue. There is a committee in Linwood Boulevard Christian church which is receiving contributions from that congregation. One of the packing houses is donating twenty-five dollars' worth of meat daily.

Japanese Soldiers Commit New Atrocities

The persecution of the Koreans by the Japanese soldiers continues, according to press reports which have gradually filtered through, with regard to conditions in the orient. A number of Korean patriots had escaped the net of the police going over into Manchuria. The Japanese government sent 15,000 soldiers into this district and these soldiers burned the houses and shot down the people, burning their bodies in the fires which they set. Women were assaulted and various outrages committed against the people. At the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance meeting held Feb. 16-17 in Washington, Pa., these facts were brought to the attention of the conference by Dr. R. P. Mackay, secretary of Foreign Missions for the Presbyterian Church of Canada.

Psychologists Get Presidencies

The trustees of Yale University have selected for their next president Prof. James Rowland Angell, well-known psychologist. This follows the selection of Prof. Scott as president of Northwestern University. The selection of the new president of Yale will be a surprise to the alumni, for it has been the invariable custom at Yale to select its president from the alumni list. Dr. Angell is now director of the Carnegie Foundation, and was formerly a dean at the University of Chicago. He is a Congregationalist.

Calvinistic Theologian Passes Away

Dr. Benjamin Breckenridge Warfield, professor of didactic and polemic theology in Princeton Theological Seminary, died at Princeton Feb. 16. He has long been known as the one consistent Calvinistic theologian in America. He was trained at Princeton and at the University of Leipsic. He taught new testament for a time at Western Theological Seminary, but for the past thirty-four years he has been dean of Princeton seminary. He has been a prolific writer of conservative theological books. He has stood strongly in his church against credal revision, and against all union enterprises which omitted the doctrinal emphasis. His passing removes the last of the outstanding conservative scholars of his denomination.

Next Move to Raise Interchurch Money

The December drive of the Disciples to cover the underwritings to the Interchurch World Movement was a comparative failure, bringing in only $65,000 of the money needed. As the underwritings have to be paid, the boards have secured the services of Dr. A. E. Cory, the well-known leader, who was prominent in the work of the Interchurch World Movement and who successfully led the Disciples in their Men and Millions Movement. It will be his task to raise the remaining half-million due on the Interchurch underwritings.

Selection of Stated Clerk of the Presbyterian Church

The Presbyterian church will have a General Assembly at Winona Lake in May of unusual interest. A stated clerk must be elected to replace the veteran Dr. Roberts. The method would be free nomination from the floor, but this democratic method is feared by the Continent, which suggests that the floor nominations be scrutinized by a committee, and that three or four of the most promising names be given to the General Assembly for a final balloting. It is also proposed that the term of the new clerk shall be for five years with the privilege of re-election.

Would Drive Bad Pictures Out of New York

A number of the ministers of New York have taken a positive public stand against bad pictures in the movie houses of their city. A meeting was held not long since in the Church of the Evangel and Rev. Frederick B. Stevenson made an address on the subject. Resolutions were passed and published in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle. The address of Mr. Stevenson is being sent to every member of Congress. Another mass meeting has been held in the central branch of the Y. M. C. A., and at this meeting Dr. Carson and Dr. S. Parkes Cadman spoke vigorously in behalf of a reform in the movie houses. There seems to be a nation-wide protest against the film that is being supplied this winter.

Church Organists Have Organization

There is hardly any calling any more which is not organized and the latest is the National Association of Organists. Henry S. Fry of Philadelphia is president, and Reginald L. McAll of New York chairman of the executive committee. The new organization seeks to set up better cooperation with the pastors, and also is trying to interest young men in entering the calling. It will be a clearing house of facts and methods for the churches of the entire country.

Disciples Leader Will Visit Mission Stations

Mrs. Anna R. Atwater has been sent by the United Christian Missionary Society to visit the mission stations in the Latin-American fields. She is now on her way to the West Indies, where she will stop at Jamaica and Porto Rico and later will go to South America to visit the work in Argentine and in Paraguay. In the latter country the Disciples have been given complete responsibility with a population which is largely Indian and where cultural standards are the lowest to be found on the continent.

Work Begun in University Center

Owing to the fact that the Disciples have had a small college at Lincoln, Neb., they have been slow in developing a specialized service for the students of the state university in the same city. This lack is being remedied in the appointment of J. W. Hilton as university pastor. The Disciples ministers of Lincoln have organized into a council through which this work is directed. At the university he has brought together a students' cabinet which cooperates with the work of the university pastor. The Presbyterian pastor is the dean of the university pastor group at the university.

College President for Mayor

Dr. Thos. C. Howe has been for many years president of Butler College at Indianapolis. During the year just past he resigned to give his attention to his extensive business interests. The most recent development in his interesting life is that his friends are now booming him for mayor of Indianapolis. In case he decides to run, he will face a city election in April.

Noted Temperance Orator Continues on the Platform

Rev Oliver W. Stewart in his earlier life was a well-known evangelist of the Disciples of Christ. More than twenty years ago he cast in his lot with the temperance cause and has spoken almost daily ever since, being known from coast to coast. He is now editor of the National Enquirer, published at Indianapolis, and is devoting his talents to the work of law enforcement. On a recent Sunday he spoke at East Dallas Christian church in Texas.

Seek to Christianize Recreation

The church has sought to Christianize the family life and to Christianize business, but it has allowed the recreation interests to go along without religious influence. No great nation of the past has failed to organize its play with the same care as it organizes its work except America, where the commercialization of recreation turns one of the great life interests into a hazard and often a disappointment. The Cape Cod Federation of Churches recently held a whole day's session over the question of the moving pictures. The theater men were invited to the sessions and representatives of the women's clubs. It was the effort of the conference to arrive at some common views by conference.

Auto a Help Instead of a Hindrance

They have christened the auto at Central Christian church of Dallas and made it one of the regular helpers in the church. Instead of being a wayward thing on Sunday, it will be used to bring to the Sunday school those who could not otherwise attend. Those who have a vacant seat in a car or who will drive a car for the exclusive use of the Sunday school register with the committee. Those who desire to ride to the school telephone on Saturday evening and everything is arranged. It is believed that by this means the local school can be greatly increased in attendance.

Jews Hear Minister on Sunday Evening

In many sections of the country there is evidence that the Jews are drawing near the Christian forces. In some cases there is the suggestion that Gentiles with no religion become disciples of Moses after the modern and liberalized faith of Judaism. In other cases, Christian ministers address audiences of Jews on the ideals of the Christian religion. Dr. John G. Slater on a recent Sunday evening addressed a large audience in a synagogue in Dallas. He declared that the prophecies of the Old Testament would not be fulfilled until the Jews became Christians. This is the second engagement for the Disciples pastor within a year.

Conservative Disciples Depart from the Letter

About a hundred thousand Disciples of the "old order" separated themselves from their brethren a few years ago, refusing to be listed in the year-book any longer. These protest against organs, missionary societies and Sunday schools on account of their not being mentioned in the Bible. Especially in Tennessee and Texas is this group very strong, in the latter state being known as "The Firm Foundation." In spite of the demand for scriptural precedent these brethren have established a Bible chair at the state university, and more recently have organized to found a home for the aged. The progressive brethren of the state are now asking for chapter and verse for these innovations.

Cardinal Has Expensive Honors

At the death of Cardinal Farley a new cardinal was appointed in America and the honor fell to Archbishop Daugherty. The cardinal continues to function as archbishop, and his only change is in the matter of honor and in his privilege of having a vote in the sacred college when a new pope is chosen. The honor of being a cardinal is a very expensive one. It was stated that this honor cost Cardinal Farley twenty thousand dollars. It will cost more now and Cardinal Daugherty must prepare to spend thirty thousand dollars of his personal money. Each cardinal is patron of a church in Rome to which he must donate liberally. Two more new cardinals will be named.

Congregationalists Dedicate Church at University Center

The great growth of the University of Illinois has stimulated the religious denominations in their determination to provide adequate spiritual care for these students. The Methodists recently dedicated a new building for the use of the Wesley Foundation and now follows the dedication of a church and community house for the Congregationalists. The Congregationalists propose to use their building for faculty members, students and townspeople, believing that the separation of these elements of the community is not wholesome. In this opinion the Congregationalists are reinforced by the Disciples. The Methodists and Presbyterians on the other hand hold to the idea of a student church. The local Presbyterian church is officered by students. The new Congregational structure cost $136,000 and was partly financed by the denomination outside of Champaign. First Congregational church holds the proud distinction of having invited Abraham Lincoln to speak against human slavery in 1854 at a time when no other church in

Moody Institute Gathering Discloses Pessimism

THE Founders' Week Conference held at Moody Institute the first week in February developed all the pessimism which is characteristic of premillenarian gatherings. Dr. James M. Gray addressed the Conference on the theme, "The Need of Bible Institutes and Bible Conferences in the Light of What Some of the Theological Seminaries are Teaching in this Day, and in the Light of What They Have Been Teaching." Dr. W. H. Griffith-Thomas, formerly principal of Wycliffe College of Toronto, declared that there were Christian institutions of learning in China in which fifty per cent of the teaching was done by unbelievers. He said of the 284 missionaries resident in Shanghai, only four of them were doing evangelistic work. In Canton, he asserted, there are 100 missionaries and not one of them doing evangelistic work. A Presbyterian mission has 40 workers and only two of them doing missionary work. Probably the mission boards and workers would insist that all their missionaries did evangelistic work by natural and educational methods, but the speaker evidently calls nothing evangelistic save the older mass meeting methods. He charges that large numbers of the missionaries have gone over to modernistic views which only the work of the recently organized Bible Union of China combats. Among his other complaints was that the Christian Associations are proposing to translate for the use of the Chinese "that deplorable book called the shorter Bible." Rev. A. L. Latham, of Chester, Pa., saw the church on a retreat. He said, "Multiplying influences for evil demand defensive measures. The Sunday-school is unable to cope with the conditions because of the lack of qualified teachers." Certain practical devices in gospel work received much attention. Among these was the bill-board method of bringing the Bible to the attention of the people, and the use of object sermons among the children. Considerable time was spent in prayer for a revival in the body of Christ, for it was felt the world could not be converted on account of the deadness in the church itself. Among the speakers was Mr. C. G. Trumbull, of the Sunday School Times.

Illinois would risk public opinion by giving an invitation to the great champion of equal human rights for men of all color to speak.

George Bernard Shaw Opposes Sunday Theaters

A public debate, English style, was held in Haymarket Theater, London, recently over the question of Sunday theaters. A clergyman, Canon J. G. Adderley, was in favor of the Sunday shows, but he was opposed by the theatrical profession, who did not want a seven-day week. Particularly the playwright, George Bernard Shaw, smote hip and thigh all those that would favor the commercialized recreation on Sunday. He declared that it would be a fine thing for the playwrights and the landlords, but not so fine for the people that did the work. It is felt that the question of Sunday theaters in Great Britain is settled for some time to come. Meanwhile some cities have allowed the "cinemas" to open, but even these are compelled to give a large part of their profits to charity in order to gain this permission.

Hunts Heresy in All Denominations

A new kind of heresy trial will mark the ecclesiastical life of America the next ten years. All sorts of theological irregularities will be tolerated in order to save the ammunition for those who go wrong in economics. Mr. Everett P. Wheeler, chairman of the Civic Federation's Committee, has engaged recently in the heresy-hunting game himself. He condemns the Presbyterian Labor Temple, the Episcopal Church of the Ascension, and is astonished to learn that even in the Roman Catholic church there are priests who hold radical doctrines. The remedy for these irregularities in economic doctrines are not the torture chamber or the fagots, but the economic boycott. Withdraw contributions from all who will not say shibboleth economically will be the new program of the economic orthodoxy.

Catholic Paper Ridicules Lambeth Proposals

The Lambeth proposals for unity have been treated in a Roman Catholic tory paper of London called The Tablet, and shown scant respect. The paper charges that there is nothing in these proposals but an invitation for all to come and be Episcopalians. It is asserted that all Roman Catholics would welcome unity if all would swear obedience to the pope. The paper grows facetious over the Lambeth plan of reordination and asks what is to prevent Mormon bishops from accepting the proposals and exchanging ordination with the Episcopalian bishops. The Tablet probably reflects Roman Catholic sentiment pretty accurately. At the present time Romanism has no spirit of compromise but proposes to go alone.

Four Automobiles for Baptist Stations

The Baptists have already inaugurated the use of automobiles in the work of the foreign missionaries of the denomination. The four now in use are at Mandalay, Mahbubnagar, Gauhati and Nowgung. The chief use of the cars is to bring children to the schools from a distance and to transport the sick to the hospitals. Among the Disciples missionaries the cars are used by those in evangelistic work to visit the villages.

Kansas City to Have a Federation

Kansas City has been one of the few large cities of the country which has not had a federation of churches. In a meeting held on Feb. 21 it was decided to organize such a federation. A budget of eight thousand dollars is planned for the first year. This has been partly underwritten by prominent laymen of the city. A full-time secretary and a stenographer will be secured at once, and an office opened. Fifty-five congregations and fourteen denominations will be represented in this new organization. Five projects were outlined for the program of work. These are: "To endeavor to arrest the attention of the city with the claims of Christ through a strategic program of evangelism in all the churches individually, and unitedly where possible. To study the great social needs of the city, and to apply Christianity in an effort at solution. To give proper publicity to Christianity, to the churches and the religious interests of this city. To cooperate in the program of Christian

Defends Sons of the Manse

IN recent years there has been indignant denial of the oft-repeated charge that the sons of the manse do not turn out well. Numbers of studies have been made to defend the honor of ministers' sons. Probably no more complete piece of research has ever been made than that of Rev. W. P. Rilling and printed in the Lutheran. He has made a careful examination of "Who's Who in America" and is armed with statistics. He says:

"According to the census of 1890 there were in the United States 108,537 clergymen; 96,901 were Protestants, who may marry. The total number of males, aged 21 years or more, was 21,329,819. Assuming that all the clergy are at least 21, we find that of the adult males one in every 221 is a clergyman who may marry. Now assuming that the clergy marry as frequently as laymen, and have as large families, then their sons are to all other sons in the proportion of 1 to 221, and if ministers' sons are doing their share of the work of a nation, and earning their share of its honors, then among 221 who have attained this public distinction, that is, those who hold important positions in the arts, sciences, or any useful calling—then there should be one out of every 221 such men whose father is a minister. Now if you would consult that valuable reference book of "Who's Who in America," the purpose of which book is to catalogue "The men who are making the history of a nation, who are creating its literature, educating its youth, leading in the religious, scientific, commercial, social, military, naval, productive and artistic activities and who are in the front," this book, in its fourth edition, records more than 16,000 names, 11,195 of whom are fathers. Now if 1 in every 221 of these men were clergymen's sons, then, if ministers' sons are doing their part, or standing with the other mass of men in the upward movement, then this book would show that of the 11,195 names mentioned, 51 must be ministers' sons; but there is an astounding fact revealed. Not only do we find the 51, but 18 times the 51, namely, 898 sons of ministers. Out of these 898, 188 are clergymen, 23 of whom are bishops; 87 presidents of colleges, universities and seminaries; 179 college professors; 49 other educators; 79 lawyers; 97 authors; 82 editors and journalists; 74 physicians and surgeons; 14 army officers; 13 artists; 11 members of congress; 10 geologists; 9 jurists; 9 architects; 9 missionaries; 8 lecturers; 7 chemists; 6 manufacturers; besides many others occupying prominent positions.

"Statistics show that the sons of clergymen have had no little part as leaders in the world of thought and action. Let me now mention a few men, more or less conspicuous in the public eye, whose fathers were clergymen: Oliver Wendell Holmes, author and poet, son and grandson of a clergyman; Edward Everett, statesman and author; John Hancock, first signer of the Declaration of Independence; Jonathan Edwards, theologian; Increase Mather, college president; Cotton Mather, author and scholar; George Bancroft, statesman and historian; Louis Agassiz, naturalist; Henry Clay, statesman and orator; Ralph Waldo Emerson, poet and essayist; David Dudley Field, jurist; Stephen Field, Justice of the United States Supreme Court; Cyrus W. Field, founder of the Atlantic Cable Company, three famous sons of the famous Rev. David D. Field, of Stockbridge, Mass.; John B. Gordon, soldier and statesman; Henry Ward Beecher, preacher and reformer; Samuel F. B. Morse, artist and inventor; James Russell Lowell, author and diplomat; Chester A. Arthur, twenty-first President of the United States; Grover Cleveland, twice President of the United States; Woodrow Wilson, also twice President; ex-Governor Hughes, of New York; Judson Harmon, former Attorney-General; David J. Brewer, Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; Levi P. Morton, ex-Vice-President of the United States; ex-Congressman Burton, of Ohio. To this list of illustrious sons might be added a greater list of clergymen's sons, less conspicuous in the world of newspapers and magazines, editors, publishers, etc., and an army of prominent teachers, preachers, etc., who grace the glorious galaxy of sons of ministers."

education that seeks to meet the needs of the city. To make a continuous religious survey that reliable information may be furnished as a basis for intelligent action."

Disciples Acquire Extensive Properties at University of Indiana

The Disciples now have extensive property holdings at the southwest corner of the campus of the University of Indiana. These properties are dwelling houses, part of which are used as student dormitories. It is planned to erect a large building for the educational work of the foundation as soon as funds can be secured. Three thousand students attend this university annually and of these 600 hundred are members of Disciples churches. It is said that this is the largest aggregation of Disciples students in any institution in the nation. Rev. Joseph C. Todd, formerly pastor of the Disciples church at Bloomington, Ind., is the dean of the new institution.

Dr. Jones Popular in Detroit

Dr. Edgar DeWitt Jones, who went to Detroit recently as pastor of the Central Christian church, is much in demand as a speaker. He spoke recently before the Detroit Baptist Ministers' Association. At a recent banquet of the Men's Club of First Congregational church he delivered an address. His literary gifts find expression in the Detroit News. He is announced for a series of sixteen lectures in the Detroit School of Religion conducted by the Y. M. C. A. on "The Minister's Calling." The course is being conducted for the benefit of the ministers of the city.

Serbian Bishop Visits America

Bishop Nikolai Velinirovic of Serbia is visiting in America. In his native land he has a wide reputation as an orator, writer and theologian. The beginnings of his life were quite humble, as he was the son of a peasant. He graduated at the University of Belgrade and later carried on studies in Switzerland, England, Germany and Russia. The universities of Oxford and Glasgow have each honored him with the D. D. degree. He is a broad-minded Christian leader and in this country is particularly interested in speaking in behalf of the larger unity of the church. He is setting forth the need of the people of Serbia. The relief work has been discontinued there on account of lack of funds but the agricultural operations of the country are not yet back to normal, and thousands are in great want.

Discovers Synagogue of Jesus Day

The work of archeologists is not always of popular interest, but the announcement of the finding of the ruins of the synagogue where Jesus often spoke is of the greatest interest in the Christian world. Rev. W. M. Christie has recently published in a volume of Semitic and Oriental studies an account of the finding of synagogue ruins at the site of the present village of Tel Hum at the head of the sea of Galilee. This would appear to be the synagogue built by the Roman Centurion for it was a large structure 74x56 feet, built in large blocks of coarse marble not native to the district and in a style of architecture that might be called Roman-Corinthian. It would seem the building was destroyed by an earthquake. As nearly all of the stones are on the site, it is possible to rebuild the ancient sanctuary. The British occupation of Palestine has greatly simplified the task of research in the holy land and from this time forward it is likely there will be a number of startling discoveries. If some of the ancient buildings can be restored, the interest attached to a visit to Palestine will be greatly enhanced.

English Ministers Regain Their Health

The absence from London this winter for health reasons of both Dr. Jowett and Dr. Orchard has been a distinct loss to the evangelical churches. Dr. Orchard is now back at King's Weigh House, and the first Sunday after his return he spoke for forty-five minutes on the new catholicism of which he is the apostle. Dr. Jowett will spend March in Rome and hopes to be back in England in May.

A young woman leaving Washington wrote:

"The beautiful, spiritual and inspirational services of the Sunday hours of worship in the Vermont Avenue Christian Church will always remain to me among the most precious memories of my eighteen months of service in Washington. I feel that many young people are returning to their distant homes with grateful hearts for the kindly, Christian spirit of welcome and fellowship we received in your church during the time we were trying to do our 'bit' for our country."

THE EASTER HOPE OR THE LIFE IMMORTAL

By Andrew W. Archibald, D. D.

Third and revised edition. Full of suggestions for Easter messages, and a suitable Easter gift. Appealing to all who feel the lure of the mysterious hereafter.

Rev. Charles L. Morgan, D.D., (Congregation-

Quiet Talks About Life After Death

By S. D. GORDON.

A new volume of "Quiet Talks" on a subject of more than usual interest to every one today. S. D. Gordon has something to say, well worth thoughtful consideration. One cannot describe these "quiet talks," they must be read to be thoroughly appreciated.

olics, Unitarians, Greek Orthodox, Christian Scientists and many others equally diverse. The building plans of the organization call for $200,000 worth of equipment. Three buildings will house education, recreation and worship. The town library will be located in the church as well as the swimming pool and gymnasium. Workers from the Y. W. C. A. and the Y. M. C. A. will be on the staff of the local church. Mr. Loken was educated at Harvard, and is a Norwegian by birth. His broad and tolerant attitude toward people of all denominations led him into some difficulties some years ago with the narrowly orthodox in California, but his splendid spirit and his successful work since he has escaped the pursuit of the "hounds of the Lord" has proven that the confidence of his friends through the years has not been misplaced. Mr. Loken gives a straight from the shoulder message on essential Christianity and finds among people of various denominational history a cordial support.

Faithful Workers in the Sunday School

The loyalty of faithful lay workers in the church is often forgotten while the work of the ministers is given first attention. There are many churches where the quiet influence of a wonderful lay life is really more potent for good than the preaching. Mr. Paul B. Hanks was recently given a surprise in the Disciples school at Wellsville, N. Y., on the occasion of rounding out twenty-five years as superintendent. He has often travelled long distances to be back home on Sunday. On the anniversary he was presented with a gold watch. Miss Jennie C. Powers of Westside Presbyterian Sunday school in Germantown, Pa., has not missed a session of the school since she was two and a half years old. She came one Sunday when she was so ill that she fainted. On the days when the school "was closed on account of influenza," she continued her morning visits to the church, though the school was not in session. For forty-three years she has not missed a Sunday.

Will Inspect Their Island Mission Work

The work of Presbyterian mission work in the West Indies is carried on by the home mission board instead of the foreign mission board as in some other denominations. A commission is being sent to visit the work this winter, and bring back recommendations to the board. The inspection will be made during the latter part of February and the month of March. The representatives include Dr. W. R. Patterson, financial secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions; Miss Mabel M. Sheibley, assistant secretary, and Miss Annie Hyatt, member of the Presbyterian Woman's Board of Missions, and Mrs. Roswell Miller, actively interested in the women's work of the Presbyterian church. These representatives will not only inspect the work of Porto Rico but will go on to San Domingo and study the situation there. In San Domingo a new interdenominational work has recently been started. Fifty thousand dollars worth of property has been purchased on the latter island.

Hold Evangelistic Congress in California

The Disciples of Christ recently held in southern California a Congress of Evangelism with Rev. Charles Reign Scoville as the chief speaker. The pastors of the section made contributions to the program, and the plans for evangelistic work included all of the modern methods which have been approved in church practice. Dr. J. H. Garrison, a veteran editor of the Disciples now living in Los Angeles, was present at the Congress. The Congress was originated by the new state secretary, C. R. Hudson. It was attended by eighty per cent of the Disciples pastors in the area.

Leaves Ministry for a Strange Testimony

The Anglo-American-Israel Association is a society which claims a very pre-tentious place in the economy of God. This society proposes to let the world know that in fulfillment of prophecy England and America occupy the place once held by the Jews. It is through these nations that God's promises to Israel are to be fulfilled. R. H. Sawyer, pastor of East Side Christian church of Portland, Ore., has resigned his charge in order to devote his life to the society which enlightens the world on the true meaning of the Bible prophecies.

FOUR HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED GOSPELS

Being a series of character studies cast in the form of personal memoirs of John the Baptist, Andrew the Brother of Simon Peter, Judas Iscariot, and James the Brother of Jesus.

By William E. Barton, D D.

Author of "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln," "Wit and Wisdom of Safed the Sage," etc.

THESE brief "new gospels" while of course wholly imaginary in form are based on the facts found in the Gospels which have been skillfully woven into historic unity so that the setting of each story has the vividness of reality. The narratives display true dramatic instinct and the character analyses rare psychological insight. The author says in his preface: "These narratives make no pretense of antiquity. They are a modern attempt to discover what kind of side-light would have been cast upon the ministry of Jesus if four other men, beside the four who have told us of him, had written brief stories of what they saw and thought about Jesus."

DO THE TEACHINGS OF

America's foremost thinkers will discuss this theme

THE YEAR 1921 is to be The Christian Century's greatest year. More than a score of the nation's foremost religious and ethical thinkers will conduct a thorough-going and unhampered discussion of the place Jesus Christ holds in the life of our times. Here is an example:

The Mind of Jesus and the Competitive System

will be discussed by

Robert Hunter, Spokesman for submerged humanity, author of "Poverty," "Why We Fail as Christians."

Harry F. Ward, Constructive radical, professor of Christian Ethics, author of "A Better Industrial Order."

Roger Babson, America's influential adviser of business men, author of "Religion and Business."

Scott Nearing, Socialist authority, a fearless agitator who believes in religion and the ethics of Jesus.

This single group alone makes The Christian Century indispensable to any man or woman who feels how urgent and how basic the industrial question is in religious and social progress. But these writers will represent only one of the many aspects of the great theme. The list of participants is a growing one. Each week adds a new stellar name to the brilliant galaxy. At this moment the writers and their themes are:

William Adams Brown

Theologian and Missionary Statesman.

"Can Society be Made Christian?"

JESUS FIT OUR TIMES?

in The Christian Century during the year 1921

NEVER in the history of American religious journalism has there been so eager and widespread a response to a program of complete freedom in the discussion of Christian themes as that which The Christian Century is receiving. Its circulation has burst all denominational bonds. Thoughtful churchmen, both lay and clerical, in all communions are enthusiastic subscribers. They rejoice in a journal of religion which, without displacing denominational organs, undertakes squarely to face the problems of this new age without regard to denominational interests. The discovery—and it has been a discovery—that a periodical can be religious and at the same time free, positive and at the same time liberal in its hospitality to all enlightened points of view, has seemed to thousands of unsatisfied hearts like coming upon a refreshing spring of living water in a desert place. The Christian

Century has extended its influence into all the communions of the American church. It is equally at home among Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Disciples, Baptists, Episcopalians and other Christian groups. Its subscription list is an album of the signatures of the church leaders of the nation. Besides, it is gripping the minds of thinking men and women who have no church connection. They are astonished that from within the church which they supposed had become moribund and incurably denominationalized in its vision there should emerge a journal loyal to the church, devout and evangelical, and at the same time as free as a university class room. And they stand amazed to find themselves actually enjoying a religious paper! Churchmen and earnest-minded non-churchmen are saying that The Christian Century points toward a new day for Christian faith and practice.

The Meaning of Service

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

ANYONE who thinks at all in our day about humanity's condition must think about service, its meanings, motives and aims. This book conceives of service as the indispensable expression of discipleship, the practical overflow of the Christian life. A life that rightly conceives of prayer, and that is dominated by faith, must be serviceable, and so there is now the trilogy of Dr. Fosdick's interpretations of Christian character. His other books, "The Meaning of Prayer" and "The Meaning of Faith," have been more widely read than any other books on religion published in many years. These are all intensely suggestive to makers of sermons and addresses.

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations of Every Major Text and Dominant
Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITOR'S DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by gleaning from the master theologians and preachers of the past half century the best exposition on every major text and dominant passage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical usefulness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard-worked pastor will find much gold here for his minting days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

Religion and Business

By Roger W. Babson

MR. BABSON is known as President of the Babson Statistical Organization, and as an expert in the science of business. But he is also a sturdy believer in the possibilities of the church. Here is the closing paragraph of his book:

"It is not the purpose of this book to suggest details of a plan for redeeming the world, but rather to emphasize the fact that the world can be redeemed socially, industrially only through religion. Governments may succeed in protecting men in freedom of effort and rights of ownership; but only religion can energize men unto a maximum of useful service and make them content with a simple material reward."

Five Indispensable Books

Recommended by the Editor of The Christian Century (Issue of December 23)

The Outline of History

By H. G. WELLS

Here is the history, not of kings and their wars and land-thefts, but of ages and races and nations. It is truly democratic. It is of greater value to the average man than a whole library of bulky histories of individual nations. Buy this book and save money on encyclopedias!

IN EIGHT BOOKS

The first three books, on "The Making of Our World," "The Making of Man," and "The Dawn of History" are veritable gold-mines of science, and the last book, on "The Next Stage in History" will appeal to all prophetic-minded people.

Two Volumes, $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

What and Where is God?

By RICHARD LARUE SWAIN.

Of this book the Editor of The Christian Century says: "I could wish that every perturbed mind might read this book. It would put a new face on nature, on history, on providence, on prayer, on the future life. Aye, and the possession of a deep conviction as to the reality of God would put new radiance upon the face of the reader himself."

Boards, $1.50, plus 14 cents postage.

The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War

By ROBERT E. SPEER, WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN and others.

These great leaders indicate that the way out for the distracted world is not by the League of Nations alone, but also by the way of Christian missions. Any minister who would deprive himself of this most timely and prophetic survey would be courting failure for himself in his chosen work of carrying on the tasks which the Master began.

Price $2.00, plus 14 cents postage.

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By ALBERT PARKER FITCH.

Can the church survive? Dr. Fitch holds that that will depend upon the extent of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good-third century metaphysics.

80 cents, plus 6 cents postage.

Wanted—A Congregation

By LLOYD S. DOUGLAS.

Not merely a book of methods of the how to fill the pews sort, but a book filled with inspiration for the troubled preacher, and replete with suggestions for practical promotion of the work of the church. Dr. Douglas is one of the most lucid writers, but he is more: he is a man who has succeeded admirably in conducting the work and worship in his own great church in a spirit of devotion, and also with remarkable popular success.

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical useful- ness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard- worked pastor will find much gold here for his mint- ing days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The ministry of souls is never out of sight. A more quickening and useful companion to the preacher of the Word does not exist."—REV. JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT

Sir. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL. D.

A Commentary as well as a Greek Text and Translation

Its Purpose

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK TESTAMENT was conceived by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL.D., and carried out under his careful editorship. His purpose was to produce a work which should include all that was most reliable and sane in the international exe- gesis of the New Testament and to present it in the form of a critical edition of the Greek Text. Scholarship which was scat- tered through several languages and many books, so that it was accessible only to the few, he purposed to bring together into one comprehensive survey which should have the harmony of critical freedom combined with reverence of faith.

Its Plan

The preparation of the critical introduction and notes to each book of the New Testa- ment was allotted to a separate scholar who was an expert in that department of exege- sis. The notes, printed below the Greek Text, are historic and critical in nature; they are suggestive of the deeper spiritual mean- ing of the context and keep definitely in view both the needs of a student seeking religious insight and the requirements of a minister engaged in a pulpit-ministry.

A Lenten Prayer—For the Courage of the Cross

As we walk with Thee, dear Master, on the descending way of Thy sorrow and humiliation we are ashamed of our selfishness, our moral commonplaceness, our superficial piety and our cowardice. How slight is our part in that high adventure in which Thou wentest forth to prove Thy soul. With what cautious reservations have we professed our discipleship to Thee. We have followed Thee afar off, timid, fearful, keeping ever open the way behind us for easy escape when our companionship with Thee became troublesome or dangerous. Oft, trembling under the taunts of men, we have denied that Thou wert of any concern to us, affecting even that we did not know Thee.

Show us, our Saviour, how unworthy of the love Thou hast bestowed upon us is the quality of love we have offered Thee. And send us into the shadow, rebuked by Thy pitying look, to bathe our disloyalty with our tears. Forgive us, Lord, and reach forth Thy hand to take us with Thee wholeheartedly in Thy great adventure. With Thee we too would learn of what stuff our universe is made, whether it be merely secular all the way through, or whether at its center there is a heart of love. Make us willing to pay the price that Thou didst pay. Share with us Thy courage, Thy loyalty, Thine utter devotion, Thine impregnable faith.

On Thy way toward Calvary, we will go with Thee, Jesus, Thou lover of our soul. Not in sympathy only will we go, nor yet in mere adoring admiration, but carrying our cross upon our own back and following in Thy steps up the cruel hill. There would we join all souls whose feet have found Thy way and in whose heart Thy vision burns. With them would we go forth, impelled by love of Thee, into a world sad and filled with hate and fear, to declare the infinite secret of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.—Amen.

The Ignorance of the Educated

THE self-respect of American audiences in their devotion to the distant fame of men who come to our shores heralded by clever press agents is being considerably deflated by the visit of Mr. Chesterton. These audiences nearly all break up not merely with a sense of disappointment but of chagrin. Self-reproof is written on the faces of the individual auditors as they pour down the stairs and through the lobbies of our leading theatres to the street. They came expectant to the point of ticklishness. For the first ten minutes of the speech they titter and chuckle at the famous paradoxer's every sentence; not because the sentence is witty or brilliant, but because they brought a chest-full of titters with them and have to get them out of their system. In thirty minutes great numbers are asleep; to be awakened when the "lecturer" starts to explain the causes of the war; to lapse back into boredom when this "explanation" proves as dull as it is thin and fictitious; to be jolted into attention once more by the sound of the word "prohibition"; to listen to a worn-out anti-prohibition argument delivered with the only show of earnestness manifested during the entire evening and in a tone of gravity as if we were the objects of the lecturer's pity for not having thought of what he is telling us before we took the fatal step of passing the eighteenth amendment; and then to walk out with this miscellany of piffle and pedantry and effrontery in our heads—this is one hour and a half's mental history of great audiences numbering from two to three thousand who turn out in two-score American cities to hear Gilbert K. Chesterton on "The Ignorance of the Educated." The little cynic that is in most of us insists not merely that Mr. Chesterton himself was the best illustration of his subject, but that his lecture could better have been called, "The Dryness of the Thirsty." The dryness is not a matter of speculation. And that the lecturer was thirsty, and greatly irritated by our inconvenient way of slaking one's thirst, was an inference that even an "ignorant educated" auditor could confidently make.

To Film the Life of Christ

USE of the motion picture in churches and schools is greatly on the increase. The value of the presentation of ideas and of moral lessons through this medium is now beyond question. In the church it is simply a question of obtaining appropriate scenarios and of having them appropriately filmed. In modern times there has been a shrinking from any dramatic portrayal of the Saviour of mankind. Roman Catholics found dramatic presentations acceptable if played according to their conceptions of the person of the Christ and with such ecclesiastical accompaniment as is conventional in their churches and in their traditions. The Apollo Theater in New York has been showing a very beautiful Italian creation on Sundays for several weeks, but its producers have been doubtful about its success as a regular week-night production on the commercial screen. The Motion Picture Age writes editorially of "Immortality" in its Chicago showing and commends it very highly. From the description given we take it that it is the same film as was shown in New York under another title. A plan is now being promoted by Mr. Winthrop A. Mandell of the George B. Seitz Studios to create a great scenario of the Life of Christ to be played by the greatest artists and filmed in its historical settings in the Holy Land itself. It is proposed that the work be done as a religious undertaking, that the money required be subscribed as any other great religious project would be floated, and that no person shall ever profit by its exhibition, but that all proceeds be applied to charitable and benevolent ends after repayment of the initial subscriptions. The artists propose to make an artistic picture but to keep as true to historical fact as possible, and to bring out the manhood of the Master in all its human strength and tenderness. The moral and instructional value of such a pictographic presentation of the Life of Christ would be of untold value to the youth of our time.

The Community Churchman

TWO young Disciples on the faculty of Culver-Stockton College at Canton, Mo., are making a vicarious adventure on behalf of the community church by starting a journal for the cultivation of that field. They will call it "The Community Churchman," and begin publication by issuing it quarterly. They will make it readable and attractive in form and promise more frequent issues as quickly as support allows it. They report gratifying responses to their announcement. Cash subscriptions are coming in on every mail and a number of sustaining memberships have been paid in before the printing of the first issue. They are making it a labor of love and advancing the cash to float the enterprise as well as giving their time to its editing. They have found some three hundred odd community churches already organized and scores of church leaders looking for the means to transform their organizations onto the community basis. They will not be partisan to any one theory or experiment in regard to the community church idea or its promotion, but furnish a free forum for all who desire to get away from the sectarian and over into the unifying and socially functioning methods of community service. Believing that the function of the church is that of serving its community as a whole, as well as the individuals in it, they will make their periodical a medium of news for all events and suggestions that offer help. Especial attention will be paid to the rural field where over-churching and the duplication of competing little congregations make any effective church work impossible. The Christian Century wishes Professors Wood and Piper well in their venture. Their field is a wide and varied one and those who are working in it are to be congratulated on the promise of a special journal to serve them.

The News of Religious Activity

BEFORE the denominations began to organize publicity departments, there was no way for the big public to get the news of the churches. Some metropolitan papers printed some news about local churches but concerning the programs of the denominations there was but little account. Great Christian conventions would be dismissed with a "stick-full" of matter. The public regarded the churches and preachers as idle, and stigmatized them for "doing nothing" when in truth they were doing many things. Wrong and hurtful stories were printed with regard to religious leaders because the truth was not available. A number of the denominations now have their publicity departments, and have been able to achieve results which make a splendid return on the investment. The Presbyterian publicity department has made contact with the great news gathering agencies of the country which reach a total of over thirty million circulation daily. These vast agencies of publicity have used much of the material furnished them, thus helping Americans to assess more correctly the meaning of Presbyterianism in the national life. The effectiveness of the Christian Science service is everywhere admitted. Though it is so largely negative, dealing with rejoinders to what appear misstatements of the position of Christian Science, even such a service is of enormous value to any new and often misunderstood movement. It is the publicity organization which has given to Christian Science quite a different flavor from that of Mormonism or Dowieism. Once the daily press indulged in facetious distinctions between Methodist bishops and "real bishops." Now the general overseer of the Methodist church is accorded the same respectful treatment as is given to other ecclesiastical leaders of the country. Methodism has made its publicity department pay, particularly in the way of making its national gatherings better understood. There is still a task more subtle and useful to be performed by these departments. Religious activity may yet be interpreted in news columns so as to give the deeper meaning of religion and the genius will some day arise who can do it.

Protestantism in South America

PROTESTANTISM is being given a chance in South America unlike that it has ever had in any other section of the world. There are countries, like the Scandinavian lands, where one denomination has had a practical monopoly of the field. But even here the scars of the reformation period prevented a truly catholic Protestantism from arising. There was a continual refighting of old issues, an over-emphasis upon the dogmatic concerns of the scholars with which plain religious people have no natural interest. In many South American lands there has been so little Protestant work that the approach of the evangelical bodies in this generation under the leadership of the Committee on Cooperation in South America is practically a new approach. The churches are gradually reaching the point where they no longer insist upon such sectarian cognomens as Congregational, Methodist, Baptist or Disciples, but are willing to be known simply as "gospel" churches, if we may translate freely the title coming into common use. The spirit of the new mission enterprises will depend upon the young people who are being chosen for the new task. The young people who volunteer for the field today are almost invariably of the unsectarian type of mind. South America is to have such a chance religiously as has never before come to any section of the world. The results to be achieved are of the very greatest importance to the human race. A whole continent has been wallowing in materialism and skepticism. Great national and industrial enterprises have been halted for lack of common ideals and of adequate ethical foundations. When the revival of religion comes to South America, the world will have a chance to see what evangelical religion can accomplish when it works in a catholic and yet modern spirit.

Preventing Architectural Monstrosities

"THE people of the Blank denomination build churches that look like fire-stations," commented an Episcopal rector recently. He had pride in the fact that Episcopalians build churchly structure somewhat oftener than do people of some of the denominations that have less history and less æsthetic feeling. When a man wants to show his town off to visitors, he likes to show the public buildings, of which the churches are or ought to be the most beautiful. He naturally resents the ugly and unworthy buliding. It is worse than no building at all. The public-spirited citizen gladly contributes to help erect a beautiful building for a denomination not his own. He refuses to contribute to a building enterprise even of his own denomination when the end sought means the lowering of community standards. There has seemed to be no way by which architectural monstrosities could be curbed but several denominational experiments are being made which would help in that direction. The Methodists have an organization called the Board of Architects which cooperated with the Sunday school organization in securing better plants for religious education. The Baptists have a secretary in the employ of their Sunday school organization who spends his time giving advice on building operations. The Disciples of Chicago have under consideration a device which would aid at least locally. It is proposed to have a central building fund from which gifts would be made to worthy building enterprises. The central committee would not seek to control congregational action except in a negative way, by advising against inadequate plans. It would give force to its advice by refusing aid in cases where plans were grossly wrong. The country will soon be filled with the noise of the stone-mason's hammer. Thousands of churches have their money raised, and wait only for better conditions for their work to proceed. In the next five years it is probable that more church buildings will be erected than in the following twenty-five. It is the time to criticize all plans. The world of today demands beautiful as well as practical church buildings.

Jessie Brown Pounds

NEWS of the death of Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds, a member of the editorial staff of The Christian Century, will have reached our readers through the daily press before they see it here. Her passing on Thursday, March 3, from her home in Hiram, Ohio, is an event which will be deeply mourned by a great multitude in all sections of the church of Christ, and particularly among the Disciples of Christ with whose events and especially with those spiritual life she has been intimately and conspicuously identified for a generation. As journalist, novelist, poet, she was a potent factor in raising the level of religious feeling and intelligence of multitudes. Her gospel hymns won for her a place in Christian affection beside the late Fanny Crosby. Mrs. Pounds was the author of over 600 hymns, a large majority of which were utilized by musical composers—not all of whom were able, however, to match her intelligence and insight with musical adequacy. More famous than any other, perhaps, was "The Beautiful Isle of Somewhere," which had come into wide popularity before it was given its especial impetus and prestige by being sung at President McKinley's funeral. This hymn comes as near voicing the confident faith, the agnostic reserve and the irrepressible yearning with which modern minded Christian men and women contemplate the life beyond as any utterance in the entire range of our hymnody. Mrs. Pounds' was a mind with many facets. She combined with her poetic vision a parish practicality, a domestic contentment, an ecclesiastical statesmanship, a civic and social leadership which few women could match. In college, community and churchly councils she was recognized as a monitor of exceptional wisdom and vision. Her association with the makers of The Christian Century during the past three years has been a delight and inspiration to her colleagues. Her contributions have regularly appeared in the position occupied in this issue by her editorial entitled "Saving Sermons," the manuscript of which was received in the mail an hour after the telegram announcing her sudden death came to hand. Always discriminating and critical, she was also always sympathetic and gentle in her handling of the foibles and weaknesses of the church folk, whose mentality she approached with peculiar understanding. Her college community, her communion and the Kingdom of God have all been immeasurably enriched by her many gifts and her gracious character.

From the Temple's Pinnacle

THE outcome of our Lord's first temptation when he felt the constraint of his people's needs as well as his own immediate hunger calling him to turn stones into bread, was the clear and irrevocable definition in his own soul that man's deepest needs were not physical but spiritual. He put behind him the specious notion that it was bread that man wanted most. Man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God. By the truth and will of God revealed in the moral ideals and purposes of the spirit, man lives. Ideals are fundamental to economics. The doctrine of "economic determinism" was faced by Jesus and definitely repudiated. He would be no disciple of Karl Marx. He would set up no bolshevistic commonwealth. He would not fall into the trap which had caught the feet of so many of the world's leaders, represented by the idea that ideals will take care of themselves if only men have bread to eat. He knew better. And he knew that bread would be plentiful if men's ideals, their hearts, their inner convictions and dispositions, were in accord with the truth and will of God. In the larger ranges of man's life bread is not a cause, but a product. Ideals are no mere concomitant of prosperity; they are the condition and dynamic of prosperity. This was the first victory of his three-fold temptation.

His second victory was the logical next step after his first. How shall I arrest the attention of men? How shall I get them to see the inwardness of their true life? How shall I persuade them that their basic and serious lack is not bread, not merely the things "after which the Gentiles seek," but this spiritual fellowship with God? These were the questions that the Messiah carried in his heart when he left the wilderness and made his way to the capital city of his country. He was to have a look at his potential constituency. In rapt mood he enters the holy city, passes through the throngs, and stands before the temple. He mounts the stairs, climbs to the very pinnacle, from which lofty vantage he surveys the crowd weaving a multicolored pattern of life on the street below.

If we were right when we thought that the first temptation was distinctly apropos of present-day conditions, at an hour when the bread problem looms so large in our world, we are also right in believing that this second temptation of the Master is very significant in its application to modern life. As never before, we are viewing humanity as a mass, a crowd! Whatever agencies are at work to restore sanity and safety and peace to the world, are looking down upon the multitude from the pinnacles of their various temples, surveying the crowd as a crowd! They do not recognize individuals, either because of lack of acquaintance or loftiness of altitude. They do not pick out Nathaniel, down there, or Zebedee, or the young brothers, John and James. They do not see Andrew, or Simon Peter, or Philip. They see the crowd—a polychrome, polyglot, miscellaneous, indistinguishable blur of humanity!

This is an era of crowds. The breakdown of old monarchical despotisms, and the democratization of all governments, has thrust the problem of "the people" to the fore. Creeping up out of its old slavery, this crowd has achieved a new consciousness of itself as a crowd! The changes which have come upon the industrial world, whereby individuality and initiative have been stifled and silenced by the roar of automatic machinery, have given all labor to understand that it must be considered, henceforth, as a crowd!

Sometimes this gives us a bad turn when we reflect that crowds are powerful only in destruction; when we remember that civilizations have, as yet, been created and directed only by a minority composed of an intellectual aristocracy—never by crowds! A civilization involves discipline, vision, prophetic insight, which the crowds, left to themselves, have invariably failed to recognize or realize. Crowds act like the organisms nature sends to dispose of dead bodies. And when a civilization is rotten, "the masses" are always much in evidence. Anybody who doubts this should thumb his history.

Just now a legion of forces conspire to make the crowd more aware of its compactness and its strength than on the day when Jesus took reckoning of his crowd from the turret of the temple. As we survey it, we wish that some mighty resolvent might be poured down upon our crowd—our shifting, restless, discontented, and increasingly self-conscious crowd—that would reduce it to its individual constituents just long enough for each man to understand his own needs, and the needs of his neighbor, with the clear eye of a self-confessed child of God!

Jesus looked down upon that crowd in the street, and asked himself how he was to deal with it. It seemed so all-of-a-piece, so welded-into-a-chunk, so bound together by ties which he might not disrupt. For the moment it seemed as if the only solution to his problem was to startle them into silence and attention! To leap from the pinnacle of the temple!—ah, that would be the way to win a crowd! That was the sort of thing that crowds always delighted in! Having lost its mind, as individuals, and having achieved a mass-mind—compounded of morbid curiosity, nervous eagerness to witness the bizarre, the capricious, the grotesque—the crowd that loved hangings and street-brawls and loud harangues—this crowd would have liked to see him leap to the pavement! For we must not do our Lord the discredit of believing that he seriously contemplated jumping from that pinnacle of the temple just to see if he could do it! We must look deeper into the great story than that. There was a reason, and a good one, for this temptation, we may be sure. Jesus wants to win the attention of that crowd. He has a message for it.

Of course, if the streets had been entirely deserted, except for one man standing on the sidewalk opposite, and the young adventurer on the pinnacle of the temple had shouted, "Would you like to see me leap from here?" the man below—no matter who he was—any man—would instinctively reply, with agitation, "Don't! I beg of you!"—and hurry away for fear lest he should be forced to witness a painful scene. But the crowd? Entirely willing is the crowd to look on, to encourage, to pay to get in, if necessary, to see such feats performed.

Jesus wondered if, having leaped to the street (and he thought he could do so without injury) he might not win sufficient attention so that he could speak of that spiritual power which bears men up in all the vicissitudes of their lives. But he decided that this was not the way to address his fellow men. He had come to evangelize them; but this process would clearly be as unethical as it would be found to be ineffectual. He did not leap from the pinnacle of the temple. He descended the stairs, one step at a time, and went out to speak, not to the crowd, but to Andrew and Peter and John, chance acquaintances along the road, telling them of his new social commonwealth of souls. True, there came a time when the crowd sought him, and followed him; but he made no bid for it, and was never happy in his dealings with it. For he knew that his gospel was built for individual appeal. It was not a thing that a crowd could resolve upon—somebody making a motion that it be adopted, and somebody else seconding the motion, and everybody shouting "aye!" It wasn't that kind of a gospel! It wasn't the kind of a gospel that a king could accept for his country, or a mayor for his city, or a father for his children, or a wife for her husband. It was a gospel that treated with the individual soul, on the basis of its personal relation to its God.

How may the Christian message be brought to society at large? This is a very live question at the present hour. Whatever may be the worthiness of our motives, we cannot but be struck with the fact that many of us have met and fallen before the temptation which Jesus considered and repudiated on the pinnacle of the temple. What has the church done, and what is the church doing, to resolve society, the mass, into its analytical parts and treat with individuals?

Huge tabernacles are built to house the thousands that crowd to witness the antics of the itinerant evangelist who endeavors to save the multitude by platoons. He spellbinds them. He hypnotizes them. His great chorus soothes them into an undefensive mood; and then he shouts at them some more. He urges them to march down, and be saved, by blocks. The Knights of the Gray Goose—or some order equally picturesque of nomenclature—in plumes and gold braid march down the sawdust trail to take the hand of the noisy prophet; and are entered in the books of the official statistician: "Saved: one Lodge No. 258, K. of G. G., in full uniform. Praise the Lord!"

This is supposed to be a very original and unique method of saving souls. It is only a repetition of the performance by which the Roman priests used to make Christians of the captives brought in by the army from foreign provinces. They drove them through the Tiber in the name of the trinity, and the deed was done. They were Christians—whether they suspected it themselves or not. How much of our Christian work is pursued by this same logic and defended on no better grounds?

Jesus did not leap from the pinnacle of the temple. The time came when he risked his life to teach the world what he knew about the ideal we have come to call Christianity; but, on that day, he did not leap from the pinnacle of the temple. He consented to be lifted high upon a wooden cross. And he died—not the death of an opportunistic dreamer who wished to stage a brilliant spectacle for the sake of his cause—but the tragedy of a Saviour eager to release vast redemptive forces far beyond the power of any individual leader to bring to bear through his own single personality. "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." The great moral event toward which he looked would not come in an hour, or a century, or a cycle. There would be no sudden inundation of society's mass-heart from the ocean of infinite love, but each wave, longer than the last, tirelessly, resistlessly, would pour over the wreckstrewn coast until the tide of divine power had reached its flood! This was Jesus' hope; this was his faith. He went to the cross with the vision of that triumph in his eyes, and the song of that victory in his heart.

We do him poor service who are impatient of his plan. Some will always be saying, "Lo, here is he kingdom!" and "Lo, there is the kingdom!"—but he still insists that the kingdom is in the hearts of men. That you may find that kingdom in your heart; and by gracious words or generous deeds help others to find that kingdom in their hearts—this is his plan. Thus did Jesus set about in the quiet ways of poverty and pain to open for us and for all the world the way of our redemption.

Saving Sermons

WHERE a man's treasure is there will his heart be also, and intellectually and even commercially speaking, a preacher's treasure is in his sermon notes. These are the accumulation of his life. Into them he has put brain and toil. They are more than written words. They are a part of his precious years, the concrete part that remains to him of his mental and spiritual labors. No wonder they are dear to him. A preacher's wife, when asked what she would save first if the house should be found ablaze, unhesitatingly answered, "My husband's sermons." It is not likely that this answer was the instinctive response of her unaided mind and adoring heart. It is more probable that it was the expression of an unconscious impress made through the years by her husband's respect for the products of his effort.

But this affection for old sermons has dangers, not the least being a disinclination to prepare new ones. When the old ones are so good, how could the new ones possibly be better? Even worse, however, than this adherence to old sermons as sermons is the unconscious adherence to errors because they are contained in the carefully prepared discourses of twenty years ago. When the Revised Version of the Scriptures was ready for circulation some of the sturdiest objections to their use came from preachers who found that the new text changed passages upon which they had ingeniously constructed sermons. Often they regarded these sermons as their best and most original productions, emphasizing, as they naturally did, turns of expression which scholars were wont to pass by. It was not unusual in that day to see a lachrymose pulpit orator shedding tears publicly over the fact that the revisers had taken "Mother's Bible" away. In reality it was not his mother's Bible but his own sermons that he was concerned about.

A minister, asked to join with others in reading some recent books on one of the great themes of Christianity naively answered, "I shouldn't care to do that. I have four sermons on that subject, and I shouldn't care to have my mind disturbed." He was not altogether an exception to his profession, except, perhaps, in his frankness.

The man who does not outgrow his early thinking needs to look upon his mental processes with some suspicion. The real prophet of God will usually hold at fifty to the same great fundamental truths which he held to at thirty, but these truths will seem to him infinitely larger and his views of their application will have broadened immeasurably.

He will be far more concerned that his people shall get his whole message and that they shall feel its growing spirit than that specific sermons, however clever, shall be saved.

The Man Who Paid the Church Debt

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE was a certain Church and it had a Debt of Four Thousands Shekels. And the Minister spake unto his Congregation upon a Sunday when he had a Full House, and he said:

Brethren, this Debt is a Burden. It might be paid if Twenty Men would give each of them a Hundred Shekels and other twenty Fifty Shekels and the rest every man according to his several ability.

Then up rose John Perry, and said, I will be one of Twenty Men to give an Hundred Shekels.

Now every one knew John Perry that he was a Poor Man, and of No Great Ability, but of Good and Honest Heart. And they were Deeply Moved by his Generosity. And Nineteen other men came across with an Hundred Shekels each, and other twenty at Fifty Shekels per, and the rest each according to his ability or what he pretended was his ability, and within a week the money was all pledged, to be paid Spot Cash on the next Sabbath Day.

And on that day John Perry called at the Parsonage and handed the Minister his contribution. And after he had gone, the minister looked, and behold, it was Five Shekels.

And the Minister called unto him the Nineteen men, and he said, Our dear friend John Perry hath misunderstood. When he promised to be one of twenty to give an Hundred he meant to give the twentieth part of an hundred.

And the nineteen men roared with laughter. And they said, Tell it not in Gath. Behold, it inspired us to come across, and that is well. Now then, let us pay each of us Five Shekels more and make up the share of John Perry, and we will tell no man.

And they had a Great Banquet that they might make merry over the Burning of the Mortgage, and they set John Perry on high; and he smiled and was happy. And they called on him for a Speech.

And John Perry said, It is not my doings, but it is of the Lord; and I am humbly thankful. And now, behold, the Church needeth a New Furnace, and the walls need to be redecorated, and the Minister should have a larger salary. Let us raise Four Thousand Shekels more, and I will start it with the Same Sum that I gave before.

And the Nineteen Men whispered one to another, and said, Art thou game? And they answered, We are no Quitters. We stay in the game and play it like Little Men.

And behold, they raised Four Thousand Shekels more.

And that Church took on New Life, and was happy and prosperous from that day forward.

And the Nineteen men and the minister bound themselves with a Great Oath that they would never tell this little joke.

But this is a True Story; and it showeth how it sometimes cometh to pass that Very Humble Instruments are chosen for the beginning of Great Tasks. And I would there were many Churches and some other Institutions with men as unworldly and as generous as John Perry.

Possessions

AN old and quiet house set down
A windy field or two from town.

And a great clump of lavender,
All day with cross, small bees astir.

Larkspur, hot-blue as with a sting;
And mint, so brief and sharp a thing.

Old friends, who from the village walk
On Sunday afternoon, to talk

Of the new shop; the guests from town;
The wind that blew the apples down.

They go; the dusk comes from afar,
Like music blown from out a star.

Those Others drift across the dew;
My early love—and you—and you!

LIZETTE WOODWORTH REESE.

Roads

ROADS do not run, they only lie
Each inch beneath its inch of sky
Chained endlessly, although they yearn
To race beyond a tempting turn.
Rain, falling leaves, and grinding wheel
Their patient, upturned faces feel,
Dreaming all day, as dream roads must
Of unreturning bits of dust.

The Trails of Democracy

By Lynn Harold Hough

AN unanalyzed watchword is a menace in a republic. When words are made the substitute for ideas or a situation arises where one slippery word is the vehicle by which different people express contradictory ideas, the thoughtful observer knows that the nation must be summoned to a serious and critical inspection of its mental stock. The word democracy has had a less than happy history for the last few years. For a while it was on everybody's lips. It seemed tipped with flame. In the cloudy cynicism in which we live today there are few so poor as to do it reverence. We know now that too often it was a refuge from thought rather than the expression of thought. And we know that no end of the people who shouted its syllables with joyous vehemence could have found how little they had in common had they stopped to ask what they really meant by the word. Yet it did represent a great and aspiring outreach of the human spirit, and even yet it is worth our while to attempt the sort of analysis which will enable us to determine its deep and legitimate meaning.

Where did it come from? And by the question we mean not a matter of etymology, but a matter of vital spirit. Where did that thing emerge to which the word became fastened at last? Oddly enough it seems that we must go back to a parallel statement in the old Hebrew prophets, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, to watch its coming into the consciousness of men. The ancient Semitic world thought of groups and masses. It did not think of individuals. The one man was lost in the group. So when the men of Jerusalem had been carried off into exile they cried out bitterly as they thought of the evil ways of their fathers: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge." It is immensely stimulating to hear the spirited reply of Ezekiel as he declares that a man shall not be weighted and chained by the wrongdoing of his ancestors. All souls are mine, he declares in the name of Jehovah, and the soul that sinneth it shall die. Here indeed the individual has emerged. And every individual is given tremendous value in the eyes of God.

GREEK PARALLELS HEBREW

The idea does not seem to have been particularly productive, however, and when it emerges again it is in a different nation in the terms of a different culture. In the Athens of the fifth century when the mind of the Greek is at its clearest and the flowers of Hellenic culture are all blooming, Protagoras declared that the individual man is the measure of all things. Here again the individual emerges. Protagoras and Ezekiel declared a similar thing with a very different background of conviction. Ezekiel saw great value in the individual because he belonged to God. Protagoras saw great value in the individual because he belonged to himself. In this same Athens of the fifth century the most acute and understanding mind was that of Socrates. And Socrates after his fashion began to ask questions: If the individual man was the measure of all things how could you get a real standard? Would there not be as many kinds of truth as there were individuals? Would you not be reduced to mental anarchy at last? Must you not have a test by which the opinion of the individual could be measured? And so Socrates declared that the individual man was not the measure of all things. The class man was the measure of all things. Not one citizen but society must judge.

The views of Socrates were developed and given systematic form and applied to the philosophy of politics by Plato. In his "Republic" we have the full position amply expressed. The state and not the individual is the important matter. Indeed the individual citizen only has reality at all by being a member of the state. Everything must be judged from the standpoint of the state. And from this point of view Plato could argue for the exposure of puny babies who obviously would not become stalwart defenders of the state. The individual was quite lost. Only the solidarity of the state remained. The view of Protagoras that the individual furnishes the criterion of judgment, and the view of Plato that the state furnishes the criterion of judgment have been doing battle ever since.

MEDIEVAL STRUGGLES

To be sure there was a period when it seemed that the Platonic view had triumphed. There was small place for the individual in the political thinking of the middle ages. There was one great reality. That was the Holy Roman Empire. The individual was only important as he was a part of the holy Catholic church or of the empire which was its expression in the secular field. But ere long protest began to be heard. First it was a protest against the Platonic realism upon which this view of church and state was built. The class, whether church or state, was not the real. The individual was the real. So rose Nominalism, and so after centuries the voice of intellectual descendants of Protagoras was heard in Europe. As long as the protest was confined to academic discussion it did not capture the mind of Europe. But in the sixteenth century a proud peasant mighty in the vigor of a vital experience of religion defied the combined solidarities of church and state. With Luther what had been a discussion of scholars became a power on the field of history. He was hardly able to face the corollaries of his own position. Later he came to depend upon the solidarity of the state power, upon the support of benevolent princes. But in his greatest moment the individual stood forth in invincible strength before all Europe. And Europe never forgot.

The seventeenth century saw a more formal working out of the theory of life based upon the rights of the people. And it was the political thinking of John Locke in the seventeenth century which was at the basis of much political activity in the America of the last quarter of the eighteenth century. When you read the Declaration of Independence you can always see the seventeenth century Englishman John Locke standing in the shadows. When the revolutionary war was over and the independence of the colonies was won, the matter of the organizing of the life of the new nation was the acute problem. For a few years the organization was so loose that it was completely impossible for the new nation to deal with its financial problems or to command the respect of the world.

TWO ATTITUDES CONTENDING

When the constitutional convention met there were two contending attitudes of mind. As we look back to the early days of the republic these attitudes are associated with the names of Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton. Jefferson was thinking of the individual man and the individual state. Here again the voice of Protagoras was heard in a strange tongue and a strange age. Hamilton was thinking in the terms of the state. He believed in large federal authority and power. And here again the voice of Plato was speaking at the end of the eighteenth century. The constitution of the United States was a compromise between the two ideas. There was the attempt to give as much freedom to the individual man and the individual state as was consistent with a stable and dependable government. And there was the endeavor to make the central government as strong as it could be without interfering with the necessary liberties of the individual man and the individual state.

The political life of America has followed the line of these two ideas which have been in battle array since the days of ancient Athens. One party, the heir of the Jefferson tradition, has always contended for the liberties of the individual man and the individual state and has been suspicious of all central authority. The other party, the heir of the tradition of Alexander Hamilton, has always been eager to secure a more centralized functioning of government, with ample strength and power. It has been a curious matter of history that when one of the individualists has become president, whether his name has been Thomas Jefferson or Andrew Jackson or Woodrow Wilson, he has become converted to the idea of the powerful exercise of central authority and has out-Hamiltoned the Hamiltonians. And it has been equally curious that a man of the Hamilton tradition, when his party was out of power, has always been impressed by the terrible autocracy of the executive.

WHAT A DEMOCRACY IS

More and more the minds of impartial and close thinking men have come to clarity as to the ideal which must be set before the government. There must be such an adjustment between the claims of the individual and the state that each shall come to its own and neither shall suffer. From this standpoint and in the light of this historic discussion, we may briefly analyze and define democracy. A democracy is not a nation which is like a circle with the individual at the center. That is anarchy like that of which Proudhon dreamed. A democracy is not a nation which is like a circle with the state at the center. That is autocracy like that represented by the system of Prussia. A democracy is a nation which is like an ellipse with two foci. One is the individual and the other is the state. The individual receives all the liberty which is consistent with the common good. The state receives all the authority it can exercise without crushing the individual. In this equal emphasis upon individual freedom and the functioning power of the state we find the only practical exercise of political democracy.

A Seven Day Church Program

By Arthur Drew

IN the leisure time programmes which many American communities are working out, the church is being recognized as one of the most potent agencies already available for giving the people simple opportunities to play. In the absence of any better facilities, the basement of the church may be opened for use as a recreation and social center. The well-planned church, with its parish house providing for every phase of activity, is not always in existence, no matter how clearly the pastor and his flock may visualize it for a future development, so that the basement may be the only available place to start with. But no matter how humble it may be, advertise it. It will be of little use to the church community unless people know about it. The opening of the center could be announced in the press as a matter of new interest, and could also be given out in services and Sunday school sessions. Other means of bringing the fact home to people would be to enlist the aid of managers of motion picture theatres, so that slides could be run at several performances, and to put up posters and signs in various parts of the town. Even if all the members of the congregation hear about the new enterprise through announcements in church, others in the community probably want to know about it, and they are reached only through the newspapers and the other channels of communication mentioned above. It won't do to let the social center hide its light under a bushel.

PASTOR AS LEADER

The pastor, in touch with the most active of his parishioners, knows which one he can call upon to do this bit of organizing and which one he can depend upon to look after an athletic or social event. He has met the musically inclined members of his congregation, and he chooses them to help him in building up a part of the programme for the new center. If he consults the various elements in the church, he will soon be able to block out his activities for the entire week. It is impossible to present a programme for a church center that will be workable in every kind of a community. It is believed, however, that the following suggestions for a Monday-to-Saturday week, being based upon experience of a veteran organizer, will be helpful.

Monday, coming after the day of rest, may be set down for the evening of athletics. It will be noted that this plan provides for activities after working hours. The leisure time field necessarily takes in all ages and conditions of people, but for our purposes the unfilled hours of the average adult will be considered. The smallest basement in a parish house or church building gives plenty of opportunities for games. Rubber quoits, indoor baseballs, basketballs, medicine balls, and the like may be introduced by the athletic committee that takes charge of the center on this particular evening. The equipment need be limited only by the available cash of the members and by the area of the rooms. As far as that goes, the entire evening could be spent in an entertaining and helpful way without any apparatus at all except a small ball. The writer recalls an evening spent in Waycross, Georgia, where the young members of a church union gathered for games. Straddle ball alone occupied the attention of the group for almost an hour. However, a standard kit of equipment (which need not cost over fifty dollars), is available, in case the members of the church center want to develop this part of the work in a thorough manner.

COMMUNITY MUSIC

Tuesday evening could be given over to a less strenuous form of endeavor; and in this connection popular singing could be encouraged. The value of community music is beginning to be recognized everywhere. Certainly it ought not to be neglected in the church center. The most beautiful pieces of church music could be studied, as well as folk-songs and Negro spirituals. An occasional organ recital could be arranged. The old-time village band seems to be going out of style in most parts of the country, and the bandstand that used to be an important part of the community life is deserted. But there is more activity in church and club orchestras. Greater attention is being paid to developing the musical gifts of the average man and woman, and here the church center could render a valuable service. To have one group of Sunday school class contest with another for musical supremacy would add to the interest of the program on Tuesday evening.

Wednesday evening may be set aside for the debating club, the literary society, or the reading circle. This would be a quiet evening spent in the company of one's friends and neighbors, with an occasional "lion" in the form of a poet or lecturer to be featured. The church center may do a great deal, if it is organized properly, in the way of civic improvement. In the Wednesday evening sessions, some practical participation in civic life may be planned, or talks may be given to those who have just attained the dignity of voting.

This form of service would also help the newly-made American from foreign parts. As long as it does not get into the realm of partisan politics, this part of the program will be extremely important.

DRAMATICS AND PAGEANTRY

On Thursday night dramatics and pageantry may be taken up. To dress up and act seems almost instinctive, it is so primitive an impulse. Certainly no real scheme of recreation would be complete unless it consulted this deeply implanted desire. And yet this could all be done so as to appeal to the highest in our nature. Here is a suggestion made by an organizer:

"Develop pageantry as a part of religious teaching. Select or construct a pageant with a succession of episodes illustrating the lessons of the season. Have one episode presented each month, each by a different class. At the end of the season, put all together and present the entire pageant for the benefit of the public. Keep and add to the costumes and properties from year to year."

At least one night should be devoted to looking after the interests of the entire community of the church center. And that could well be on Friday. On this occasion, the center may be a club, with comfortable chairs and convenient reading lamps and tables. There also should be plenty of magazines and books. If possible, flowers and evergreens should decorate the place. The victrola would come in handy here. The opportunity should be given to play quiet games such as checkers and dominoes, and group games like pit. In short, the principle that War Camp Community Service applied during the conflict could be applied in the church center. Recreation on this evening should be organized in such an informal and friendly way that it would make every member of the congregation and every resident of the community feel at home.

SATURDAY AND SUNDAY

Saturday night could be devoted to business. The center cannot be run without leadership and cooperation. Committees with competent chairmen must be developed. In athletics as in community singing and pageantry, there must be leaders. If they aren't in the neighborhood waiting to be called upon, they should be trained. There should be conferences, and there should be plans for forwarding the work.

It is a serious business, this getting all the people of the church together for a whole week, but it's worth all the time and effort that can be put into it. The churchmen will hold their people from Monday to Saturday and will have no difficulty in getting their attention on Sunday. And is not the business which has been outlined here intimately related to the things treated of in church on the seventh day? Better Christians, better neighbors will be found in the congregation after these coordinated activities have been tried out.

Prayer For Courage

WHY should I long for what I know
Can never be revealed to me?

I only pray that I may grow
As sure and bravely as a tree.

I do not ask why tireless grief
Remains, or why all beauty flies;
I only crave the blind relief
Of branches groping toward the skies.

Let me bring every seed to fruit,
Sharing, whatever comes to pass,
The strong persistence of the root,
The patient courage of the grass.

Heartened by every source of mirth,
I shall not mind the wounds and scars,
Feeling the solid strength of earth,
The bright conviction of the stars.

The Spy System in Industry

THE Interchurch Commission that investigated the Steel strike found a spy system spread through the industry. In times of emergency the plant's espionage system is supplemented by hiring professional detective agencies. These professional and commercial agencies camouflage their business under such euphonious titles as "service" agencies or corporations. The Interchurch Commission will soon issue a volume of "Supplementary Reports" in which their studies of these spy systems will be published. It will also cover an investigation of the manner in which the Pittsburgh press reported the strike, of the immigrant mind as existing in the mass of common laborers, and of the Negro as a strike-breaker. Mr. William Hard, the noted student and writer on labor problems, published a series of articles last April on the spy in industry, and at the present time Mr. Sydney Howard is reporting in the New Republic investigations made by him for Dr. Richard Cabot of Harvard University with the cooperation of Robert Dunn, a Yale man. In this article nothing more than a summary of what is found in regard to these spy systems can be given, but if such a summary leads our readers to read the coming "Supplementary Reports" of the Interchurch Commission it will have served its purpose. Every assertion here made is based upon the original studies.

* * *

The So-called "Service" Agency

The coming "Supplementary Reports" will give a list of all the larger industrial detective or so-called "service agencies." Among them are the Sherman Service whose advertisements were read in full-page displays some months back. The Baldwin-Felts is involved in the miners' war in West Virginia and several of their detectives were killed in the town of Mateawan, the story of which is now appearing from day to day in the press reports of those criminal trials. The Burns and Pinkerton agencies also were found to be accepting this kind of work as well as several other larger agencies having offices in many cities. One corporation was found to have paid a single fee of $125,000 for such service, and the income tax of another was a quarter of a million in one year. One of these firms boasted that it could deliver 10,000 strike-breakers on short notice. The forthcoming report on the Denver street railway strike of last summer will tell some astonishing things about Black-Jack Jerome's strike breakers and General Wood's summary manner in disposing of them.

Advertising to the public that they are not a detective but a "service agency" of trained experts whose business it is to conciliate, to forfend both sides against trouble, to furnish trained economists and labor conciliators, these agencies employ secret service men, many of whose reports show the crudity of their understanding of the thing with which they are dealing. Some samples of these reports will be given in the forthcoming volume of the Interchurch Commission. The reader will find them dreary, egoistic recountings of the doings of small minds, generally devoid of principle and often not showing the least acuteness in even the arts of spying. Their reports on the Interchurch Commission itself were models of ineptness, incapacity, suspicion and false judgment. In a later article I will give them somewhat in detail. The marvel of it all is that keen-minded men like industrial managers can bring themselves to place any reliance on them, let alone allow such agents to be their mediums of information regarding the men who are their "fellow-workmen," to use their own language on occasion.

* * *

How the "Service" Agency Works

The instructions of these agencies to their agents show that they prefer "influence" to the "strong-arm" tactics of yesterday. Their files are loaded with reports as to how their men enter the plants as workingmen, not only listen and report on all that is being talked and done by the workers but gain their confidence, pretend to be with them, and then counsel in any and every way that will serve their client. They join the unions, procure leading offices, initiate motions and guide union policy. They have secured the executive positions in locals, in district organizations and in one case the presidency of a state federation, reporting all doings to their employers. Through these devices they bring about cleavages, stir up prejudices and divide councils. When necessary they have fomented strikes as well as inner discords, directed strong-arm men and gunmen and stooped to the despicable business of playing pal while undoing the very men whose confidence they obtained as comrades. Their preferred work is that of propagandists, but they are out to get results even if strife and bloodshed is required.

One of the "foremen" of Sherman Service of Chicago was indicted in the criminal courts of Cook County, Illinois, "for fraudulent and malicious intent to unlawfully, wilfully and with malice aforethought kill and murder divers large numbers of persons." The case was never brought to trial, but newspaper reporters uncovered written instructions "to stir up as much bad feeling as you possibly can between the Serbians and Italians. . . . Call up every question you can in reference to racial hatred between these two nationalities. . . . Urge them to go back to work or the Italians will get their jobs." This letter of instructions, the reporters assert, was preceded by personal instructions including a statement that "there is enough ammunition stored in the plant of the Illinois Steel Company at South Chicago to shoot down every striker like a dog. It was done twenty years ago; it will be done this time." Whether the company had ammunition stored or not the temper of the instructor is shown by the statement. This agency advertised and asserted it was not a detective agency, but later sued under the explicit claim that it was such.

* * *

The Spy System or Industrial Representation

The Interchurch commission finds the spy or so-called "under-cover" system to be the alternative to some form of representation through shop committees, elected by the men themselves, and coming into conference with managers and employers with full assurance that they may confer on all problems without fear or prejudice. It is the device of autocracy and is dishonored through its use by political autocracies. It was the favorite means of the Russian bureaucracy and kept every group of Russians from village and university aware of the fact that one of their fellows was perhaps reporting their words and actions and even his suspicions regarding their inner minds. Germany had covered the world with a spy system, and one would think the very odium of it would in these days forbid its use by any organization in a democratic land. It is the device of autocracy and its very use brands its user with the odium of the autocrat. Every gang in the steel mills know one of their number is probably receiving extra pay to spy upon them.

Democracy can function only through frankness, open councils and faith in men. It implies a sharing of counsel, a willingness to be patient with the errancies of our fellow-men and the sincere spirit of cooperation. Material production is not the only end of industry, though without it nothing else will succeed, but the human factor and the democratic spirit cannot be jeopardized by its demands without grave dangers to civilization. Many great employers see this and have become partisans of experimentation in industrial democracy. Paraphrasing Lincoln's famous saying that as a house divided against itself cannot stand so a nation cannot live half slave, and half free, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., says our society cannot live politically democratic and industrially autocratic. William B. Dickson, once vice-president of the great Midvale Steel Company, has recently said, "I believe there is a grave menace to our American ideals in the highly centralized autocratic control which is becoming a marked tendency in our great industries." He calls it "the unconscious insolence of conscious power." Herbert Hoover defended the principle of collective bargaining in a recent address before the Federated American Engineering Societies and among other things said: "It is founded not only upon the sense of prevention (of labor strife) but on the human right to consolidate the worker in a proper balanced condition to uphold his rights against the consolidation of capital." We repeat that only reactionary employers will defend the labor policies of the United States Steel Corporation.

ALVA W. TAYLOR.

British Table Talk

London, February 8, 1921.

DR. T. REAVELEY GLOVER has been playing the part of the faithful friend to the church and he has not spared us. No one will be heard with more attention than the Public Orator of Cambridge who has won for himself by his writings and addresses a very wide audience indeed, both in India and in these islands, by his "Jesus of History" and more recently by "Jesus in the Experience of Men." Dr. Glover writes:

"At present nobody in England is much interested in religion. We are all waiting to see whether we also are to undergo a Bolshevik revolution, and start civilization again like Europe when the Roman Empire fell. Economics, apart from practical things like engineering and agriculture, is the one real subject of study, where study goes on. The churches are not quite leaderless, but very nearly; and it is growingly hard to find ministers for vacant pulpits or professors and students for theological colleges. We are between two ages, and no one is quite sure what the next one is to be."

* * *

Is Anybody Interested in Religion?

If this were the whole truth, it would be a mere pretense to treat the concerns of religion and its organized expression as though they were of interest still to Englishmen; but it is not the whole truth. Happily in the same breath, Dr. Glover tells how science is giving a new attention to religion and how the psychology of religion is almost an orthodox branch of science. "Religion is recognized more and more as a natural energy of man, natural and rational as art or poetry." And the same writer tells how youth is being attracted to Jesus: "They are like everybody else, impatient of the churches." There never was better material for Jesus Christ. "When they realize the weight of their burden, Christ's opportunity will have come; when they know conviction of sin, there will be a real Christianity again."

If, therefore, "nobody is much interested in religion," it must only be in "religion" interpreted narrowly. It is a true saying if that is what is meant; but in "religion" in its broad and in its true sense it would be truer to say that there never was a greater interest. A teacher in a great public school told me that his own personal friends would talk of little else and would talk of religion till the small hours. It used not to be so. The press knows, too, that if it can find the right touch in an author it is good journalism to let him speak of religion. The weekly article in The Times is a witness to this. Last Saturday, February 5, there was an exhortation to the church that it should seek fellowship through penitence. It is perfectly true that we are in the mists; we cannot tell where we are at the moment; but we do begin to know that we are lost, and we do care.

* * *

The Times Exhorts to Penitence

As an example of the interest taken in religion and not merely in ecclesiastical happenings, it may be permitted to quote from an article on "Penitence" in the Times. It was published on the eve of Lent and it was with this season in mind that the exhortation was given. Lent, it may be added, is a season which many free churchmen in this generation have discovered to be a help to them in their spiritual life; they would not think of teaching it as a matter of obligation, but they believe that it corresponds to certain needs of human life and offers spiritual gains. To all such societies and individual believers as observe Lent, the writer in the Times preaches the treasures of penitence:

"When societies are measuring themselves not by their relation to one another but by their relation to a high and final standard, then they are drawn into fellowship. Each is concerned to admit its own failures; no one church is put upon its defense by the criticisms of other churches. Each is left to discover its own sin, and sin is never fully discovered, otherwise penitence has many treasures for the children of men; it is the death of indecision and cowardice; it is the spring of cheerfulness of soul and peace; it is the secret of power, for he who has humbled himself beneath the Highest will be exalted; he who has learned to fear God will not fear man. But with all its rich gifts, penitence has nothing more timely to offer than the secret of fellowship. It makes silent the voice of boasting. It provides that other and greater concern, which reduces the minor concerns to their true proportions. It gives the New Fact which dwarfs the other persistent facts by which the churches have been long obsessed. Penitence reconciles churches to one another because it provides deliverance of mind from the prejudices which hold them out of the past. It is not so much a solution as a place of meeting; it brings an atmosphere in which things are seen lucidly; it provides the temper in which the churches may come to know each other; for they will know each other best when they cease to think in terms of comparison with one another and begin to see their own life in the light of eternity."

With such columns in mind, it is possible to believe that outside the churches there are many who are willing to listen to the teachers of religion if they will speak out in their pulpits.

Miss Royden's Quest for a Pulpit

The quest of Miss Maude Royden for a church in which she may preach in her own pulpit is still unsatisfied. Around this gifted and devoted woman the battle for the right of women to be preachers is being fought. The Lambeth proposals seem to have gone further than the executive officers of the church are willing to follow. Certainly there is a curious hesitation in the attitude of such men as the Bishop of London. The English Church Union has great power still in the Church of England. From it is heard the voice of the high church mind in its uncompromising strictness; and the E. C. U. is dead against such a ministry as Miss Royden and her friends desire. There are even rumors that her supposed heresies will be used to keep her from preaching. But that is hardly likely.

Many of the arguments used against the ministry of women are being unearthed once more; St. Paul is called as a witness by churchmen who would never think of ordering their own worship after the model of the Corinthian church. What would happen, for example, if some gardener in a village church interrupted the service by speaking with tongues! Along with the traditional arguments, there goes a more dangerous appeal which is strongly suggestive of sex antagonism. On such a matter the evidence of a very wise and critical Cambridge scholar will carry great weight. "We have heard her speak," says this observer, "to an audience of over a thousand young men and women with complete frankness and without arousing the slightest sense of shame or discomfort. The effect of such a speech was wholly and indisputably good—a result which is almost never attained by the ordinary talks on purity. Probably very few other women could have made such a speech; certainly no man could ever have done so. At the present such a power is of quite supreme importance—we want to use all the sane and ennobling forces in the land to help our young people to face the perplexities of the new relationship between men and women; clear thought and wise counsel, given and received in an atmosphere of fellowship, are supremely valuable. Miss Royden can do this great thing for us: the Lambeth report allows her to do it: surely it is criminal folly that she should not be offered a church in which to exercise her ministry."

Now if anyone supposes that Miss Maude Royden can be dismissed as Amaziah, the priest, tried to dismiss Amos, he cannot know Miss Royden or the women in the church today. But in all fairness it should be stated that though in the free church there are few legal barriers to be thrown down before women can secure their full rights, there are many barriers of prejudice and these are often as high and solid as the others. And there are not many pulpits in the free churches even now fully open to women preachers. But still we move.

Dr. Clifford Suggests Intensive Evangelism

Dr. Clifford happily recovered from his serious illness and has been preaching at a week-day service in Bishopgate Chapel. He suggests that the churches should give themselves time—a year he names—in which to practice an intensive evangelism among their own members. "I wish," he says, "that the National Free Church Council would undertake at its Manchester gathering to appoint a committee for the purpose of preparing for a two years' campaign in the interests of personal evangelism. Let that committee get to work from now till October preparing for a year of internal evangelism within the churches, educating the people in what the mind of Christ means the churches to be, and then a second year of external evangelism among people outside the churches, evangelism in which every phase of human thinking and action should be brought face to face with Jesus Christ and judged by Him."

Such a word will have weight, coming as it does from the most active of our free church leaders—once upon a time dismissed by some opponents as a "political dissenter." But it is always difficult to fix times and seasons. No one can prophesy what is likely to happen when the breath of the spirit blows upon the church. Neither whence it cometh can we tell nor whence it goeth. But there can be no doubt that we need to know what we believe; if we invite others into the caravan, we ought to know whither it is bound.

Movements in and Out

It is always difficult to make forecasts of the future because so much depends upon personality, and personality is always liable to changes. The life of the church in this land furnishes as many illustrations of changed direction as the political world. The leader of the new theologians is now a priest in the Church of England, and his manifesto is withdrawn from circulation. Dr. Orchard, once accounted a heretic, now a jubilant Catholic, tells in his own way the course of his spiritual movements. When they taunt him that he has been all around the world to get next door, he answers that they should not have built the walls so high; and besides he has learned a deal in the journey. The Bishop of Durham twenty-five years ago would have been horrified to think that he should preach for a nonconformist. There are several leading Roman Catholics who were once Anglicans or nonconformists; few seem to come the other way, from Rome, but among the Unitarians there was Charles Hargrove, an attractive and gracious teacher, who moved from the Brethren to the Dominicans, and thence to Unitarianism. Most men remain in the church of their birth, but allowance must be made for those who will break away, and they are not the least powerful. There is an incalculable factor in all human affairs. No one can be quite sure what will become of a Saul of Tarsus, and upon the answer to that question much depends. If anyone had said ten or twenty years ago that one day Mr. Cripps, K. C., a stern, unbending tory churchman, would try to be president of the Peace Society and a great leader in all the adventures toward international good-will, he would have seemed mad; but Mr. C. A. Cripps is now Lord Parmoor and all the world knows that he is to the fore where there is anything to be done to reduce armaments or promote fellowship between churches and nations. And now Mr. Maurice Hewlett, the author of "Forest Lovers" and many other romances, is almost if not quite a convert to the Society of Friends and its policy of non-resistance.

The Drift Toward Unity

If one may judge by the correspondence in their papers, the Wesleyan Methodists are not entirely at one in the belief that the hour has come for Methodist reunion. Roughly speaking, Methodism has three divisions, and to the outside observer there does not seem to be any inviolable reasons against their union. But to some within the parent church it appears that the time is fully come and they seem to postulate before reunion can be effective a much more burning zeal for evangelism in all Methodist hearts. It would not be safe to budget upon an early reunion of Methodism, but it is bound to come. The centrifugal tendencies of Protestantism do seem to be arrested at last. This will puzzle perhaps our Roman Catholic critics; they expected to see the process go on till Protestantism died of anarchy. But something has gone wrong with the patient; he is getting better. Churches are beginning to think of themselves as concerned more with Christianity than with their own interests, and more with Christ than with Christianity.

"The whole future of organized religion," writes a member of the Church of England, "is uncertain, and if the Church of England is to cease to be concerned chiefly with its own existence and its own interests and is to become on a large scale a distributing center of Christianity for the nation and for the world, it will quite clearly need to be galvanized with fresh life throughout its whole body. Much of its history goes to show that this vitalizing process may be immeasurably strengthened and developed by the work of a movement within its borders."

Let us then, beginning in the minor, end in the major key. The dry bones are in the valley, and they are very dry; but the breath of the Spirit is playing upon them and they may yet arise a mighty army. And then—

CORRESPONDENCE

Yale Is Still Christian!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: In a recent issue you quoted from an article by Rev. Charles Macartney published in another paper who said that the Protestant world was going over to something called liberalism in a manner which he regarded as most ominous. He referred to the change of name of Yale Divinity School as a case in point.

Mr. Macartney must indeed have been "seeing things at night." The situation may be brought before readers of The Christian Century best of all by an extract from a letter sent lately by Mr. Macartney to Dean Charles R. Brown of the Yale Divinity School:

"I was mistaken as to the change of name, and I have already acknowledged my mistake. The inference which I drew from the supposed change of title was, I now believe, totally unwarranted, and was of a nature to do injury and injustice to you and your colleagues and the institution over which you preside. I withdraw the entire statement and offer you my apology for having made it. Should you wish to do so, you are at liberty to publish this letter."

In this honorable retraction the author of the unfortunate article does justice to himself and to Yale. I hope you may find some place in The Christian Century for this brief letter of mine, by which your readers may recover any good opinion of Yale which may have been lost by reason of the article. This is "an old and honorable school of the prophets." It has not "gone over" to Unitarianism, nor to any other theory or practice which diminishes the glory and supremacy of Jesus Christ as the Son of God and the Savior of men.

Agrees With Jones on Wilson

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Occasionally one reads something so indisputably just and timely that he would do great violence to his own conscience not to commend. It seems like the first sign of recovery from a great public disorder to read in The Christian Century the recent contribution by Rev. Edgar DeWitt Jones on Woodrow Wilson. We have just passed through a shameful and unjustifiable era of abuse of the retiring President that will be the marvel of the future historian, and an eternal blot on the name of the American people. He has now been accused of a maudlin incapacity that would shame an imbecile, and again charged with a fiendish and malevolent ingenuity that would make Satan appear a benevolent novice. He has meant anything and everything but what he said, and his actions have been given every significance but the obvious. An amusing effort at profound analysis appeared recently in a very popular weekly. It was contributed by one of the most noted scribes in America. He showed very conclusively that the immense egotism and selfishness of the President drove him to seek a third nomination for the presidency and that his utter failure was the culmination of his downfall. The conclusive evidence that he was seeking the nomination, when all the intricate steps of the argument were properly wrought out, was that the President had never at any time said that he wanted the nomination! We have been forming conclusions with regard to Mr. Wilson and then piling up sophistries to justify the conclusions. For one to recognize some of the obvious things, as Dr. Jones has done, is something that was hardly to be expected so soon after the crucifixion of the President. How refreshing for one to say that he fought a hard, honest, and consistent fight at Versailles; that his seeming failure was not due to any lack of ability nor to abandonment of his principles; that the obstacles which he faced and could not surmount were the electorates of the allied nations, who, impelled by the hatreds bred of the long war, and the inordinate greed that was born of the opportunity, sent men to the conference with mandates to make a treaty that has offended the conscience of the world; that the chief obstacle to his success was a public opinion in America fed by partisan selfishness and ambition, and nourished by rancor and revenge.

The prophet of a sane world order retires broken and dishonored, amidst the maledictions of the millions who, in the language of Mr. Dickinson, are paying dearly for his defeat. He can never come back. His silver head and stricken limbs are marked for the tomb and not for the seats of the mighty. He will be with the saints long before the slow growth of public opinion will turn again to the benign policies which he advocated. In the meantime may God give to President Harding and Secretary Hughes the love of humanity and far-seeing statesmanship that is needed in the unavoidable intimacies of the present world order to keep those intimacies from developing into seething hatreds and annihilating wars. While it was impossible to realize the vision of Wilson, let us pray that we may have caught something of its glory, enough to soften in a degree the terrible realities that everywhere are "breaking the heart of the world."

Christ is Not Sectarian

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I rejoice in the fact that we have one religious journal interested in the kingdom of God as a whole, giving us the best concerning the advance movements in the church of Christ and telling us about the beacon lights of the pulpit in the whole of Christendom. I have little interest in the statistics of a section of the church and of the movements of one of the fractions. I am especially interested in the movements of the entire army that has as its objective the reduction of the fractions to a common religious denominator, that they may be a united whole.

I am glad that we have one journal that believes, that by serving together, we will most quickly see the common religious denominator, and that to be loyal to the whole church is the way to show the highest loyalty to one's particular communion.

through to solution in terms of continents and hemispheres, nothing save the catholicity and universality of the religion of our Divine Lord will satisfy and bring world solidarity, race unity and universal good-will. There is no such being as an Episcopalian, Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist or Disciple Christ. When you can make God a German God or an English God or an American God then may it be possible to confine Christ within denominational lines. ISAAC N. GRISSE.

Christian Unity and History

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Will you permit me to say that the editorial in the current issue of The Christian Century on "Christian Unity and History" is the most valuable, as it is the most searching and illuminating contribution to the vexed question of church unity that has come to my attention, and I have been a somewhat careful student and advocate of the subject for a quarter of a century. I think your thesis offers a solution of the problem that not one man in ten thousand has ever thought of. I wish the main idea of that editorial might be enlarged and put into book form—like Dr. Manning's "Call to Unity." At any rate I want to thank you for it. GEORGE C. DEMOTT.

The Best Ever

SIR: The Christian Century is to me the most vigorous, sane, and stimulating exponent of the ideals of Jesus I have found. While pulling me constantly up to the first line trench of Christian advance, it connects me up afresh each week with the never-failing source of power that makes it possible to hold the advance position.

In the field of religious journalism The Christian Century is without a peer. I admire its fearless facing of new issues and its generous, liberal, undenominational outlook upon the great field where we Christian laymen and ministers are struggling to build the kingdoms of this world into the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

May the Christian Century grow in power and influence to lead in the supreme effort to harness the great spiritual energies of Christianity to the task of establishing the love and righteousness of God in the hearts and lives of all mankind.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Blessed Cross *

ONE of the richest experiences of my seminary career was a short period of study under Dr. Edward Judson, pastor of the Washington Square Institutional church, New York. He used to take us up to his room—one or two fellows at a time, build a fire of drift wood and while the copper and green flames wrapt the wood he talked to us of books and of ways of working. I recall that he told us his custom of using hymns as a part of his morning devotions. He would read several hymns aloud and then take up his Bible and study and then pray. How good that sounds to my heart today—for it seems to me that my heart has almost become like Jesus' wheat field—a hard path—so much business has gone tramping, tramping, tramping over the soil. Turn then with me to a great hymn:

"My sins, my sins, my Saviour,
They take such hold on me,

*Lesson for March 20, "Jesus on the Cross." Scripture, Matthew 27:33-50.

I am not able to look up,
Save only, Christ, to thee.
In thee is all forgiveness,
In thee abundant grace;
My shadow and my sunshine—
The brightness of thy face."

No term in the English language is more abused than "cross." What is the cross? It is that on which Christ laid (and lays) down his life for the world. My "cross" is not some little service; my cross is that on which I lay down my life for the good of others and if there is no life-work by which I do that, I have no cross worth considering. The cross on Calvary was the culminating, consistent proof of Jesus' sacrificial living. It commends sacrifice in my life, for I am not willing to let "Jesus bear the cross alone."

"There is a green hill far away,
Without a city wall,
Where the dear Lord was crucified,
Who died to save us all.
Oh, dearly, dearly has he loved!
And we must love Him too,
And trust in his redeeming blood,
And try his works to do."

St. Francis believed that the stigmata came upon his body, St. Catherine had the same belief. Dr. Walker of Yale seems to accept the fact and to leave us to account for it. This only I know, that these saints brooded upon the cross and lived the sacrificial life indicated by the cross. I see St. Francis touching the lepers as his Master touched them, I see him taking the poor up in his arms as Christ did, I see him wearing himself out in unending service, passionate in doing good. The cross was not a gilded symbol on a prayer-book to him, not a jewel at some lady's throat, not a charm on some clergyman's watch-chain! The cross—that means life and death.

"What language shall I borrow,
To thank Thee, dearest friend,
For this Thy dying sorrow,
Thy pity without end?
Oh make me Thine forever;
And should I fainting be,
Lord, let me never, never,
Outlive my love to Thee."

Think of a pure, virile, dedicated body, mind and soul, entirely to God, consistently serving Him always, brought at last, by the sin of men, to the death of the cross—that is Our Lord. Do you know the cross?

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Friends Propose Truce in Irish Controversy

The Friends are known around the world for their belief in world peace. In recent years they have been more active in their testimony. The executive committee of the Society of Friends meeting in December made the suggestion of a truce between Ireland and Great Britain. The text of the resolution was as follows: "We desire to support most earnestly the suggestion made in the House of Commons, and by religious leaders both in England and in Ireland, for a Truce of God during which all parties may come together. In such an atmosphere alone, with its cessation of crime and violence, can a just and lasting settlement be reached, and we unite in the prayers of all who are working to bring this about."

Episcopalians Feel Shortage of Ministers

The Protestant Episcopal church wrestles with the man problem in carrying on the work of religion. This problem is felt in varying degrees in the different communions, being most of all acute in those denominations which like to be "Liberal." The Living Church in a recent issue states the problem for the Episcopal church in these words: "The shortage is acute. According to the figures in the last Living Church Annual we have 5987 clergy, of whom not to exceed 5000, and probably less, are engaged in parochial and missionary work; and we have 9031 parishes and missions to be served by these 5000. Worse still, last year's gain in parishes and missions was 45, while the gain in clergy was but twenty-seven. The fact that the clergy are aided by 3139 lay readers makes it possible for fairly regular Sunday services to be maintained in nearly all the parishes and mission stations, and the clergy divide themselves among the lay-manned churches and give the sacraments as frequently as they can. It is a makeshift but it keeps things going: how inadequately appears from the fact that our communicant list scarcely grows at all, and in many dioceses the increment does not equal the annual loss by death and otherwise. In 1916 the five eastern seminaries of this church had 256 students; today they have 179 students."

Largest Negro Church in the World

The largest negro church in the world is in Chicago. It is of the Baptist faith and order and is led by Rev. L. K. Williams. The church has ten thousand members and a staff of twenty workers. In the number of members and the size of the staff it excels any white protestant church of the city. The pastor does not attempt to address the whole congregation every Sunday. The church has four meeting places and as many services. The pastor is a man of marked sanity, and during the race riots in Chicago he maintained a continuous prayermeeting for peace and order. His influence was altogether on the side of peace and quietness. His ministry is not only to the soul of the individual but to the community as well. He has well-considered views on the race question and on the social problems of the city negro which have gained him the respect of the whites of the city as well as the blacks.

Hold Conference on Church Music

The low grade of music used in some of the evangelical communions has proved to be a real handicap in their religious work. Some of these communions are conscious of the handicap and are now definitely set to the task of elevating musical standards. The Methodists recently held a conference at Rushville, Ind., under the supervision of Rev. J. M. Walker and considered the question of the music. The DePauw University School of Music cooperated to make the conference a success. It was the prevailing note in the conference that the Sunday schools particularly had been afflicted with cheap and tawdry music and that the church should stand for the very best hymns as the teachers of the religious spirit. The conference was so noteworthy that it was widely interpreted in the secular press as one of the heartening signs of the times in the religious world.

New Ideas Concerning the Training of Ministers

During this generation there has been a quiet revolution going on in the methods of training ministers. Although President Harper was an enthusiastic teacher of Hebrew, he made it an optional study at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. Dr. Garvie, the well-known teacher of Congregational Theological College of Edinburgh is the author of a recently published book on the work of the preacher. In an address he sums up the conclusions arrived at from a year of preaching. He believes that the theological education of the past has been too linguistic. He would lay greater stress upon the human sciences in the preparation of the minister. Particularly he feels that the study of sociology is of primary importance in the preparation of the minister. His view is that the primary loyalty of the minister is not to documents and texts, but to human life which is to be made over again into the more perfect likeness of the Father of all spirits.

Theater Service that Is Unique

In most of the large sections of the country the religious service in the theater threatens to become obsolete. Most people prefer in the long run a churchly church and a parish program. But in Buffalo there is a theater meeting that has been conducted successfully for fifteen years. It is carried on by Dr. Samuel Van Vranken Holmes, pastor of Westminster Presbyterian church. The service has its chief attraction in its message, there being little musical adornment. No evangelistic methods are ever used, and no effort to connect the people present with any Buffalo church. It is believed by the preacher that there are many people alienated from the church who want to think about religious problems, but who are not at all ready to consider church relationships.

Doing Something About Unemployment

It is evident to any close observer of economic facts that much of the unemployment at this time is unnecessary. It is not the function of the church to organize industry normally but when conditions in Bucyrus, O., became very bad this winter on account of the closing down of the industries, Rev. M. R. Sheldon, pastor of First Baptist church, arranged to have a wooded lot outside the city cleared of its timber. The wood was cut up into cord wood lengths and sold for a fair price. The proceeds of the enterprise were turned over to the men who did the work and the result was that a number of families were saved from real distress.

Large Church to be Erected

The tendency in the cities is in the direction of larger churches with a staff of specialized religious workers. Probably the greatest plant for a parish program in America is that which is being erected by First Baptist church in Dallas, Tex. The structure will cover a whole city block and is being designed to house a Sunday school of five thousand. There will be a room for the young people's meeting in which over a thousand young people can be seated. The southland has been commercially prosperous during the war and a part of the prosperity has gone into new church buildings.

Religious Hospitality and Tagore

Sir Rabindranath Tagore of India is visiting in this country and everywhere is received cordially by leading ministers of the church of Christ. Though he is a man of another religion, many of his religious ideas are harmonious with those of Christians, particularly those Christians who hold a mystical view of Christianity. While in Chicago Dr. Tagore lunched with some of the leading ministers, and he spoke at Northwestern University, expounding his characteristic views of being.

How the Small Denominations Manage

The small denominations suffer great losses these days by the constant shift of population, for in a large percentage of cases their people move where they do not find the ancestral church. The Universalists have organized a "General Convention Church" for members who live where there is no Universalist church. The members of this "General Convention Church" are not to be inactive. They will be used to circulate tracts and other literature in preparation for the coming of a Universalist church. The Orthodox Friends of Chicago have been one church for the metropolis. They have the device of a "Suburban Sunday." On the second Sunday of each month they try to get their members in the suburbs all to church. At other times there are house meetings on Sunday in the various sections of Chicago for the groups that are too small to constitute themselves into a church. It is by such means that other small denominations resist the disintegration that would immediately set in. The smaller the denomination, the more intense the loyalty, seems to be the rule.

Lenten Period and Church Activity

The Lenten period is developing many fresh enterprises in the way of religious activity. Many city churches have additional preaching services during the week. In Evanston, Ill., both the First Methodist and the First Presbyterian churches have a service each Thursday afternoon at four o'clock. In many cases the churches are holding an entire week of preaching or religious lectures. Dr. Peter Ainslie recently spent a week at Richmond, Va., speaking in First Christian church.

Noon Meetings Through Lent

While most cities will have noon-day theater meetings only through Holy Week, the city of Cleveland has arranged a series of noon-day meetings that run throughout Lent, beginning with Ash Wednesday. Bishop Frank Du Moulin, bishop coadjutor of Ohio, spoke at five noon meetings. Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, pastor of First Christian church of Springfield, Ill., spoke throughout the week beginning Feb. 28. Rev. E. A. Hanley of Rochester, N. Y., will serve through a week, as will Bishop Ernest Lynn Waldorf of Wichita, Kans. The meetings last just forty minutes, and the time is given almost altogether to the address of the day.

Thinks Christian World Should Forgive and Forget

Die Christliche Welt is one of the leading evangelical journals of Germany. Recently Johannes Herzog, a leading theologian of the Ritschlian school has written an article and published it in this journal on the lessons from the great war. He deplores the effort of English theologians to draw the Germans into any attitude of humility and repentance. He asserts that the children of the family of nations have been in a row and now with their tears and bloody noses they should forgive and forget.

Andrew Carnegie Once Owner of "Christian Work"

It is only after the death of a public man that many interesting and personal things about him may be told. Andrew Carnegie was once the practical owner of The Christian Work. Dr. Lynch had an opportunity to buy the paper and came to the steel king for aid. Mr. Carnegie said: "You buy it. Its the greatest opportunity in the world, and buy it yourself; don't form a stock company. Then you can say just what you please. See what a chance you've got! You can make it an organ of all these things we've been working on for years, and you can line up the churches with us. And then you can also preach Christian unity all the time, and the churches must be brought towards that more and more. I'm almost tempted to buy it myself," and then with a chuckle he squeezed Dr. Lynch's arm which he was holding and said: "Wouldn't the good people open their eyes to see a religious paper suddenly appear with 'Andrew Carnegie, Editor-in-Chief' on the front page? But you buy the paper."

German Proposes a League of Churches

In a leading article of Die Christliche Welt of Germany there is an article which proposes a League of Churches. It is argued that all Lutherans should have one common organization, all Calvinists another and all Anglicans another. These three great organizations could then by conference and cooperation prevent another great catastrophe like the world war. If there cannot be an effective League of Nations, the League of churches might realize the thing that the statesmen and diplomats have failed in.

Great Preacher Got Fifteen Shillings a Week

With the death of Dr. Alexander Whyte, the great preacher of Scotland, there have come to light some forgotten incidents in his life. He for a time preached for Woodside Congregational church while he was a student at Aberdeen. His contract with this church has been made public recently. He was to receive fifteen shillings a week for two sermons on Sunday and the leadership of the prayermeeting. It is evident that the salary was not enough to make him worldly.

City Council of Chicago Opens With Prayer

One of the recent innovations in Chicago is that the meetings of the City Council will be opened with prayer. It is provided that ministers, priests and rabbis shall officiate in turn. If there is any place in the world where prayer is needed, it is in the city council. While the formality may not mean much to some of the habitues of the council chamber for a time, the effect in the long run will be more respect for righteousness and some sense of stewardship to God in the conduct of public business.

Evangelical Layman Protests

In England there is an organization known as the Body of Dissenting Deputies which concerns itself with the alleged encroachments of the state church on the liberties of the nonconformists. At a recent meeting of the organization Mr. John Massie spoke. He declared that the state church had by the recent Enabling Act been organized as a sect, but it still maintained all of its rights as a state church, particularly in the control of education. The action of David Lloyd George, the premier, in providing a senate in South Ireland composed partly of Roman Catholic and Anglican bishops also came in for denunciation. That such an action should come from a nonconformist prime minister was held to be an inconsistency. The speaker deplored the accommodating spirit of certain of the nonconformist ministers and insisted that if there was to be unity there must be justice first. The transactions of this society represent the sentiments of a considerable section of British society.

Preacher Dies in Faith He Preaches

Dr. J. Frank Smith, former moderator of the Presbyterian church, and citizen of Dallas, Texas, spent the last few months of his life in writing an autobiography. In this he says: "That eternal life whose dream painted the heavenly scenes of the Bible I doubt not exists, any more than I doubt my own existence. As to what immortality is, I know little; but when I glide over the bar where I hope to meet the Pilot, I want a chance to pursue diligently still some lowly task—perhaps to be sent back to earth to sow good influences around those I love and others whom I could not reach, and to bring them, with descriptions of heaven, to live to make first the kingdom of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. The old faith I have preached is the faith in which I shall die, but I know not yet what he may reveal of its beauty. God knows when to harvest his grain."

Czecho-Slovakia Considers Disestablishment

The new republic of Czecho-Slovakia is now considering disestablishment of the church. Radical legislation has already passed introducing divorce. A bill is before the legislative bodies that would take over all the monasteries and schools. Churches would be dispossessed of their properties and all religious denominations would receive grants of property from the state for their work. There is much in this program which is similar to that of Russia. The spirit seems to be to make a complete separation between religion and the state.

Pew Rent System Is Being Applied

Rapid progress is being made in all communions over the country toward the ideal of free seats in all of the churches. Although the plan of renting pews has been successful as a money-getter, it has made the church a class church, and has seemed to many to violate the ideals of Christian democracy. The older communions started their churches on the pew-renting basis and these have had the greatest difficulty in accomplishing the change. The Congregationalist notes the progress of the reform in these words: "The free pew reform is also most noticeable in New England. Fortunately most of the Western churches were started on that basis. Churches in the East which never rented pews are chiefly of recent origin. However, the leaven has spread, and even in this conerative region some strong churches like Central in Boston have within a year or two abandoned the plan of selling or renting pews. One of the latest of the churches in the Boston metropolitan area to take this step is the ancient Eliot church, in Newton. It is difficult to present any argument in favor of continuing to rent pews in the house of the Lord other than precedent which, if it is backed by no other reasons, is the poorest argument that can ever be brought forward to fortify a church in its devotion to the God of things as they are. No church, to our knowledge, has ever regretted its espousal of the free pew system."

Interchurch Film Taken Over

The film that was acquired by the Interchurch World Movement for the purpose of making clear the enterprise of foreign missions has been put to work again. It was sold to the International Church Film Corporation. In the lot was 38,000 feet of film taken in India and China; 6,000 in Central America and 10,000 in northern Africa. This film may now be rented by churches which have machines. The motion picture method of making vivid the scenes on the mission fields is no longer an experiment and has been found in the experience of many churches a method of interesting a much wider circle in the evangelization of the world.

Finds a Precedent for Women Preachers

The orthodox have been urging against the idea of women preachers the lack of scriptural precedent. Usually when the church has wanted to do anything it has managed to find some sort of precedent. Recently a Congregational woman preacher of England, Rev. Constance L. Colman has made the happy discovery of a direct command to two women to preach the gospel. Jesus told the two Marys right after his resurrection to go and tell his disciples. "If the two Marys had obeyed the prohibition laid down by the English Congregational Union rather than the bidding of Jesus, the disciples would never have seen Jesus at all!" Meanwhile the antis have brought up nothing better than Dr. Johnson's remark to Boswell: "Sir, a woman preaching is like a dog walking on its hind legs. It is not well done, but you are surprised to find it done at all."

Catholic Church Does Not Rule Quebec

There has been continuous litigation running through a number of years in Quebec because Catholics held that the canon law of the Roman Catholic church was also the civil law. Recently the case of a marriage of fourth cousins was carried up to the privy council of London. Here the ruling was made that with the conquest of Canada by the British, the canon law of the Roman church ceased to be the civil law. There has been much conflict over the intermarriage of protestants and Catholics, priests being permitted to perform these marriages while ministers were not. Henceforth priests and ministers will be on an equal footing before the law and the punishment of a Catholic church member cannot be carried out by the sword of the civil magistrate.

Old Uniform Lesson System Voted Out

The various Sunday school organizations of North America held a meeting in Chicago recently and voted out the old uniform lesson. The reform in educational methods has taken over ten years, but it is at last clearly recognized that different aged pupils should have different curricula. In place of the uniform lessons of the past there will be group lessons for the smaller schools that feel they cannot use the graded lesson system entire. The graded lessons will not be modified save as they are modified by the denominations themselves. The lesson committee was headed by Professor L. A. Weigle of Yale University. There are forty-two members of the committee, twenty of whom are editors of the various Sunday school publications.

Well-Known Lecturer Will Speak on Bross Foundation

The Bross Foundation of Lake Forest College has already enlisted the services of some of the most eminent of the Christian scholars of the world. The lectures this spring will be given April 4-9 by Rev. John P. Peters, Ph.D., noted archeologist. Dr. Peters made a single discovery which dated recorded history back two thousand years. Dr. Peters was rector of St. Michael's church in New York before becoming an archeologist. His father and grandfather were also rectors of this church.

Presbyterian Board Remembers the Prisoners

"I was sick and in prison and ye came unto me" is an enconium which cannot be given to some sections of the Christian church today. There are over 500,000 prisoners in America today in the various institutions; more men in prison than there are college students. The Presbyterian Board of Temperance and Social Welfare proposes to do something for these prisoners. They will have regular visitation. In cities where there are large numbers of visiting wives, there will be a home for these visitors. Jobs will be secured for discharged men. It is proposed to provide a staff of visiting ministers for every prison.

Unitarian Has Plan for Christian Union

While the various denominations in the world express their attitude toward unity, little has been heard from the liberal denominations sometimes branded as "unorthodox." Some of the members of these sects thoroughly enjoy their separateness if one may judge from their utterances, but the aspiration for unity is reaching every section of the religious world. Recently Rev. Augustus P. Record, pastor of First Unitarian Church of Detroit, voiced his idea of unity in the Christian Register. He says: "And what is the remedy? It is so simple that one hesitates to name it. Just a

By George Cross. $1.25, postpaid $1.35. This book is a comprehensive survey of the rival interpretations of Christianity.

The Spread of Christianity in the Modern World

By Edward C. Moore. $2.00, postpaid $2.15. A survey of the history of missions since the beginning of the modern era and a discussion of the present situation in India, Japan, China, Africa, the Ottoman Empire, the Americas, and the islands of the seas.

The Religions of the World

By George A. Barton. $2.00, postpaid $2.15. What are the great religions of the world and what elements do they hold in common? The author ably answers this two-fold question in seventeen chapters that read as easily as a story.

The Revelation of John (Revelation)

By Shirley J. Case. $2.75, postpaid $2.90. The author explains the meaning of the book as it was intended to be understood by those to whom it was first addressed. Special attention is given to the explanation of such terms as "beast," the anticipated end of the world, the millennium, and the new Jerusalem.

The Gospel in the Light of the Great War

By Ozora S. Davis. $1.50, postpaid $1.65. This book is designed as a workable manual for the preacher who is facing the opportunities of the pulpit in a new age. The suggestions offered are examples of a profitable way to work the rich mine of biblical and recent literature.

The Parables of Jesus in Their Relation to His Ministry

By Willard H. Robinson, Jr. The purpose of this book is to present a new method of interpreting the parables, namely that of discovering the original setting in which the parable was spoken, of making clear the truth taught at the time, and applying that truth to the solution of our modern problems. $1.50, postpaid $1.65. Ready in April.

larger measure of Christian humility, of ecclesiastical refinement and good-breeding, of breadth of mind and modesty of spirit. The differences between the denominations in the church universal are no wider or deeper than the differences between members of the same church. The same spirit of courtesy and good-breeding which secures harmony and co-operation in one will produce the same results in the other. It calls only for that spirit of magnanimity which loves truth and reveres liberty and knows that only in an atmosphere of freedom can truth be attained. The attempt to secure unity through the recognition of one ecclesiastical authority has failed. When compelled to choose between a broken body and an outraged conscience, men have chosen the broken body. The attempt to secure unity through the acceptance of a common creed has failed. When called upon to believe the unbelievable or be branded as heretics and infidels, men have accepted the stigma. Now we are ready for the experiment of a community of faith,—of democracy in religion as well as in government,—and we have every reason to expect success. The world is ready and eager for some basis of Christian fellowship which will leave every man free to think his own thought and every church free to formulate its own belief while it unites all men and all churches in a common worship and a common work. Christianity is larger than any denomination or sect, and in God's great field of labor there is room and work for all."

Protestant Movement Started Among Lithuanians

There are about a million Lithuanians in the United States, but up until recently there was no protestant mission work among them. There are 100,000 of these people living in Chicago, and 150,000 reside in New York and vicinity. The Presbyterians have started some work among them and the Lithuanian Educational Society has been organized. This society not only provides preaching in the United States but will carry on Protestant work in Lithuania. It is hoped to secure $100,000 for Lithuanian work in the United States this year, as the field seems to be an open one. The population has been nominally Catholic.

Dr. Clifford Honored by the King

Dr. John Clifford, veteran Baptist minister of England, has been honored by the King of England by being decorated with the Order of Companions of Honor. This title is held by only 28 Britishers. Dr. Clifford has had many a joust in his day, being known as a fierce fighter for his views, but there is throughout the British Empire a thorough respect for his stalwart character.

Baptist Theologian Says Devil Invented the Gothic

It is well known that Baptists favor a temple type of architecture rather than the Gothic. Being throughout their history a dissenting organization and never a state church, this may be a reaction against the authorized religion with which they have always had to live. That this attitude should be embodied in a theological theory is somewhat new. Dr. A. T. Robertson, a teacher in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary of Louisville, has asserted that the Gothic architecture was invented by the devil in order to make preaching ineffective. This assertion is based upon the alleged bad acoustics of Gothic structures.

Threaten the Protestant Daily

The new Christian daily of Chicago, called the Standard, has brought down the wrath of the Catholic church upon its head. It has spoken of that church as "Romish" and "Popish" and the result is that the New World calls upon the faithful to withdraw their advertising. Probably the officials of the church have been waiting for a chance to declare war on the new publication. Meanwhile it remains to be seen just how far this threat of economic boycott can be enforced.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL HYMNAL EVER PRODUCED BY THE AMERICAN CHURCH

HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH

Edited by CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON
and HERBERT L. WILLET

FOR THE USE OF CHURCHES OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

CONTAINS all the great hymns which have become fixed in the affections of the Church and adds thereto three distinctive features:

Hymns of Christian Unity

Hymns of Social Service

Hymns of the Inner Life

These three features give HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH a modernness of character and a vitality not found in any other book. This hymnal is alive!

It sings the very same gospel that is being preached in modern evangelical pulpits

Great care has been bestowed on the "make-up" of the pages. They are attractive to the eye. The hymns seem almost to sing themselves when the book is open. They are not crowded together on the page. No hymn is smothered in a corner. The notes are larger than are usually employed in hymnals. The words are set in bold and legible type, and all the stanzas are in the staves. Everything has been done to make a perfect hymnal.

dresses the young people on themes which are particularly interesting. Dr. Stone manages to spend a few minutes each Sunday morning in the service. This service will help reduce the number of those denied admission to the church for lack of room and at the same time provide the young people with a ministry more suited to their own life problems. There are a number of children's services in church basements over the country, but so far as reported this seems to be the first special service for young people at the morning hour.

Churches and Movie Houses in War

War has broken out in Utica, N. Y., between the representatives of the moving picture houses and the ministers. A newspaper is the battle ground. The offending newspaper published an article and an advertisement which displeased the movie barons and they called upon the editor to retract or they would withdraw their advertising. The editor refused to change his course and the advertising was withdrawn. At this stage the ministers got into the fight and the question of Sunday movies will be resubmitted at the spring election. One theater in the city has decided to close on Sunday without any law compelling it to do so, and will stand its loss.

Sermon Sent by Radio Every Sunday

Every Sunday the morning sermon of Rev. C. B. Wells, pastor of Fairmont Congregational church, of Wichita, Kans., is sent to thousands of radio amateurs through the air. A devoted Congregational layman is responsible for this service. He is head of the Cos-Radio company of Wichita. Finding the air full of talk one Sunday evening he sent in a "Q. S. T.," and inquired why the operators were not in church. They responded by asking why he was not at church. He replied that he was tending the baby while his wife went, and then he gave an account of the morning service. This Sunday evening service is now a feature for the amateur operators for hundreds of miles around Wichita. The gospel has found new wings with which to fly. There is a Methodist pastor in the west who preaches from an airplane who says the church is not up-to-date.

Layman Demands Freedom in Joining Church

Abraham Lincoln once declared that he would join a church if he could find one that would take him in on a declaration of faith in the fundamentals of Jesus' teachings, love to God and love to his neighbor. That many another layman has stumbled at the theological demands of the churches is evident by a very little study. This was dramatically illustrated recently in a well-known Baptist church in New York. Dr. Stephen A. Smith, a man ninety-eight years of age had once been baptized by his son-in-law, but had never found a church which seemed to guarantee to him soul freedom. Recently he appeared before the officary of Fifth Avenue Baptist church and made the following statement: "I wish to join a church which will allow me the freedom of interpreting Christ for myself. I may not interpret him exactly as you do, nor agree with Luther or Augustine; I may see him a little differently from the picture held by some writers of sacred Scripture. But I must study him with such faculties and aid as God has given to me; I must experience him for myself and be loyal and obedient to such light and experience as I have." He was received into the church on this statement.

Baptists Find Heresy in English Seminaries

The suspicion of theological seminaries which has been assiduously cultivated in this country by agents of certain conservative institutions, and by conservative papers, finds its analogy in England. The presiding officer of Pastor's College connected with Spurgeon's Metropolitan Tabernacle in London recently asserted that eight other Baptist institutions in England were unsound, being tainted with higher criticism. The smelling committee of the Northern Baptist Convention is this winter following the trail of the higher criticism to the various colleges and seminaries. Meanwhile a few institutions have had the courage to admit that their courses are modern and to ask what the heresy-hunters are going to do about it. This seems to be the end of trouble, for all the world admires frank and manly statement of opinion.

Studies the Effect of Weather on Churches

"Fair-weather Christians" has long been a term of reproach but it has not been known just how many of these undesirable citizens there were in the world. Mr. Edwin J. Lewis has collected some statistics in the past year. He says: "March of 1920 was a generally stormy month throughout the country. The month of November, 1920, was comparatively pleasant. One hundred and twenty-three Christian churches reported the average attendance for each of these months. The average number present on Sunday morning in all the churches together for the stormy month was 6,428 and for the pleasant month 9,686. From this we infer that the membership in the order of "Fair-weather Christians" in these 123 churches is approximately 3,258, just about one-third of the average congregation on a pleasant day. The churches reporting were fairly typical, embracing those with an average attendance ranging from 18 to 437. The average attendance in the churches throughout the country on a fair day was found to be 78 and on a stormy day 52.

DO THE TEACHINGS OF

America's foremost thinkers will discuss this theme

THE YEAR 1921 is to be The Christian Century's greatest year. More than two score of the nation's foremost religious and ethical thinkers will conduct a thorough-going and unhampered discussion of the place Jesus Christ holds in the life of our times. Here is an example:

The Mind of Jesus and the Competitive System

will be discussed by

Robert Hunter, Spokesman for submerged humanity, author of "Poverty," "Why We Fail as Christians."

Harry F. Ward, Constructive radical, professor of Christian Ethics, author of "A Better Industrial Order."

Roger Babson, America's influential adviser of business men, author of "Religion and Business."

Scott Nearing, Socialist authority, a fearless agitator who believes in religion and the ethics of Jesus.

This single group alone makes The Christian Century indispensable to any man or woman who feels how urgent and how basic the industrial question is in religious and social progress. But these writers will represent only one of the many aspects of the great theme. The list of participants is a growing one. Each week adds a new stellar name to the brilliant galaxy. At this moment the writers and their themes are:

William Adams Brown
Theologian and Missionary Statesman.
"Can Society be Made Christian?"

ESUS FIT OUR TIMES?

The Christian Century during the year 1921

NEVER in the history of American religious journalism has there been so eager and widespread a response to a program of complete freedom in the discussion of Christian themes as that which The Christian Century is receiving. Its circulation has burst all denominational bonds. Thoughtful churchmen, both lay and clerical, in all communions are enthusiastic subscribers. They rejoice in a journal of religion which, without displacing denominational organs, undertakes squarely to face the problems of this new age without regard to denominational interests. The discovery—and it has been a discovery—that a periodical can be religious and at the same time free, positive and at the same time liberal in its hospitality to all enlightened points of view, has seemed to thousands of unsatisfied hearts like coming upon a refreshing spring of living water in a desert place. The Christian

Century has extended its influence into all the communions of the American church. It is equally at home among Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Disciples, Baptists, Episcopalians and other Christian groups. Its subscription list is an album of the signatures of the church leaders of the nation. Besides, it is gripping the minds of thinking men and women who have no church connection. They are astonished that from within the church which they supposed had become moribund and incurably denominationalized in its vision there should emerge a journal loyal to the church, devout and evangelical, and at the same time as free as a university class room. And they stand amazed to find themselves actually enjoying a religious paper! Churchmen and earnest-minded non-churchmen are saying that The Christian Century points toward a new day for Christian faith and practice.

The Sword or the Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

THE WAR which was to end war has left the world with more fighting and more expenditures for armaments than before it started. The Assembly of the League of Nations is unable to adopt even the slightest practical step in disarmament. Naval authorities now tell us that the submarine is essential and military authorities proclaim that poison gas is humane. New and more deadly conflicts have swung within our horizon. That this nation may become involved in war in any one of three different directions is more of a possibility than it was in 1914. Yet the one American social worker who has assessed the human costs of the recent struggle soberly declares, after he has footed the totals, that war is the negation of civilization."

Thus writes Prof. Harry F. Ward in his introductory word for this new book. "What?" he then asks, "is to be the Christian teaching concerning war? Is it going to declare judgment on the basis of the principles set forth in the gospels or will it be only the expedient servant of nationalism and continue to exhort its followers to internecine slaughter? Is the American pulpit going to continue denouncing war in general and supporting wars in particular? This question must be fairly faced and answered, one way or the other. And time presses. Mr. Page has faced the issue and has found an answer that satisfies his soul. What he has written, therefore, deserves the thoughtful consideration of all those whose duty it is to teach the people concerning the moral and spiritual validity of modern war."

Mr. Page, associated for years with Mr. Sherwood Eddy, has come close to the stupendous—and unpleasant—facts that must be faced in modern Europe. He holds that "all indications point to further wars between nations." "It is utterly impossible," he says, "to predict the course of events during the lifetime of the present generation. It may be that we shall witness scenes surpassing in horror even those of the recent war."

But Mr. Page is still an optimist—if he can believe that the Church will take itself seriously in its gospel of the Cross as the only weapon effective in bringing about real brotherhood and abiding peace.

Every minister, every thoughtful layman, every alert citizen of the United States should read this book.

A Lenten Prayer —at Jesus' Cross

THROUGH doubt and darkness we have made our way, dear Saviour, to this place of the skull where Thou payest the uttermost farthing of Thy debt of love. In the little space about Thy feet it is light, though thick night covers the far-stretching world. May we creep within the circle of Thy cross, strong Son of God, and commune with Thee even in Thy death. We yearn to share the great secret hidden in Thy heart which has driven Thee hither. Canst Thou impart to us the insight by which Thou hast rejected the things men call good and strong, and chosen an end like this in shame and pain?

How little have we understood Thee! Here at Thy pierced feet we make confession of our sin. We have worshipped Thee, but we have not believed in Thee. We have called Thee Lord, Lord, but we have not done the things Thou didst teach us to do. Thou hast been to us as an idol, and we have brought Thee our praise and our gifts, but we have lacked courage and faith to make Thee our ideal and to order our steps by Thy law of love. Sharing in the customs and systems of a world which does not accept or know Thee, we have even profited by the injustices to our fellows upon which our secular order rests. We have gloried in the sword and have cherished the immemorial delusion of its potency to advance Thy kingdom, and the fact of Thy cross has grown pale and unreal to our eyes and minds.

Canst Thou forgive us, O Master? Canst Thou still save us who have been so long time with Thee and yet have not known Thee? We plead for Thy pity, for the renewal of Thy faith in us. Here at Thy bleeding side we take our stand. Open for us the fountains of hidden power of which Thou dost drink. Show us Thy vision of reality. Release in and about our lives those mighty spiritual forces which have borne Thee to this infinite event, that we may find in our cross of love as Thou didst find in Thine the supreme law by which a warring and strife-worn world may be reconciled to itself and find peace and justice and gladness in a fellowship of brothers. For Thy name's sake. Amen.

Moving Picture Promoters Begin to See Light

THE nation-wide protest against the iniquities of the movie business has begun to make an impression upon the minds of the promoters. In a recent gathering they considered these criticisms and were led to admit that many of them are valid. Whether confession of sin will be followed by works meet for repentance remains yet to be seen. That will depend in part on the box office receipts. There can be no doubt that the protests of the secular press added to that of the religious press have brought about some change in the public attitude which has at last threatened the dividends. If that is true, reform will come. The promoters admit there has been an excess of the sex element in the pictures. They profess to be in favor of abolishing the pictures that show scenes of exaggerated spooning, bathing beach pictures and bedroom scenes. The attempted rapes which so often figure in the pictures of the past year should go along with the rest of the sex-pervert stuff. Sex itself in its normal and chivalrous manifestations should not go. It is life. So long as there are man and maid there will be honorable love, and upon this love we will weave our poetry and romance. What the people protest against is the degrega-tion of something that is sacred. And the movie promoters are beginning to see the light on their crime pictures. It may be that bank robberies actually happen every now and then, but is it best to show our American youth the technique of picking a lock or blowing a safe? Many other things happen which are much more worthy of emulation. The movie show has a great field without any of the forbidden things. Many an ancient story may be given us again on the screen. The people of other countries may be made to live before us and thus become through better acquaintance our brothers. There are infinite ranges of clean fun with which the world may be made to laugh. There is a chance yet to retrieve the movie business from the judgment of that magazine which pronounced it "the worst failure in the world."

What is the Use of a Creed?

FOLLOWING the conferences on Christian unity held in Switzerland last summer there has come to be a quickened interest in the question of a creed for the united church. Whether the church should be the Nicene or the Athanasian or a modern creed is not now the paramount question. The real question is what shall the church do with a creed. In the history of the church creeds have been used for a variety of purposes. They usually have been framed as a device for confuting heresy and have been used as a sort of yard-stick by which theologians of the minority opinion have been measured and condemned. When the particular emergency passed, the creed was retained in the liturgy of the church. This is the chief function of the so-called apostles' creed. The creed at baptism and the creed at ordination have often been a matter of liturgy. At the examination previous to ordination, however, some creed has usually been used with which to judge the correctness of the opinion of the candidate. Men are accepted or condemned by this measuring stick. What use would the modern church make of a creed? If it were simply a matter of liturgy, many of the historic creeds could be said as our hymns are sung, with the necessary amount of mental reservation. A man does not refuse to sing a hymn because some word or clause in it offends him, nor would he refuse to say a creed, if it were understood to be a symbol of the faith of the past. We all have historical imagination enough to include in our confession not only our own definitions, but the definitions made by the generations out of which we have sprung. But creeds have been the instruments of schism in every age. Even a respectable old creed embedded in the liturgy may on occasion become a device of division and strife among Christ's followers today just as it did in the past. Why undertake to standardize the thinking of the church on the great themes of the gospel? Thought refuses any fetters. The church of the future needs no creed but Christ himself. Christ is Christianity. If religion is life, nothing but a life can adequately express it. In the unity councils of today it cannot be too vigorously asserted that the creedal method of unity has failed, and that it is time to try the unity with which the early church began but which it failed to maintain, a unity based on loyalty to a common Lord within which the mind is left unfettered to pursue the truth.

Trying to Live by Negations

THE profane type of rationalist is very impatient with the humble Christian for believing things. The injunction of the gospel to "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ" seems to him an impertinence. "How can a man believe a thing that he cannot prove? Can one coerce his mind?" the impatient one queries. There are thousands of men who think they are hard-headed and rational who actually believe that they hold no opinions except those that have been proved. Yet the sophisticated person knows that very few of our opinions are really beyond all doubt. The leaders of the race have lived far more by imagination than by pure reason. Columbus sailed westward, not because he had proved that the world was round, but because he believed it. That doctrine was never really proved until a ship's company actually sailed around the globe. Republican government was tried in this country as an experiment. It is only the centuries that can give the demonstration. Democracy is on trial. Universal education has yet to vindicate its claims. The aristocrat believes that we are losing our supply of dependable common labor, and plunging into the abyss socially on account of universal education. Those who deny can never go forward. It is only the man who affirms who makes any headway in the labyrinth of life. It is the genius of the Christian religion to teach men to walk by faith. That is the use of the consecrated imagination in working out life's problems. The Christian is not ashamed to confess that he believes more than he can prove. It is not only his right but his duty to have faith and to go forward. Infidelity is dying out in modern society because men feed their souls on negations. In place of a barren and profane rationalism we are developing a humble but not less rational faith in the things of the spirit.

Judge Landis and His Enemies

ENEMIES of Judge Landis of Chicago are active and loud of speech. They have made a number of accusations, the most important dealing with the connection of the judge with the baseball interests. It is worth examination, however, to see who these enemies are. One is reported to be an employer of child labor who has resented the suggestion of the judge that corporations should pay young people a living wage. This suggestion on the part of a federal judge is regarded by this southern gentleman as bolshevism. The child labor element have but little use for the judge. It is not forgotten by some of the plutocratic gentry that Judge Landis tried the Standard Oil case some years ago which resulted in the partition of that vast corporation. Whether its partition did any good or not is beside the mark. It was believed by most people that it would do good and the judge had the courage to give the decision which seemed to be indicated by the law and the testimony. But just for this reason some of the corporation magnates have looked askance at Judge Landis ever since. And of course the bootleggers have no particular love for this federal judge. While some judges have voiced criticism of the eighteenth amendment which they had by their oath of office sworn to enforce, Judge Landis has believed that it was not his task to make the laws but to enforce them. In Chicago the bootleggers' trust would like to see a new judge upon the supreme bench. So child labor advocates and plutocrats and bootleggers make an unholy coalition to bring about the downfall of this man whose name strikes terror to evil doers in all parts of his jurisdiction. There may be some question about the wisdom of a federal judge taking any other salaried position, though one will be lenient on this point when he finds out that a federal judge in these days of high rents and profiteering in the necessities of life is paid only $7,500 a year. If Judge Landis is removed, or goaded until he resigns, we are almost certain to have a worse judge in Chicago. And the forces of the underworld will have scored one more victory over the children of the light.

Chicago Mothers Study the Dance

THERE is grave unrest in Chicago in the circles of the women's clubs over the modern dance. This is not the result of churchly propaganda. Indeed some of the churches are bringing the dance into the parish house at the very moment when the mothers are asking that it be thrown out of the public school. The occasion of the anxiety lies in certain reports with regard to the morals of high school young people in different sections of Cook County. It seems evident that the dance is in for a muck-raking, not by the church but by the women's clubs. At the very time when the young people are most interested in the dance, there is the best chance in the world to study its effect. Of course it is only prudish and dogmatic minds that object to certain of the better interpretative dances. They involve no sexual suggestiveness, no contact of the sexes. The old conventional dances, when carried on in the homes and among people who had already learned to respect each other have long been defended by people of undoubted purity and spirituality. But that is not the popular and typical dance that captures the young people of today. The dance is a place to meet strangers. There is mystery and romance about going to a big ball and dancing with some one never known before. There is also every opportunity for the libertine and the professional vampire to get in their deadly work. Even in more exclusive circles the dance increases in its sexual suggestiveness. It is historically true that more than one of the modern dances have been invented in the dives of seaport cities among abandoned people. These dances are now the amusement of young people of good families who only vaguely understand the influence of this kind of dance in their lives. Of course the mothers would do well to look also into the influence of the moving picture as a source for much of the morbid sexuality of today. When the study of recreation is complete it will show that commercialized recreation nearly always tends to become vicious. Recreation should be rescued from big business, and made one of the concerns of the whole community like religion and education.

The Christian Defense of the Jew

JEWISH papers in dealing with the recent diatribe of the Dearborn Independent against the Jews, have reprinted a great deal of matter from Christian journals. While the Jew has expected the church in other lands to be his chief persecutor, he has found in America to his astonishment that the most vigorous protests against anti-Semitism have arisen in the ranks of the Christian church. There is no great body of Christians in America today that would vote for anything else than the complete freedom of the Jew to enjoy his religion to the utmost. It is by this very fact that the great wall between Judaism and Christianity is being battered down. When one reads a work in systematic theology written by a liberal Jew and compares it with a similar work written by a modern-minded Christian, he finds an astonishing similarity. Through twenty centuries the Jew has unconsciously assimilated much of the Christian view of life. Much of the Christian view was Old Testament religion. It was the genius of Jesus to separate the wheat from the chaff in handling the Old Testament, as he does in the sermon on the mount. The point of difference is with regard to the place that is given to Jesus. As the Jews realize more and more what Jesus has meant to the world's life, they will in the exercise of their freedom give him a larger place in their hearts. Meanwhile the Jew is being approached by some who would convert him to premillennialism and verbal inspiration. These missionaries will have a hard time. The Jew has already outgrown the very ideas that are being presented to him as new. He will tell these missionaries that he has a better religion than theirs. So long as Christianity is only a doctrine of a world cataclysm, the Jew has the advantage. His religion when liberally interpreted is superior. It is the modern evangelical statement of Christianity that alone may hope to bridge the gap between the disciples of Moses and the disciples of Jesus.

Finds Radicalism in the Church

MR. EVERETT P. WHEELER of the National Civic Federation has been seeing things at night. His recent report charging the churches with social radicalism is quite a different kind of a charge from the more common one that the church has been the tool of the wealthy and the refuge of conservatism. Some journals find in the charges of Mr. Wheeler something that should alarm the churches, and lead to defensive action. As a matter of fact, the churches can stand a good deal of criticism just such as Mr. Wheeler is giving. This criticism is just as ill-founded as many another contemporary criticism. The gentlemen who are busy criticising the church are mostly people who do not take the trouble to journey around and find out what the churches are like. Taking the official declarations of the various churches, Protestant and Catholic, there is no question but that the churches in America are on the progressive side of social questions, though they are by no means radical. They favor the short working day, an ample wage, healthful working conditions, the abolition of child labor, the limitation, on grounds of social welfare, of the labor of women, and many other reforms not in industry but in family life. On the other hand, churches seem to socialists and honest-to-goodness radicals as hopelessly conservative institutions. They do not come out for the Marxian paper utopia, save in exceptional instances of ministers and laymen. They have no use for the class consciousness doctrine which seems to the churches a negation of the doctrine of universal brotherhood taught by Jesus Christ. They do not believe in the settlement of industrial disputes by violence. For all of these and other reasons the churches are hated by revolutionary radicals. Meanwhile, to the plain man of the street it is a matter of satisfaction that the church does not stand with the radical capitalists who would saddle and bridle the working population, nor with the bomb-throwing fanatics who seek progress in disorder. In the long run it will be seen that however slow and cautious the church has been in perceiving the social goal of its true endeavors, its heart is with the people, and its supreme passion for the kingdom of God will some day result in a thorough-going application of the ethics of Jesus to all the problems of human welfare.

The New Mysticism

OUR age seeks for efficiency, for visible and tangible results, and it wants them at once. If results are not immediately forthcoming, it is restive and ready for change, as if impatient with profounder things which require time for fruition. It is idle to quarrel with a spirit so atmospheric and insistent, and for all the achievement of our age in energy and enterprise let us be grateful. But it has another side, of which we need to be reminded, else we may undervalue, if not ignore, influences without which we undo ourselves no matter how much we do. There are quieter forces at work unobserved and unwearying, and if they were withdrawn our most earnest labor would be in vain.

History, no less than philosophy, has its paradoxes, and one of the notable facts about our age—scientific, social, dynamic—is a rediscovery of the inner life. In the midst of our materialism one discerns a new interest in mysticism, taking many forms—some of them eccentric and unhealthy—but everywhere betraying a great hunger of the soul. The late Father Tyrrell may not have been right in his prophecy that the religion of the future will be a blend of “mysticism and charity,” but he foresaw a deepening of the life of the spirit. Despite our enterprise and invention—perhaps because of them—humanity, by a profound inner urge, is yearning for a more satisfying sense of eternal realities. The world tragedy has made us mystics, if we were not so before, and the demand is for a religion that is real, inward, and endlessly rich in inspiration for new adventures in service. Disillusioned of a materialistic civilization, distrustful of a barren intellectualism, and dissatisfied with a religion which has none but claims of external authority to put forth, men are seeking God and finding him, where he is surely found, in the human soul; in what Boutroux called “the Beyond that is Within.”

Florence Nightingale wrote: “The kingdom of heaven is within us! These words seem to me the most of a revelation, of a New Testament, of a gospel—of any that are recorded to have been spoken by our Saviour.” Herself a mystic, with a sure insight she seized upon the words which, if not a definition, are the most perfect description of mysticism anywhere to be found. For mysticism, as the word means, is what we see with the eyes closed—when we look within. But Nightingale, it need hardly be said, was a practical mystic, in whom spiritual vision was joined with executive skill and brought to the service of great tasks. Elsewhere, on the subject of hospital drains, she wrote: “The question is not whether a thing is done for the state or the church, but whether it is done with God or without God”—all service being sacred and spiritual if done as for his will, whether it be making drains or singing Psalms. “The way to live with God,” she goes on to say, “is to live with ideas—not merely to think about ideals, but to do and suffer for them.” While speaking of so noble a worker, to whom mysticism, as she said, was “the essence of common sense,” we ought to add the creed by which she was inspired and sustained:

I believe . . . in the service of man being the service of God, the growing into a likeness with him by love, the being one with him at last, which is Heaven. I believe in the plan of almighty perfection to make us all perfect. And thus I believe in the life everlasting.

Such is the new mysticism, not merely a passive meditation, but an urge to action, to adventure, to achievement; a faith which finds fulfillment in making a fairer, better world. It knows, as Octavia Hill said—herself a mystic and a saint—that God builds his best bridges with human piers, not angels; and that he lets us work with him, if we will, never letting our faults impede his purpose when we struggle that they should not. The new mysticism is practical, creative, constructive. To the old watchword, “The just shall live by faith,” it adds a new commandment, in which the old may be tested and tried: “Justice shall be established by faith.” It feels the winds of God blowing in the world, and his “tides of moral influence running in the hearts of men.” It knows that religion is not a thing apart from life, but life itself at its best, equally in personal holiness and social ministry; a flame lighting up the whole of life, awakening great imaginations—a new vision in politics, a new spirit in trade,—life God-illuminated and love-annointed. Here is a mysticism—radiantly sunny, exultantly joyous, austere ethically—which sanctifies the sense, glorifies natural faculties, transfigures all worthy motives, and finds expression in all noble thinking and social living, linking our lives in creative service to all the great causes of God in the world.

If it be asked in what ways the new mysticism differs from the old, the reply is that the points of contrast are so many that one knows not which to mention first. One is active and the other contemplative, one seeks better-worldliness, the other other-worldliness; in short, the starting-point of the one is the goal of the other. That is to say, the new mysticism is a return to the bright, happy, active, social, dynamic mysticism of Jesus, and his vision of life as love and comradeship. For example, the old mystic put that experience of union with God, in which he becomes the abiding and natural delight of the soul, at the end of a long and arduous process of initiation. The new mysticism, following Jesus, makes the same experience its starting-point, so that in the strength and gladness of it the soul goes forth triumphantly to meet whatever lies ahead. Whereas the older mystic usually—though not always—tended to retire into the sanctuary of the soul with his ecstasies and spiritual exercises, and only to come forth into the world as a duty, or a necessity, and often condescendingly; the mystic after the pattern of Jesus lives in the world lovingly and joyously, having acquired through his mysticism a new vision of the World of Life—the spiritual growing up through the natural and transfiguring it with light and wonder.

Such is the reconstruction of mysticism now going on. The old mysticism was essentially individualistic, even when it blossomed into benevolence—partial, incomplete, limited; the new mysticism is social as well as personal—rich, many-sided, seeking to take in the whole of life. And herein lies the hope of a mystic religion for our time—not a separating cult, but a religion for all classes and conditions of men, all kinds of mind and temperament—so much needed to revivify our faith and lead us forth to the realization of God and the practice of brotherhood. Mediævalism did not speak the last word in mysticism. Our age has its own to utter; and its mystical experience, like its theological interpretation, cannot be cast in the moulds of feeling and thought that belonged to a bygone time—as the number and variety of mystical cults in our day testify. So many cults bespeak the groping hunger of the modern mind for a more satisfying experience of spiritual reality, at the same time they bear witness to some sad lack in the organized religion of today.

Our wise and witty age has sought out many inventions, but it never has found a truer way to victory than the way of the cross. Any religion that ends in stately ritual, exalted emotion, or contemplative quietude, fails. It is not the religion of Christ, in which the primary fact is a moral decision, an active discipleship, the dedication of the will and the life to the service of God in man. Neither dogma nor sacrament nor emotion is a substitute for the religion of the deed. "Take up thy cross and follow me," is a word that speaks alike to ritualist and rationalist, and if they do not heed and obey it their religion is futile. For the difficult undertaking of doing good we need all inspiration and support—mystical communion, a lofty worship, and a noble thought—but these must end and bear fruit in a union of those who love in the service of those who suffer. Evermore, to the men of our day, busy about many things, the old word comes back with profoundest meaning: "Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things will be added." Seek it where? Behold the kingdom of heaven is within you, a pattern shown us for the building of the City of God on earth.

The Kingdom of God is a society. The roll is kept in heaven, and we have no accurate knowledge of the names inscribed thereon. Its rules are recorded in the hearts of each member. The entrance fee is nothing—the subscription all you have.

Seeming as Good as We Are

NO doubt most of us are, in some particular, meaner than we seem. A desire for the world's respect keeps us from showing just how little our souls really are. A decent regard for the conventions keeps us from conspicuous incivilities in society and from open greediness in business. But we are also in many ways better than we are willing to seem. This sort of insincerity not only wrongs our best selves by denying them growth through expression, but it wrongs most cruelly those who are obliged to live with us, and who probably find us sufficiently undesirable companions at the best. Who can forget the pathetic words of Carlyle concerning his poor Jenny, "Ah, if I could only have her back for five minutes, if but to convince her that I loved her through all that"! Tammias the cynic was no doubt better than he seemed, though his surly seeming had the cruel effect of reality upon the woman whom he truly loved and for whom he was destined to mourn all his days. Dante Rossetti, burying his manuscript volume of poems in the coffin of his wife, was making tragic confession of a love nobler than the tardy expression thus given.

We peoples of the western races have made a kind of virtue of our churlish repression. A keen student of men once said of an undemonstrative middle west Yankee—a middle west Yankee, by the way, is merely the original Yankee with one extra layer of crust—"That man has never said 'Thank you' in his life. He would consider such civility absurdly gushing." It was not that the feeling of gratitude was lacking—it was that this man was sheepishly afraid of seeming as good as he was. Those who are in a position to receive frequent confidences from married couples are ready to testify that the habit of repression will account for an almost incredible number of divorces. Once convince a woman that her husband really loves her in spite of his grouchy silence on the subject, and she will forgive almost anything. Occasionally an accident opens the lips of husband or wife, as it did those of the backward lover—in one of Miss Warner's stories, was it not?—whose sweetheart said of him, "He never really proposed. But we went walking and I stepped on a snake. And then we were engaged." But in most households where this plague of dumbness has fallen it remains, and the children, growing up, look pityingly upon dad and mother, who can never, they fancy, have known what real romance is.

Friendship and neighborliness are more real than we might imagine. Calamity shows a willingness to help where we had not suspected it. Almost every life is crowned at its end by the affection of some faithful friends, at least, who mourn sincerely. How little of all this affection has had its way in life, and how many lives lived out in loneliness would have been happy if they had received the love that was their rightful due? The beauty and reasonableness of a religious life are undoubtedly recognized by multitudes who, through a kind of moral shamefacedness, refuse to let this recognition have its way in normal expression. If the kingdom should have the right to claim for service all those who in their best moments feel its pull within, its power in the world would be well-nigh invincible.

Can you imagine the revolution which would take place if every person in the world would begin tomorrow to live out, habitually and consistently, all the good that now lives within him in irregular and fragmentary impulses? Suppose the man who would die for his wife should begin to say pleasant things about her cooking; that the woman who would wear her fingers to the bone for her child should begin to be patient about muddy shoes; that the farmer who would share his harvest with a neighbor in time of drought should say a friendly "hello" to him every morning, that the Christian who would go to the stake for his faith would commend it to his business associate, how might the wilderness be made to blossom and rejoice!

The Hotel Man

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I HAVE a friend who owneth a Large Hotel. And he wrote an Epistle unto me, saying, When thou comest unto this Burg, let no man beguile thee of thy wealth. Come thou to mine Hotel, and eat that which is good, and it shall not cost thee One Red Cent.

Now I had occasion to visit that City, and he met me with an Automobile, and took me to his Hotel, and gave unto me a Swell Room with a Bath, and fed me with feasting. And we had a fine Breakfast, and a Lunch that was Some Lunch.

But when we came to Dinner, behold, he was weary. And he looked over the Bill of Fare, and nothing looked good unto him.

And I said, I will have a Planked White-fish.

And he said, Nay; I have been trying to get a Chef who could plank an Whitefish as it should be done; try something else.

And I said, I will have Canvasback Duck.

And he said, I saw those ducks when they came in, and they looked none too good to me; they were the best I could get, but I would try something else.

And thus he spake of everything I proposed.

And then he said, Come, let us get out of this mob. I know a nice little Chop-house. Let us run over there and get a good Beefsteak.

And I said, Not on thy life. There is no Chop-house that can put up such eats as I have here. I intend to eat this Whole Bill of Fare.

And he blessed me, and he said, Our food is good, and this is the best Hotel within a circle of Five Hundred Miles, and I know it. But I get so weary knowing what goes into everything and the process by which things are done, that I get tired.

And I said unto him, Oh, my friend, thou art not the only pebble on the beach. What thou sayest is true of all men when they come to know the seamy side of their own job.

And he said, It cannot be so with thee.

And I said, It is even so. I know too well what goeth into my homiletic Soup-kettle. And I know that when I roast people from the Pulpit it is often Overdone and Scorched.

And I said, Come, let us eat this Food, for it seemeth to me this is One Good Square Meal.

And he said, You can just bet that meal you are eating it All Wool and a Yard Wide.

And it was Some Meal.

When I Looked Up

I

WHEN Greece was young,
The sunlight lay along the world
And nymph and satyr gambolled in the shade.
Athenian marble glistened; in the depths
Of old Aegean swung the imaged cloud.
Days came, days went, and still their span
Confined the care-free, joyous life of men,—
When Greece was young.

II

And then men looked,
And saw the Lord,
And He was high and lifted up
Upon a tree.
Then all along the earth a shadow fell,
The shadow of a cross.
The glory that was Greece
Departed, leaving men bewildered, gazing down
The vista of eternity.
Days came, days went, yet not within their span,
But infinite the mystery of the weave
That is man's life
Spun itself out beyond the grave,—
When men looked up
And saw the Lord.

III

When I was young,
Life tripped it care-free o'er the sunlit field
And carolled blithely down the boisterous glen.
Days came, days went, and aye the eve
Stood tip-toed, waiting on the breaking morn,—
When I was young.

IV

And then I saw the Lord,
And all His house was filled with smoke,
And glen and mountain swirled within the mist.
Then out beyond the years the vista stretched,
All awesome, shrouded deep in mystery,—
When I looked up
And saw the Lord
Upon the cross.

CHARLES T. BAILLIE.

A Lenten Sheaf of Verse

By Clyde McGee

I

"Nevertheless when the Son of Man cometh, Shall he find faith on the earth?"

O BLESSED LORD, Thou Christ of Galilee,
Dost Thou now ask of me, as yesterday
Thou asked of Thy disciples on the way
That led unto Thy death on Calvary,
If Thou at Thy return on earth shall find
A living faith,—a faith that God is still
With men, to toil, to strive, and doth fulfill Through light and dark His purpose for mankind?

How shall I answer? With complacent nod,
Beholding not the wounds that Thou dost bear,
While conning o'er the words of ancient creed?
Not so, O Christ! I trust a living God!
Thy saving Cross but let me humbly share,
And be my answer, Lord, the deed, the deed!

II

"Now there stood by the cross of Jesus, His mother."

AND Mary stood beside the cross! Her soul
Pierced with the self-same wound that rent His side
Who hung thereon. She watched Him as He died,
Her Son! Saw Him paying the cruel toll
Exacted by the law and unbelief,
Since He their evil will had dared defy.
There stood the Mother helpless in her grief,
Beside the cross, and saw her first-born die!—

How many mothers in how many lands
Have bowed with Mary in her agony,
In silence borne the wrath of War's commands,
When every hill is made a Calvary!

O pity, Lord, these mothers of the slain,
And grant their dead shall not have died in vain!

III

The Mother of Judas

O'ER her dear Babe she leaned with watchful care,
Thanked God for the great gift of Motherhood,
Dreamed all her dreams fulfilled, saw how wise, good,
And strong her son would grow with years. Would there
Be one who could with him compare?
O Mother of Iscariot, how could
God bless thee more, since in Christ's brotherhood
Thy son shall leader be, His Lordship share.

It is finished! The Christ is crucified!
Dead, too, that one by whom He was betrayed!
O Mother's grief that Mary never knew,
O stricken heart, that more than Death hath tried,
What were our hope, or help, had He not prayed,
"Forgive them for they know not what they do"?

IV

"Thou knewest not the time of thy visitation."

O CITY that He loved, Jerusalem,
Preparing thus thy feast to celebrate,
Who saw His tears, His grief compassionate,
Dost thou reject thy King, and Him condemn,
Yet chant for prophets dead a requiem?
They but invoke God's wrath inviolate
To work its ends till all be desolate,
Their time of visitation who condemn.

O God, in this our day deep rent with strife,
Smite through, amidst this wanton greed and lust,
Our levity of mind. Set hearts aglow
With faith! Let us not lose the Way of Life
In wilful blindness and our pagan trust,—
Our time of visitation may we know!

V

"We have no king but Caesar."

"WE have no king but Cæsar," answered they
In scorn of Christ. "Let Him be crucified,"
They cried. So priest and people chose that day, Chose Cæsar for their king, and Christ denied.—

Cæsar their king, who would the State maintain
With sword, with thundering guns give high command!
So Cæsar ruled, and Liberty was slain,
And waste and woe and war swept through the land.

O ye His priests, who see the multitude
Awaiting their true king, how answer ye
This day? Vote Christ be stretched upon the rood,
That Cæsar's armed might the right shall be?
Or dare ye, scorning pagan fear, proclaim
That Christ is King, that He alone shall reign?

VI

Which Faith?

THE faithless faith that is not passionate,
But cold, correct, of quiet dignity,
At ease within its house of certainty;
The faith that question doth intimidate,
A form of words on which to ruminate;
The faithless faith that knows no jubilee,
That risks no battle, wins no victory,
No triumph of its own can celebrate?

Or faith that knows the stormy moods, that cries
In wrath at wrong, now in pity weeps,
Now doubts, questions, feels itself forsaken
Upon its Cross amidst the darkening skies,
And yet strives on, its steadfast purpose keeps,
And meets the night's deep dark and death unshaken?

Do the Churches Still Believe in Jesus?

By Albert Parker Fitch

LET us begin by defining the meaning of our question. It does not mean, do the churches still accept any one of the traditional views of the person or the office of Jesus. These views are, or were, the effects of the belief in him; they were not the cause of it, they cannot be identified with it. There is, for instance, the sacramentarian Christ, the central and awful power in that theory that the church is a supernatural institution, the only depository of saving grace; that this grace is mediated to us through the sacraments, that the actual vehicle of salvation is the bread and wine of the consecrated wafer which has been transmuted into the very substance of the Savior-God. It is not a question of first rate importance whether, or how far, men still hold to that view of Jesus, because it did not produce the belief in him but was produced by it. Hence, it may or may not be a witness to actual faith in him and his genuine leadership today. Many men, for a variety of obscure and complex reasons, either attend mass or take the sacrament whom he would not acknowledge as his sheep.

There is also the metaphysical Christ. There are certain theories regarding the nature of his person, its mixture of divine and human elements, its place in the scale of created or uncreated being, its relation to the second person in the trinity—theories regarding the nature of God within himself and Jesus' relation to that God-head. To find out what men believe here would not answer our question. In this speculative and abstract sense devils may believe and tremble. There is, also, no inevitable connection between the theologian and the disciple, between orthodoxy and religion.

THE MIRACULOUS CHRIST

Then there is the miraculous Christ, the belief in Jesus as a special and unique incarnation born of the virgin Mary, a being who set aside the laws of nature, raising the dead, walking upon the water, himself the subject of a bodily resurrection after having lain three days dead in the tomb. To be traditional on these points is not necessarily to understand or to believe in or to follow him. One can imagine some simple and earnest person addressing a Confucian scholar and saying: "I bid you believe in Jesus and follow him; he is the Savior of mankind, he is the Light of the world." And the mandarin would say: "How do you know?" And the simple and earnest person would answer: "Because he was born without a human father and because he became alive again after he was dead." And the mandarin would reply: "This is amazing, if true, but what of it? What significant connection is there between physical marvels and moral and spiritual leadership? Why do you say you believe in the latter merely because you accept the former?" And the simple and earnest man would have to be silent because he could not answer those questions.

There is finally the humane and sentimental Christ, the exaltation of him sometimes as the Divine man, or the sinless man, or the supernatural man, or as some utterly exceptional personage. These mediating and reconciling views, sometimes sharply defined, sometimes extremely vague, do not touch our question either. Jesus himself says so: "Many shall say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you. Depart from me, ye that work iniquity. Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"

BELIEF AS MORAL TRUST

No; to answer the question, "Does the church still believe in Jesus," we must inquire, "Does it believe what he said; does it practice what he taught? Faith in him is confidence in his message, trust in his understanding, acceptance, which is even harder, of his vision. Belief, in the realm of religion, is not subscription to formulae or loyalty to institutions or acceptance of the marvelous. It is moral trust, active loyalty of the will, discipleship to his way of living, acceptance of his principles of conduct.

This includes as its consummation belief in his God and the appropriate attitude toward his holy Father, but it begins in the realm of conduct as acceptance of his attitude toward men. So far as you can distinguish between two things that are interdependent, belief in Jesus puts the moral not the religious first. We begin to follow him when we try to work his works. "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." Moral character brings religious insight. The first step in belief is doing as he did, believing in him by imitating him. "They who will to do the will shall know of the doctrine." You don't know the doctrine first and then either substitute that for the will or add the will to it. The one process is self-deception, the other is putting the cart before the horse. You don't accept the doctrine and suppose that means doing the will. But you say: "What he said is true, what he did is wise, what he condemned is false. The principle of his life was right and I accept it. His judgments of the world were true and I shall abide by them."

CHRIST'S PERSONALITY

Now that is believing in him indeed. Faith is the relinquishment of the will in action. As long as the teachings of Jesus are recognized as embodying the loftiest truth regarding human and then divine relationships, so long will his personality be regarded as the embodiment of truth. Notions as to how it embodies the truth, and what area of truth it embodies will vary, but only as long as the teaching is honored will he be honored. Whenever his teaching holds the central place in human life then will his personality hold the central place as the ideal of life.

Now there is considerable feeling abroad that Jesus is receding from the heart of the so-called Christian consciousness. The feeling takes at least two forms. First, that men's minds are approaching the ultimate questions of conduct and destiny by means other than through him—through observation of human conduct, through speculations of the human mind—so that Jesus the mediator, the interpreter, in the moral sense the Saviour, is disappearing as outmoded, or superfluous. The other form is the sense of indifference to him of the extra-ecclesiastical world of action. Where he was once at least respected formally and given lip service, men are now openly disregarding him. Our civilization never accepted his world-view, but it more or less pretended to; now it frankly ignores or rejects it. The men who gathered in Paris in the spring of 1919 were, with the exception of Clemenceau, good churchmen, but it would be the height of the ridiculous to say that they were good Christians when they made the treaty of Versailles. It makes no pretense of faith in the Christian principle.

WHAT JESUS TAUGHT

It is necessary, then, first to consider the teaching of Jesus and then to ask how far we conform to it, and then our question will have answered itself. But it is not altogether easy, after two thousand years, to know what he taught. As one reads the synoptists, there cannot be much doubt that Jesus, in his few months of public utterance, proclaimed some kind of a social gospel. It is true that he was primarily concerned with individuals rather than organizations, but equally true that he selected and trained these individuals as a sort of charter members for a society soon to be. It is true that it was thus the spiritual redemption of men and women, not the improvement of existing institutions, for which he labored. But that was because he regarded those present institutions as essentially hopeless and about to perish, not because he did not have the vision of a better and perfected state. As a matter of fact he did live for a new and purged society. So, while by the very nature of his genius he was not so much a reformer as a revealer, not an agitator with a plan, but an idealist with a vision, nevertheless it was a social vision and a group salvation which he foresaw.

Thus, while his teaching is only incidentally social and economic, men felt then and continue to feel today that through his searching of the separate soul he had a beneficent and adequate message for the human race. It is recorded in Luke that once, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Isaiah. And when he had opened the book he found the place where it was written, The spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives and the recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised. To preach the acceptable year of the Lord. Now this is the prophecy of an ideal state. It is also recorded that he closed the book and gave it again to the minister and sat down. And the eyes of all of them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." One can readily imagine the pathos and the intensity of the silence that fell upon the little Nazarene synagogue that Sabbath afternoon. It was easy to believe that day that the acceptable year of the Lord was at hand.

THE UNIVERSAL MESSAGE

It becomes us then to inquire what was this teaching which the Protestant church has so persistently individualized, but which so clearly carried some sort of social and universal message that the common people heard him gladly. What was his teaching regarding the kingdom of God on earth, as he called it—what was the message enclosed in that vague and plastic framework of the "kingdom?"

His sayings concerning it, as they have come down to us, are fragmentary, unsystematic, apparently contradictory. Sometimes the kingdom is a present inward state of joy and peace, an immediate and blessed interior realization, of the love of God in the service of man. It is the precious pearl hid in the field, the leaven in the lump. But sometimes it is an imminent millennium, a great society imposed from without, splendid and irresistible, to be heralded and accompanied by prodigious and inexplicable events. "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." Many attempts have been made to harmonize these apparently unrelated sayings. They may represent various stages of growth in his conception of the kingdom, confusing now because no longer preserved in chronological sequence. Or they may present what was once a clear teaching of a society that begins within and works out. Its germ is individual and obscure like the tiny mustard seed, its efflorescence is conspicuous and social, like the harmonious organism of root and trunk, leaves and branches of a great tree. It is the inner, mystic kingdom, present here and now, which makes not only possible but inevitable the blessed outward kingdom still in process of consummation. In this view the various parts of the teaching are complementary rather than contradictory.

AN INTERIM ETHIC

But more generally today New Testament scholars think that Jesus actually looked forward to the speedy coming of a catastrophic kingdom. He moved in the circle of the ideas of his Semitic inheritance and his ancient time. The notion of development, of growth out of existing organizations, of something at once better and different from them, was impossible to a child of his age and place. The idea of the evolution of a new society was antecede-dently out of the question for him. For it did not exist in his part of the ancient world. Hence "progress," as we understand the term, meant nothing to him; progress to him would have been fundamental change, a wiping the slate clean and beginning over again, a new order. He believed then that there was about to appear another and a completed society, a holy city, new Jerusalem, soon to descend from God out of heaven, and that he was the herald and should be the witness of it. In this belief he was disappointed; the new kingdom did not come; the evil custom of this world had its age-long way with him. He died a disillusioned man, crying with his expiring gasp, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!"

So runs the theory. It is important to mention this apocalyptic view of Jesus' teaching of the kingdom, because by it his famous sayings are today interpreted to the end of their rejection. The doctrine of the sermon on the mount is thus an interim ethic. It is a group of sayings meant only for the extraordinary situation of the moment, not intended for a workaday world. It is an especial and esoteric teaching of passive nonresistance to whatever form of evil and injustice during the few days, the little space, that remained before the world should be confounded and men should call upon the rocks to fall upon them, and his little flock should enter triumphantly into that kingdom which it was the Father's good pleasure to give them. Hence the teaching may be discounted.

INHERENT WORTH OF JESUS' TEACHING

Now it would appear to me that all these considerations regarding the way of the appearance and the actual organization of the kingdom, as Jesus may or may not have conceived these things, are relatively beside the point. The worth of Jesus' teaching regarding human and divine nature and their appropriate expressions is not fundamentally affected by his notion of the nature of the events which he may or may not have supposed would furnish the opportunity and the vehicle for its fulfillment. The authority of his teaching resides in its doctrine, is determined by its substance. Certainly the founder of Christianity had specific notions regarding the moral nature of God and the moral nature of man and the just relationships of man with his fellows and through them with his Maker. These notions stand or fall on their inherent worth, their intrinsic excellence. Genius often builds better than it knows; it is characteristic of it that it is forever striking out universal truth and enunciating comprehensive principles as it interprets local conditions and addresses itself to partial problems.

Whatever then may have been the historical truth or falsity of Jesus' notion of the nature, the time, the method of the coming of the kingdom, the deeper question is, what was his notion of man which underlay it? Now we have his teaching regarding divine and human nature. Here it is irrespective of what causes produced it, or what the ends to which it was directed. We may indeed reject it on the ground that it was meant for the kind of a world that does not exist. Or we may accept it on the ground that it really sets forth a principle workable in our world. But on this question of what the churches actually think of that teaching hangs our discipleship. Do we understand it? Do we believe in it? Do we follow it? There is the test of whether we believe in him.

BROTHERHOOD—A COMMONPLACE

Well, it is quite clear from the first three gospels that Jesus believed that men should live together as brothers, under one father in a divine and inclusive family, and that he called them to this as their discipleship. Oh, you say, is that all it was? Why, that is the most threadbare commonplace. You say that Jesus' teaching is summed up in the terms of fatherhood and sonship. All the churches accept that today; we are all then believing in him. But I wonder. Perhaps we don't know what Jesus meant by it. Perhaps these terms, on the lips of nine-tenths of those who use them, are little more than a sentimental cant, an empty shibboleth, which tends to obscure and emasculate, not to reveal and enforce his teaching. Let us ask ourselves first, what is the content of the fatherhood, the nature of the paternity which Jesus reveals.

Other ethnic faiths have spoken of God as father and of man as brother. But this "father" God has been the progenitor of a nation or a tribe and this brotherhood limited to racial lines. Moreover, as these nations have progressed in arts and civilization the term sovereign or emperor has been substituted for father. But in Christianity we find exactly the reverse development. Jesus comes at the end of a long historic process and uses the word "father" constantly as it has never been used in any other religion. His is the only developed religion which uses father as the significant and constant appellation of deity. Ethical and universal fatherhood, dimly shadowed forth by Isaiah and Hosea he reveals, a God who sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust and causeth his sun to shine on the evil and on the good, a God who has an infinite and particular care for his children so that the very hairs of their head are all numbered. He is then the Lord of heaven and earth, in whom redeeming and sacrificial love is supremely exemplified and bestowed. He loves all his children with an equal and impartial affection. He is not localized on some throne of other worlds, but is a present spirit, encompassing and infusing all humanity. The Father of all, his love goeth out seeking to embrace them all. Every man born into the world he follows with love from the beginning until the very end, if perchance he may win him to himself, to make him alive with his own divinity and radiant with his own immortality. No man need ever be weak, for the Father desires to perfect his weakness in his strength. No man need ever be consumed with restlessness and discontent, for the Father waiteth to endow him with the abundance of his peace. No man need ever be lost, because the Shepherd is always seeking his wandering sheep. No man need ever be discouraged, by reason of the sins of his manhood or his youth, for this is the Father who sees the prodigal coming a long way off, and runs and falls on his neck and kisses him.

What, then, is the Fatherhood that Jesus teaches? It is redemptive love, freely and supremely given, so that, in the incredible words of Jesus to the woman at the well, We know that God seeketh his true worshippers. It is redemptive love supremely exemplified in service, so that in the more incredible example of Jesus, he who knoweth that he comes from God and goes to God will, in his supreme moment of godlikeness, gird himself with a towel and wash his disciples' feet. We perceive then the ethical and social characteristics of the love of God as Jesus reveals it. It is a love whose purpose is character, whose content is service, whose method is sacrifice, and whose goal is racial redemption, a saved society, which shall be coterminous with the race—a single-minded, educative, reformatory constructive love. On this sort of a paternal conception Jesus founds his kingdom. It is the family principle which he uses; the atmosphere of an ideal family is to be the atmosphere of his world.

What then, does it mean to be a son and a brother in the kingdom of this kind of a God? The answer which Jesus gives is inevitable, logical, but most divinely high, most supremely difficult. It means to love our fellow men the way God loves us. That is to say, the attitude of the disciples of Jesus toward the human world is a loving self-forgetful attitude whose purpose is the making there of Christian character, whose content is service, whose method is sacrifice and whose goal is racial redemption. Then, we too serve men according to their need, not according to their desert. So we long to bless them that curse us. For how an evil cursing heart needs blessing! So we pour out for men and around men an unexpected and undeserved affection, giving more to the worst of them than the best of them could ever have dreamed of. Just as God has been more willing to hear than we to pray and has given us exceedingly abundantly above all we could ask or think. So if a man ask my coat with joy I give him my cloak also that he may know how my life reaches out toward him, and that the only thing which limits my glad forthgiving to my neighbor is the extent of my perception of his need or the extent of his capacity to receive.

A PASSION FOR HUMANITY

Evidently, then, this love that I must show men is not the love of reciprocity which publican and sinner and humanist would give. It is not the legalism of righteousness which scribe and pharisee and conformist rest in. It is not summed up with the mere attainment of personal character. Indeed, it can scarcely be said to have begun with attainment. To be a follower of Jesus means character for service, and redemption for the community. Discipleship of the Son of Man implies passion for humanity. It means a communal and a saving love. It awakens the glorious madness of self-sacrifice. It brings vicarious suffering and spontaneous and irresistible outgoing for less fortunate men. It means a poignant sensitiveness towards human need, an unquenchable protest against human injustice, an unutterable desire to supply deficiencies for the handicapped, and tenderest healing for the wounded. It means that you and I, sanctified and empowered with the divine love and life, ache with desire, burn with intensity, to bestow it, to redeem with it our fellow men. Mazzini, the Italian patriot, had caught the Christian spirit when he said, "If I see any one called good I ask, 'Whom, then, has he saved?'"

THE SPIRIT OF ST. FRANCIS

Do we still then believe in Jesus, this Jesus? How far has the church ever risen to such a passion of humility and love? How far has she ever seen that faith in him is acceptance of a certain spirit, the perception that there is divine truth in this sort of relationship. There was a great Christian, a true follower of Jesus in the thirteenth century, his name was Francis of Assisi. He was a man of extraordinary idealism, to whom moral perfection and joy were one and the same thing, a man who had no interest in the miracle worker and little interest in the scholar, but who found in the love of man a never fading ecstasy, a soul who adopted poverty that he might be free to serve his fellow men. This story is told of him:

One winter's day, St. Francis was going with Brother Leo from Perugia to Santa Maria degli Angeli, and the cold, being intense, made them shiver; he called Brother Leo, who was walking a little in advance, and said: "O Brother Leo, may it please God that the Brothers Minor all over the world may give a great example of holiness and edification; write, however, and note with care, that not in this is the perfect joy!"

St. Francis, going on a little farther, called him a second time: "O Brother Leo, if the Brothers Minor gave sight to the blind, healed the infirm, cast out demons, gave hearing to the deaf, or even what is much more, if they raised the four days dead, write that not in this is the perfect joy."

Going on a little farther he cried: "O Brother Leo, if the Brothers Minor knew all languages, all science, and all scriptures, if they could prophesy and reveal not only future things but even the secrets of consciences and of souls, write that not in this consists the perfect joy."

Going a little farther St. Francis called to him again: "O Brother Leo, little sheep of God, if the Brother Minor could speak the language of angels, if he knew the courses of the stars and the virtues of plants, if all the treasures of earth were revealed to him, and he knew the qualities of birds, fishes, and all animals, of men, trees, rocks, roots, and waters, write that not in these is the perfect joy."

And advancing still a little farther St. Francis called loudly to him: "O Brother Leo, if the Brother Minor could preach so well as to convert all infidels to the faith of Christ, write that not in this is the perfect joy."

While speaking thus they had already gone more than two miles, and Brother Leo, full of surprise, said to him: Father, I pray you in God's name tell me in what consists the perfect joy."

And St. Francis replied: "When we arrive at Santa Maria degli Angeli, soaked with rain, frozen with cold, covered with mud, dying of hunger, and we knock and the porter comes in a rage, saying, 'Who are you?' and we answer, 'We are two of your brethren,' and he says, 'You lie, you are two lewd fellows who go upon down corrupting the world and stealing the alms of the poor. Go away from here!' and he does not open to us but leaves us outside shivering in the snow and rain, frozen, starved, till night; then, if thus maltreated and turned away, we patiently endure all without murmuring against him, if we think with humility and charity that this porter really knows us truly and that God makes him speak to us, then, O Brother Leo, write that in this is the perfect joy. . . . Above all the graces and all the gifts which the Holy Spirit gives to his friends is the grace to conquer oneself, and willingly to suffer pain, outrages, disgrace, and evil treatment, for the love of Christ!"

One is quite sure that Francis believed in Jesus, but do we? One remembers the average Protestant church, composed of men and women of undoubted respectability, of thrifty lives and careful morals. We accept in these churches the social order in which we were born; perhaps we care more for our institution than for the world for whose sake it was founded, live more off the community than for it. Our churches are not so much the lifeboat sent out to rescue the perishing as they are the ark of salvation into which we withdraw from a perishing and somewhat contemptible world. Do the churches still believe in Jesus? If so, then they believe that they are here to transform life by their terrible meekness, to subdue it by ineffable gentleness, to tilt at all the windmills of entrenched injustice and selfish privilege, armed only with the lance of the loving spirit, to have such faith in gentleness and goodness and love as to practice them at every worldly cost, to be the kind of servants of Jahweh who do not cry nor lift up their voice nor cause it to be heard in the street.

LOVE, OUR FIRST DEBT

Because, you see, to believe in him, means that we must care; love is the first thing we owe the world. Of course, we cannot live as Francis did. Of course, most of us are not called upon to try to drive the church like an iron wedge through the social fabric of our day, to try to destroy and remake the present order, a part of which we ourselves are and upon which with all its faults we have to depend. But we cannot say that we believe in him unless we realize that we do not possess divine sonship by any conventional consent to its statement nor by intellectual acquiescence in the creeds that are supposed to give it fixity and clarity of expression, nor by conformity to pious practices, nor by donating the fag-ends of our time and the left-overs of our substance to the harmless and amiable routine activities of our parish. These things ought we to have done, yes, but not to have left the other undone. We realize that sonship only as we communicate it. We become the sons of God in just so far as we become the brothers of the world.

Is not this the profound and characteristic Christian teaching that union with the Father is accomplished through oneness with humanity? "If I love not my brother whom I have seen, how can I love God whom I have not seen?" Therefore, in every social struggle the obligation is solemn and heavy upon the church to be profoundly interested. Jesus' disciples, as they regard their fellow men, desire and mean to know their fears and hopes and ambitions, their passions and despair. They see the present life about them, not as a great and moving pageant, sometimes glittering and splendid, sometimes sombre and terrific, ever to be viewed with the cool and indifferent scrutiny of the spectator or to be smugly used for the furtherance of the ecclesiastical institution. No, they see it as the consecrated, bloodstained arena, upon whose disturbed and darkened sands, strewn with the wreck and debris of the ages, are fought out the piteous life and death struggles of separate human beings. And for them their heart beats, and for them their mind works, for them their will is strong. Into their fierce and tragic conflict they long to plunge their life.

COMPLACENT PROVINCIALISM

The most dreadful indictment of the modern church is its own complacent provincialism, its willingness to use and mitigate a brutal world, not to sacrifice itself for that world's sake. The church disbelieves in Jesus, insofar as we think of ourselves as the fastidious elect or cultivate any indifference to the way in which the other three-quarters of our race must live. The Father God and the suffering world may expect that they who say they believe in Jesus will feel the horror, the godlessness, the awfulness, of faring sumptuously every day without real and vital concern for the thousands of Lazaruses who lie in their sores amid the dirt and the dogs outside our gates.

Again, if the church really believes in Jesus, it will look abroad upon the strife and suffering in our present order, and, after being profoundly moved by it, it will express that interest in some definite and persistent form of protest and redemption. Is this not the very essence of the doctrine of the Kingdom, that any man of any race or creed or color, who does not have the free and abundant life in any department of his being, becomes thereby the immediate object not merely of my interest but also of my service. If there is anything desirable that I possess and value, according to the teaching of Jesus I cannot rest until my brother shall have a chance to experience its possession and enjoy its excellence with me. My raison d'être as a Christian is to serve my race. The lynched Negro of the south, and the brutes who lynch him, the wretched wanderer on my city streets, the child of the neglected rich, the children in the cotton mills and the glass factories, the women in the sweat shops, the operative in the dust-laden, stuff-filled air of the factories, and we ourselves—we are all one. This is the teaching of Jesus. It is for this that we founded our institution. Do the churches still believe in him?

What an unparalleled standard of service he has set for us in these troubled days! But it is not impossible, at least there are those who believe that it is not impossible that through just such service there will come the solution of our social and industrial problems. That faith may be mad, but that faith is faith in Jesus. Does the church believe that the standard of Christian ministration, if faithfully exemplified, could transform our modern life? Well, all those who have accepted the teaching of Jesus as true, must believe that it is no visionary statement, but only sober sense to say that it could purify American politics, abolish commercial dishonor and oppression, yes, even heal the breach between employer and employed. For let any man, whether a politician, representative, judge, employer artisan, once fully recognize and accept the principle that to render honest and unstinted and loving service is the object of his existence, and the opportunity of his work or profession, why then there can be no thought on his part of personal profit at the expense of others, of disloyalty to his post, of adulterated goods, of injustice to dependents, or of inferior workmanship. Competition becomes emulation. What incredible happiness would that bring into the world! Then there would be a golden age indeed!

THE CHURCH AND PUBLIC OPINION

Perhaps we can answer our question now. Men do not believe in Jesus if they believe that love is the greatest force in the world, but that the love that counts is the love that costs. The present order will never be changed except by the cumulative force of a courageous and consecrated public opinion. If the church is making that new public opinion then she is believing in Jesus. It is a little difficult to believe that she is doing much toward making it, because if she were, Jesus' name and the power of his person would be vivid in the churches and in the land. It would never occur to us to ask the question that heads this article because where men were serving and suffering and dying for this—shall I say divinely mad—ideal, it would be evident that a great Being who incarnated a mighty force was moving still amid the walks of men.

There is no possible way to revive belief in Jesus except to make another of the world's great efforts to practice his message. When that is done, whatever there may be of grace in his person, of power in his life, of truth in his word, will reveal itself in the appropriate language according to the circle of ideas and in the characteristic institutions of this moment. In so doing, new doctrines of his person, new visions of his meaning, new faiths as to his place in the cosmic order will be created. We are not working his works very much at present, therefore we are not believing in him. Perhaps we cannot work his works; perhaps they are unworkable. Ought not all of us to ask ourselves whether or not we can, whether or not we dare, believe in him. Ought we not to acknowledge that no matter how beneficent and honorable an institution the church may be, if she is standing ostensibly for one thing but practicing another, we cannot call her an institution of faith. And if she is not an institution of faith, is there either logic or justice in expecting her to succeed?

The Man on the Cross

The Cry

AS often as there is silence around me,
By day or by night,
I am startled by the cry,
"Take me down from the cross!"
The first time I heard it
I went out and searched
Until I found a man in the throes of crucifixion.
And I said, "I will take you down."
And I tried to take the nails from his feet,
But he said, "Let be; for I cannot be taken down
Till every man, every woman and every child
Come together to take me down."
"But I cannot bear your cry."
And I said, "What can I do?"
And he said, "Go about the world
Telling every one you meet,
'There is a man upon the cross.'"

The Answer

I go about the world
Telling all the rich
And all the happy and all the comfortable,
"There is a man upon the cross."
But they all say,
"We are sure you are mistaken:
There was a man upon the cross
Two thousand years ago.
But he died, and was taken down,
And was decently buried;
And a miracle happened
So that he rose again,
And ascended into heaven,
And is happy for evermore."
Still I go about the world, saying,
"There is a man upon the cross."

Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?

By Albert Parker Fitch

"Can the church survive in the changing order?" It is a real question. We have a way of supposing that she cannot perish, but there is no such a thing as permanency of this sort in the social structure.

The question is not only real, it is grave, important. At few other times in man's mental and moral history has he more needed the guiding and steadying leadership of a strong religious organization than now.

Can the church survive in the changing order? Well, the answer will depend upon the extent and character of her faith. The day has come for dropping a liberal apologetic for scholastic Christianity; for trying to define ancient phrases which once carried an open and ingenuous meaning; for reinterpreting historical movements so as to make them unhistorically acceptable; for reading twentieth century sophistries into good third century metaphysics.

The Religious Side of Common Sense

By Joseph Fort Newton

A GAIN and again the Master recurs to the quality of sagacity, of foresight, of strategy, and suggests that it be used in behalf of the highest things. In the parable of the Unjust Steward he commends the man not for his injustice, but for his shrewdness; and this leads him to say that the sons of Mammon are wiser than the sons of light. He had watched the ways of men, had seen their cunning expedients constantly coming to pass, and he sought to have this practical capacity applied to the life of the spirit. It is a fertile field, for surely a man may be as cunning in the doing of good as in the doing of evil.

Time out of mind we have been exhorted of the practical value of heavenly wisdom. That, indeed, cannot be emphasized too much, since men are slow to realize that the highest truth has everyday uses, and is not simply a theme for holy meditation. For example, the poetic quality—a certain delicacy, fineness, and charm of nature—is the chief secret of success in every field of life. It gives insight, vision, without which a man goes stumbling through the years. Whether a man be an artist or an artisan, a surgeon or a saint, a politician or a preacher, he is more effective and winning by virtue of this mystical, poetic gift. But, as Kipling would say, that is another story than the one with which we have to do just now.

MYSTICAL SIDE OF WORLDLY WISDOM

If Pope has made more current epigrams of worldly wisdom than any other poet, to Wordsworth belongs the nobler praise of having shown what Richard Hutton calls "The Mystical Side of Good Sense." For all things, when rightly considered, have their mystical aspects and uses, and all toilers in behalf of the higher human life need to learn the heavenly uses of worldly wisdom. The church, especially, needs a course of training in this school—which was no doubt what David Swing meant when he said that he would like to see in every theological seminary an endowed chair of common sense. In a world such as this no cause, however lofty, can win its way without a spiritual use of shrewdness. Our religious sects—some of them small enough to be called insects—furnish an example of the lack of good sense. No one wishes the religious world to become "a mush of concession," which Emerson so despised. So far as our differences are fundamental and real they must and should exist, each party having due regard for the service of the other. But where they are only a reminiscence of old debates, long since dead and buried; where they persist only by virtue of sectarian pride or prejudice or pretense, they can show no cause for being. Men of the world must look with pity upon the folly of such dissipation of forces, not to speak of the waste of funds. Laymen are aware of this and in due time they will no doubt make their protest felt.

This is not to say that the church must go to school to captains of industry and politicians—though it may learn many things from such shrewd and effective doers. It need go no further than to its own great leaders. If worldly wisdom means a skillful and conciliatory art of selfishly gaining from the world what it wants, St. Paul had none of it. But he was master of a skillful and conciliatory art none the less, though he used it to win men to the Master. Like all other men of supreme greatness he was full of that common sense without which the force of religious genius tends to evaporate. He was forever on guard lest the fervor of his converts should ruin their cause, in disregard of prudence or foresight. He constantly urged the keeping of peace within the church at all hazard, and surely we may profit by his example.

SHREWDNESS OF THE SAINTS

In order to be all things to all men that it may thereby save some, the church, like its great apostle, must belong to its own age. Men are stable in nothing but their imperfection, and the church must be able to get along with ordinary humanity. It need not be of the world, but it is in the world—a world of average men and women—face to face with new superstitions which must be tenderly dealt with, new enthusiasms which should not be outraged, and new idols which need not be profaned. In short, modern wisdom should be able to meet modern folly and overcome it. Some think it heroic and wise to lift up the banner of the ideal and refuse to admit anything less than the best; but it is far wiser to take things as they are and try, with many compromises, to make them better. Nor can any one deny that the church of today does strain at gnats while swallowing huge camels of social injustice.

Not so her great leaders of the past. When one reads the "Journal of John Wesley," so rich in practical wisdom—rules of health, maxims of economy, scrupulous care in the use of time, generalship in the management of men—one feels that the evangelist, were he now alive, could direct the fortunes of a great business enterprise with ease. He had in rare degree the three qualities which Emerson said attract the reverence of mankind—disinterestedness, practical power, and courage. Though he belonged to his age, and partook of its weakness in more than one way, he was a master of the religious uses of worldly wisdom, even as he was a man of light and fame. It is not too much to say that Wesley saved England from a revolution like that which shook France. Macaulay credits him with a genius for statesmanship not inferior to that of Richelieu, and this genius he used in behalf of the kingdom of heaven.

MEN OF THE WORLD

As much may be said of Luther and Calvin. If they were men of their age, they were all the more effective in making use of the forces at their command to advance the reign of right upon the earth. Too often we think of them as theologians, and nothing more, forgetting that their dogmas had root in economic and social soil, and that a new movement in theology nearly always carries with it widespread political and social reform. To his own age Luther was as much a social reformer as a preacher, and Calvin was feared more as a political leader than as a theologian. Such work required sagacity, cunning, and statesmanship not more than spiritual fervor. They were men of the world, though not worldly men, and their labors endure because they were men of practical capacity.

Nor should we neglect that rich store of worldly wisdom in the form of maxims, proverbs, aphorisms, and parables—epigrams pithy and picturesque into which whole ages of experience have been compressed. The wisdom literature of the world, from Æsop to Franklin and Emerson, is a small book; for wise men know that wisdom is learned not from books, but from life. Therefore they do not write much, and it must be admitted that, as a rule, those who have been most fertile in making maxims have been the least faithful in applying them.

HISTORY OF A WORD

Let me tell you the history of a word. In the French guilds of artisans, the skilled metal-smiths of the middle age, the apprentice worked seven years upon his tasks. When at last he had wrought out some beautiful thing, perhaps in beaten silver, he brought it to the master of the guild and said, "Behold my experience." He meant thereby the result of his experiments. He had spoiled many a bit of metal, had dulled the edge of many a tool, had spent laborious days and nights; but the whole was in that tiny bit of ore. His experience was there, and he might take his kit of tools and go out as a journeyman smith, master of his craft. So there are bits of truth wrought out by the toil of many minds and the trials of many years, the results of myriad errors. A maxim may be a delusion, but some of these proverbs bear the image and superscription of wisdom. It is not my intention, like Polonius, to fill your pockets with proverbs, but simply to indicate how some of these sayings, which Emerson loved so much to turn over in his mind and ponder, may be put to spiritual uses. One such saying is that coined by Charles Spurgeon—one preacher who had common sense—in his "John Plowman's Talk," when he exhorted us on this wise: "Never chew your pills."

Life does give us some bitter pills, but they were not made to chew but to swallow. Chewing them makes them all the more disagreeable, and leaves a bad taste in the mouth. Herbert Spencer almost spoiled his life by chewing his pills—which is a different thing from "chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancies." In fact he fretted so much about the little things that it is a wonder that he ever did anything of moment, and had he married George Eliot he would have ruined her life. Carlyle had the dyspepsia as the result of too much chewing of pills, and made everybody about him miserable. The way to deal with a disagreeable thing is to have it ended as soon as may be, and then leave it. The chewing of imaginary pills is the worst folly of all, and goes further to weaken and impoverish life than almost any other habit. If there is anything worse it is to chew our pills to the last, and then not swallow them.

Then there is the saying of the great and much-tried Cervantes, which we need often to recall: "Patience, and shuffle the cards." For years the game of life had gone against him and he had never taken a literary trick. Yet what a pack of cards he had all the while up his intellectual sleeve! But every time some fop trumped over him and won the prize. But, knowing that it was of no use to fret, he shuffled his cards in the hope that something would turn up. Don Quixote turned up, and he won the prize of literary immortality. Look at him as he sat waiting for just the right word to fit his thought while a whole dictionary full of words danced at his side. Many play whist—some do nothing else—but few find in it so much wisdom, which if applied to the higher life, would bring us health of soul. How many riches of the spirit are lost through impatience. The higher things refuse to be run down. We must wait for them. One may dig for facts, but he cannot find culture. Always the coming man is the man who halts for the angels to find him.

Ian Maclaren dipped his pen in tears and laughter and wrote: "Be pitiful, for every man fights a hard fight." If our fellow men do strange things let us be gentle, for we do not know against what odds they fight and how often they, like ourselves, are outwitted by their passions. No wisdom is sweeter or more profound than the wisdom of pity. The longer one lives the more he learns the height and depth of this tender, wistful wisdom, which is as medicine to the soul and oil in the heart. Evil is subtle, cunning and shrewd, and there must be subtlety and strategy to overcome it, and if our fellows often lose in the battle let us have pity.

THE HIGHER WALKS OF THE SOUL

So there are many maxims which may serve us in the higher walks of the soul. "Nothing too much," said the wise old Greeks, to which they added the counsel, "Think as a mortal." Many a man has lost all truth in the quest after ultimate truth, which is at once so haunting and so elusive. Once, so runs the legend, a man asked King Solomon for a maxim equally applicable to every human situation, that he might the better fortify himself against the caprice of fortune. The king reflected for a moment, and gave him, in these words, the maxim he sought: "This, too, shall pass away." At first the man was puzzled, but after pondering a long time he saw the profound meaning hidden in the words.

Are you afflicted? Be not morose or rash, for this, too, shall pass away. Are you happy? Be not careless and vain, for this, too, shall pass away. Are you in danger? Are you tempted? Are you besieged with difficulty? Still, in every diversity of situation, remember: This, too, shall pass away. Restraint, encouragement, consolation—all are contained in that maxim, and also the sadness which clings to all worldly wisdom. After all, our worldly wit and wisdom shall pass away, and he only is truly wise who so numbers his days as to learn that the love of God is the beginning, as it is the end and essence, of all wisdom.

The Steel Makers' Reply

WE have waited long for the answer of the steel makers to the report of the Interchurch commission's investigation of the steel strike and conditions in the industry. Such militant apostles of industrial autocracy as Editor Lewis of "Industry" and Rev. Mr. Bigelow have come bravely to the defense of the steel corporation, but until the Walsh resolution in the United States Senate was introduced the masters themselves made no reply. When the Senate Committee on Education and Labor summoned the Interchurch commission to Washington they also invited the companies to make rejoinder. This they did in a type-written document of some 40,000 words. For the first time an answer is attempted. However, nearly one-half of this document, produced in the Labor Department of the National Association of Sheet and Tin Plate Manufacturers, is not an answer to the report but is of the kind essayed by Messrs Lewis and Bigelow and by the earlier spy report that first confronted the commission in the offices of Judge Gary himself. In other words it is a denunciation of the commissioners and their special investigators. In the direct answer to the report the logic is certainly the best available; in the diatribes that reveal a frantic desire to discredit the investigation without reference to their exposure of labor conditions in steel making the logic is of the same abortive kind as that used by Messrs Lewis and Bigelow and the discredited spy report, for the reproducing of which the secretary of the Ohio Manufacturer's Association made humble apology—and resigned.

Of course the best answer to these heated diatribes is Judge Gary's announcement that the seven-day week will be abolished and that a change to eight hour shifts is being studied.

* * *

Criticising the Investigators.

Our readers will have no difficulty in recognizing the alliance between the twelve hour day, the seven day week and the justice and charity on which the church—and the steel industry—are founded.

In all rejoinders up to date the main issue has been not as to the truthfulness of the report but as to the character of the reporters. It seems that the twelve hour day and the seven day week will become quite respectable if only you can get people to think the men who tell about them are radicals, or even liberals. After the denouement following the famous spy report presented to the commission by Judge Gary and to the public by the secretary of the Ohio Manufacturer's Association the expert investigators employed by the Commission became "liberals" instead of radicals, Bolsheviki and I. W. Ws. The very worst this document can say about them is that Mr. Saposs, who because of his linguistic ability was the only one among them competent to investigate, said that "Foster was an able organizer"; that Mr. Soule wrote a part of "The New Unionism" and defends the wage agreements which ended the sweat shop and brought peace to the garment industry; and that Mr. Littell once wrote something for the New Republic. Of course Mr. Saposs should not have recognized Mr. Foster's ability, though comments upon the mastership of the steel financiers are not criticised. Mr. Soule should cease commending a type of unionism that would lead so conservative a man as Mr. Burns of the Carnegie Corporation to say "I should regard the dissolution of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers a public misfortune." And Mr. Littell should write for the Wall Street Journal. These keen young men are "liberals" at worst, and Captain Blankenhorn, their leader, is apparently nothing worse. But in a resounding paragraph liberals are made to join the company of radicals. Then in a high tide of intellectual discernment both are dumped into the discard with socialists and anarchists. What reason and honest fact cannot accomplish rhetoric negotiates in a few phrases.

Dog Tray's Bad Company and the Commission

The commissioners are amiable and well-meaning people who may be sincere (though in the fervent heat of many rhetorical climaxes in the document they are denounced as hypocritical and insincere), but they do not know anything about steel making, are all out of place when out of the pulpit and are damned by bad company. This "bad company" was the hollow specter before the eyes of Brother Bigelow and Friend Lewis. It is a logical maze that makes the connection, but what's the difference if only you make it? Robert Bruere was consulted concerning some proposed excisions from the Report and recommended that they be made. That was his sole connection with the investigation; but then he taught English literature in the Rand School in 1908 and contributed a small sum to see that the Centralia I. W. W. got a fair trial. He is now an I. W. W. nor even a socialist, but small matters like that do not count when you are Sherlocking a bunch of steel investigators. Harry F. Ward and Bishop McConnell are both on the Methodist Federation of Social Service. Professor Ward writes books that every body reads, but that sort of thing steel magnates do not like. He had nothing at all to do with the investigation, but the bishop, and therefore his colleagues, are known by their associations. Secretary Charles S. Macfarland, of the Federal Council of Churches, is denounced as "a socialist of the Ward type." That is news to both Ward and Macfarland and will make a sensation in the circle of the good secretary's colleagues in the council; but it serves to throw a red stream of guilt on the commission even though Mr. Macfarland had not a thing in the world to do with it and was so busy winning a chevalier's badge in the French Legion of Honor through service that he knew little of the investigation until the report was published. Charles Stelzle was in the Hotel Pennsylvania conference and the stigma of his career in the service of his fellow workers clings to the commission's skirts also.

Worst of all someone was found in the Federation of Churches who was a disciple of "that German socialist," Professor Walter Rauschenbush! and two men are somewhere connected with it who wrote letters, one to Eugene Debs when he was sent to prison and another to some pro-German. The shelves of the tens of thousands of ministers who possess Professor Rauschenbusch's books should be raided by some super-Lusk committee and the Federal Council should X-ray the heads of all its members immediately. Of course a small matter like the fact that the Federal Council had nothing at all to do with the investigation is too small a delinquency to stand in the way of such proof of collusion between the amiable commissioners and these diabolos of our civilization who are leading us down to hell along the road of the social conscience.

* * *

The Incapacity of the Commission.

The whole investigation was conceived by these cunning connivers above named, none of whom mixed in it at all, and the commissioners were deluded into thinking they could investigate steel. Did one of them ever make an ingot? Then they know nothing about human relationships in a steel mill or living conditions under a twelve hour day and a seven day week. Mr. Gary worked a long apprenticeship in the mills before he accepted chairmanship of the financial committee and J. Pierpont Morgan labored for years in the heat of the furnaces before he formed the United States Steel Corporation! No doubt the writer of the document can perform any expert service required in the manufacture of steel. What, he asks, would the Methodist church think if steel makers investigated their church work. Well, who runs the business of the churches? Did it ever occur to the industrial chauvinist that the men who interpret Christ are either able to tell us what is right in the relationships between employer and employee on their human and moral side or they are not capable of preaching the gospel at all? This commission made no pretense of expertness in steel making and they certainly found that steel makers make no pretense of practicing humanity or Christianity when they work men on twelve hours per day and seven days per week, and little understanding of a Christian society when to those who help them make steel—and their millions—before hot furnaces and roaring rollers they deny both the right to organize and to elect democratically their own representatives to confer with their own employers about their common problems.

British Table Talk

London, February 22, 1921.

IN the days before the war when the churches in England and in Germany were trying to make friends, the Kaiser was entertaining one day at Potsdam a company of ecclesiastical leaders. One of the questions he asked concerned "Bernard Lucas." The English visitors did not know his name. "You should read his works," said the Kaiser, "they are very good. I have had one of them translated into German." It was the work, "Conversations with Christ," one of the later books by one who has just finished his great and beneficent life. Bernard Lucas did indeed deserve to be known both for his writings and for his life work in South India; but there was no personal ambition in him. He was content to give India his love and his life, and though he returned to England last autumn and died in Bournemouth, his real home was in India and his books were all of them by-products of his missionary life. In 1904 there appeared a book, "The Faith of a Christian by a Disciple." It attracted so much attention that in 1905 it came out within paper backs—no small honor. There was much speculation at this time upon the authorship, and many bad shots were made. There was much surprise when it came out that a little known missionary of the London Missionary Society had written this fresh and valuable study.

Fashion in theology changes very rapidly and the heretic of 1890 may be the orthodox of 1920. Lucas was suspected at one time of heresy by many of his brethren, but they came to trust him in the end. The London Missionary Society has room within its borders for many shades of expression. The wisdom of Lucas can be seen in his missionary policy. Long before others saw the way of true progress in India, he saw it and hailed it boldly. "Christianity," he declared, "must not come to India as a Western exotic system. Christ must be set free." Men of his school are too often shy of undertaking mission work. Lucas stands out as a significant example of what can be done by such men if they will come in and take their share in it. It was my privilege to see Lucas only once; he had been compelled, through a too early arrival, to spend the previous night in a railway waiting room; but there were no signs of irritation. He struck me as a man who had attained the peace for which so many strive in vain. Possibly, like the divines in Potsdam, many of the readers of The Christian Century have not heard of Bernard Lucas. But in the records of man's spiritual progress in India and in this country, he will not miss his place. And all his books are worth reading still.

Psycho-Analysis—

Friend or Foe of Religion?

Is psycho-analysis likely to be a friend to religion or a foe? We are all interested nowadays in psycho-analysis. There are many accomplished doctors engaged upon it, and the region of Harley street, our medical quarter, has many consultants in this way "ministering to a mind diseased." Freud and Jung, who were little known a few years ago, are names on the lips of all who keep pace with the advance of science and the moods of philosophy. The apologists of the Roman church, alert as they always are, have fastened upon that which is favorable to them in the new philosophy. They see, for example, how it may be used to defend the confessional, and they are not likely to miss a teaching which seems to support their belief in 'original sin.' In a series of lectures, Dr. Orchard of Kings Weigh Chapel has been discussing the relation of this new study and method to religion. He claims that the question is one which Christian people must face, for it is either going to be yet another witness to the authority of our religion, or it would smash that religion and all religion forever. There is most certainly true. If religion is but a form of auto-suggestion, then all the discussion which takes up so much of our time upon this or that aspect of religion are so much wasted energy. They cease automatically. It is as if once more the chief battle of theology had to be fought outside its frontiers. But those who have followed the story of Christianity know that it has often been in such a situation. Its records are one long series of hairbreadth escapes, as they seem to the observer, from triumphant foes. But the real believer is not greatly disturbed when a new crisis comes. He knows that it is sure to bring out some new truth from the eternal gospel. "It must be acknowledged," Dr. Orchard said, "that the outlook for man is not very cheerful if sex is the fundamental craving and that craving may forever remain unsatisfied." But deep down beneath all other cravings, so the lecturer maintained, "there is a craving that centers in a life which is the life of God himself, a craving that can receive its answer in him alone." So the battle is joined again on this new issue. It will not be an easy victory for the Christian faith, but that faith always shines most brightly when the believers are fighting for life and there is no quarter given and none expected. Some of us do not tremble for the ark of the covenant.

Catholic Program for Free Church Continues

The twenty-sixth national convention of the evangelical free churches was held in Manchester on March 7 and the following days under the chairmanship of the Rev. R. C. Gillie, who has recently been in America and won many friends there. There has been a determined effort to bring freshness into the program. Among the subjects are "The England of Tomorrow," "Assets of the Church," "The Need of Larger Unity." The catholicity of the platform will not be doubted when it is said that there will be present the Archbishop of York, Lord Leverhulme to represent capital; Mr. Clynes, the new parliamentary leader of the labor party, and Lord Robert Cecil. The Free Church Council always abounds in sermons. Each session begins with one. There will be a "demonstration" one evening in which many orators will take part. One such demonstration was described in the former days as "Oliver Cromwell's Night Out," but happily the days are over when we used to imagine that the Kingdom of God could be served by reviving ancient controversies.

* * *

Do We Need a Clerical Profession?

The lot of ministers, in all the churches, is not today an easy one and there are some who look for sweeping changes in the near future. The Dean of St. Paul's, mordant and fearless as ever, has been analyzing the present position of the clergy.

He thinks that modern industrial civilization no longer requires a clerical profession, but secularity is an enemy with which the church cannot make terms.

"What, then, is the remedy?" he asks. "It appears that modern civilization no longer needs a clerical profession, and that we can bid for popularity only by allying ourselves with those who reject the fundamental principles and methods of Christianity. This is intolerable, and is, in fact, flat treason. Is there any reason why we should not return to the example of St. Paul, the missionary who earned his living by tentmaking? Why should not we have in every parish several men and women who are licensed to read services in church, to administer the sacraments, and to do all that the clergy now do? And why should not these men and women be the parish doctor, the schoolmaster and schoolmistress, the parish nurse, and other members of the little community, without respect of class or sex? Such persons would wear a badge, like the little cross of the Church of England Men's Society, but no distinctive costume; and they would earn their living by their secular work, not by their spiritual ministrations."

It would be premature for our readers to think that these changes are likely to be brought about soon in this country. The dean is a very stormy petrel in this modern world, but it would be an equal mistake to dismiss such a prospect with a smile of contempt. There are many indications that the clerical profession as a profession is likely to be in danger, but will it be all loss if the precedent of the tentmaker became the accepted way of the church? Necessity may drive men back to apostolic customs, but there is no reason to anticipate any rapid movement along that road.

What Must I Do to Be Saved?

To evangelize England! That is the thought which burned itself upon the brain and heart of Dr. Clifford during his recent illness. He has been laying plans before the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches, the moderator of which is Dr. Shakespeare. He deplored the despondency and the apathy to be noted in the churches. His remedy was a return to primitive methods—that of individual believers in Christ making other individual believers disciples. This must be the first and immediate effort of the churches. They are not yet ripe for mass evangelism, declared Dr. Clifford. "Their two million free church members needed a campaign of personal evangelism among themselves to bear their witness to evangelical faith to their own families, neighbors and friends. This should be undertaken for a year within the churches before any attempt at a mass evangelism was undertaken outside." These suggestions were most favorably received. So long as too much is not made of the "campaign" and the "movement" and all the publicity these things involve, there is likely to be a great value in such a process within the churches. At the present moment there are many within the church who would be puzzled to answer the question if it were put to them, "What must I do to be saved?" They would have to answer "We have not the least idea." At the present moment a conversation like this would not be a caricature:

Church Member to Outsider: "Come with us."

Outsider: "Which way?"

Church Member: "We do not know, but come all the same."

The case would be hopeless if this were true of all, or even of the majority. But there are enough of the faithful for them to get to work at once. Why wait for a campaign?

The Right Kind of Expectancy

It will help us to the right kind of expectancy if we remember that God does continually beset us behind and before, seeking an entrance and watching for the moment when the habitual mood relaxes and the better mind comes. Sometimes the simplest thing will be enough—the stroke of a church bell, the sight of a star, the speaking silence of a quiet night, a little child's voice, two bars of music, three words and a memory. Any of these or a thousand others—and the long closed door opens and the next five minutes may be worth a lifetime.

CORRESPONDENCE

Unjust Policies of Labor Unions

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Isn't it too bad that so many of your subscribers, like myself, write to you only when wishing to express some divergence of view? We ought to have written before to express appreciation of the splendid quality of your publication, its vital religious tone, its freshness, fearlessness, freedom and breadth. Comparisons are—But this does seem to be the most vital and vigorous journal, overtopping others that are strong and fine and progressive.

But—no, I don't wish to utter a word of criticism, I would only like to make a suggestion in the interest of even greater fairness and justice. I sympathize deeply with your attitude toward the steel trust, its attempt to sidestep the indictment of unmercifully long hours and inadequate pay to its unskilled workers. I believe in trade unions and protection of the laboring men, but I think your position would be stronger and more convincing if you would mention the faults of the trade unions. I don't want to see the unions smashed, but I don't wonder in the least if that is the desire of many fair-minded employers who are subjected to the gross tyrannical rules of labor unions that decrease enormously the service labor renders for the wage it receives. Not many years ago a good brickmason laid 2,000 bricks a day. The union now customarily limits him to 500. The mason who picks up a brick and places it in a wall is paid as much as the brick manufacturer receives for producing the brick—for excavating the clay, moulding and burning it, handling and storing the brick, and all the risks and charges of doing business.

Many union rules lessen production and impair efficiency. The unions strive to restrict output, to level all workers down and up to one dead level, to limit the labor supply by strict apprenticeship rules and high admission fees, to slow up the speed of production in order to reap the larger returns of overtime. The county grand jury of Cleveland, Ohio, on June 9, 1920, after having devoted a fourth of a year to a careful examination of the housing situation in that city, declared the principal reason for the big boost in the cost of living was "the refusal of labor to do a real day's work in return for a real day's pay."

The United States Commission of Labor in his eleventh special report said: "It has been found that there is in the building trades a very general feeling that by working slower, the work will be made to last longer."

We have heard much of the iniquities of the sweat shop, but how much do those who expatiate on the wrongs of the needle-workers have to say of the gross, arbitrary and tyrannical rules of the clothing makers' unions? The railroads are loaded down with arbitrary unjust rules as to labor classifications that compel them to pay the wages of skilled labor to unskilled men.

These are but a few illustrations of scores of instances of unjust exactions by the labor unions, all of which are passed on to the ultimate consumers. By all means let full justice be done to the workingman; protect his right to collective bargaining; give him a fair say as to the conditions under which he works.

But for the sake of the workman—to save him from being a slacker and a grafter, as so many of the labor union men are getting to be, for the sake of embittered employers who are subjected to all kinds of gross dictation and interference by labor unions, for the sake of the ultimate consumer on whose shoulders this heavy burden of loafing and graft is loaded, for the sake of the influence of your splendid paper, do print both sides of the question.

A Pastor Can Find Time to Read

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Allow me as an interested reader to express my appreciation of the high quality of The Christian Century. I am particularly interested in your continued emphasis on the preacher's reading life. I noted with interest and surprise your editorial on the statement of Bishop Nicholson that he had read only two books since his election to his high office. I have heard Bishop Nicholson a number of times, and have always been impressed with the breadth of his information. But I do not see how a bishop or man in the ministry can measure up to his opportunity without keeping in touch with the new books. Since my graduation from the theological seminary six years ago I have made it a practice to read at least one hundred books through each year, besides looking into many more and reading widely in the current magazines. I hope you will not think that I am presuming when I enclose a list of about a hundred books which I recently reviewed before our ministerial association. This represents a year's reading of a pastor who has a congregation with a membership of nearly seven hundred, and who dedicated a new church building during the year. It has no particular merit except that it shows that your frequent recommendations are altogether within the possibilities of accomplishment by the average pastor. I hope you will keep up the good work.

Leaders Must Be Teachers

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your editorial "Religion in the Open" is indeed timely and expresses for many of us those feelings that have long sought expression in terms of religious phraseology. The criticism here offered is not on the thought of your editorial, but upon a condition that exists in the present academic world. You make the same mistake in your article that I note in those who are leaders in the religious thought of the times. You call the "academic graduates" leaders, and state that "the church lags behind its own leadership. It condemns its leadership either to take so advanced a position that there is no group of people at hand to be led or to make such compromises and adjustments that the prophetic fire is quenched." There is a reason in all this. The thought I desire to present is this: Our trained men must not only be leaders but they must be teachers. We have many trained men but few teachers. One of the greatest difficulties of our times is the securing of teachers who have the trained mind, trained in science and history and who can teach the facts of their fields in such way as will harmonize with the faith of the student.

It has been my observation that many of those who know things take a delight in jarring one's present notions and thus jarring one's faith. We want psychology and the application of the pragmatic principle to every-day religion, but we desire to have them presented in such way as will keep our young and old true to the ideals of Jesus and to the word of God. It is a long road from the simple faith of the child to the cold, reasoned faith of the psychologist. The road he must travel is filled with many stones of stumbling. It is a poor leader who willingly leads a seeker after truth on the rocks of doubt and through the mists of uncertainty. Let our leaders be teachers. Let them have a definite, positive, if you like, dogmatic, statement of truth and teach. The average church member is a man of meager training. He is a Christian because he knows that it is better for him and his house than not to accept Christ. The young student in college is not yet mature in knowledge or judgment. He is at a critical age. Truth is a precious thing and so is a young life. Handle the truth with care and the life with more care. It is an academic mistake to think that mere scholarship and not character is the objective of training. That a man becomes perplexed in certain stages of his life is natural. He must not be laughed at then. He needs encouragement, and above all, if he be a student, he needs a sympathetic teacher, who having traveled the road over which he is passing, can give him the assurance that beyond the mists the sun is shining and the inviting hills welcome him to their clear summits and wholesome atmosphere. The teacher must be conscious of his knowledge but not self-conscious. The church will follow the leader that teaches. Jesus was never called a leader. He was preeminently a teacher.

Does Not Call it Heresy Hunting

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Your note in the edition of March 3 entitled "Hunts Heresy in All Denominations" does a grave injustice to Mr. Everett P. Wheeler and to the National Civic Federation. I was present at the meeting and listened attentively to the report made by Mr. Wheeler. There was no suggestion, so far as I can recall, of an "economic boycott" nor of any prosecution for heresy. The purpose of the committee and of its report was merely to give publicity to the fact that revolutionary agencies are employing the institutions of the church for propaganda purposes. When a student in a theological seminary admits, in private conversation, that his only purpose in entering the ministry is to obtain a platform for preaching socialism—when a professor in a theological seminary, again in private conversation, hails bolshevism as the new religion which is to supplant the Christianity of the churches—when an institutional church, established for the evangelizing of the working classes, is made a free forum for radicalism—when these things are so it may be worth while to inform the people of the churches of what is going on. But I beg to inform you that nothing in the nature of a heresy trial or investigation thereto is contemplated. Surely, it is permissible to meet propaganda with propaganda and argument with argument.

The above may intimate or reveal the fact that the writer is a member of the committee of which Mr. Wheeler is chairman. May I say that as a life-long liberal I should certainly not lend myself to any heresy-hunting program.

Tragedy of Overchurching

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: I am interested in the statement of Mr. J. Frank Green in your issue of February 24. Apparently he reads only those statements of the Interchurch work with which he did not agree. The most quoted remark growing out of the Interchurch Town and Country Survey was the statement that there were at least five thousand new country churches needed to care for the neglected areas.

The tragedy of overchurching is that it means neglect elsewhere. The most effective answer to Mr. Green's statement is found in the maps of the Interchurch survey, which show on the statement of the local people that in all the counties studied there were neglected areas, some of them running into the hundreds of square miles, whereas within those same counties there were other communities in which the ratio of churches to people was nearly one to a hundred.

The White Companion *

I RECALL in Camp Hancock a certain Baptist minister from Philadelphia, one of the finest men God ever made, who invariably referred, in talking to the boys, to Christ as "The White Companion." I remembered that the Russians call Jesus the "White Christ." The term caught my fancy and the boys seemed to take to it. What did it seem to connote? A strong companion—right at your side—there while you lived—there when you died—a white soul, pure, stainless, loving you even if you were stained—a pure, strong, loving companion. Donald Hankey told of the dying soldier who murmured as he sank into unconsciousness: "Underneath—the—everlasting—arms."

Do you have the vivid sense of the Living Christ? Do you feel him at your side? When you are misunderstood do you know that he was misunderstood? When you suffer keenly, do you know that he suffered too? Dr. Kelman tells how the Tommies, seeing the wayside cross powdered with snow, the agonized Savior hanging there, would say reverently, "He understands, he suffered too." One is not really a Christian until he feels like that. One must feel the Living Master with him all the time. It is here that the Hero-Jesus breaks down. No, Jesus was more than a man, more than a good man, more than the best man. He was God-Man. I like human friendship but for the big moments of defeat or success I want the companionship of the God-Man. When death comes stealing over my threshold, in sable robes carrying the scythe, I want not frail human heroes, however sympathetic, I want the God-Man. When vast ambitions stir my soul and again when black failure stares me in the eye I want more than good men and kind women about, I want the God-Man. If we take our gospel seriously we know that we have such a Super-Friend. "I am with you all the days." Bright days? Yes. Dull days? Yes. Dead days? Yes. Victorious days? Yes. Lost days? Yes. "All the days." He is with us all the days.

You may call this mysticism. I do not care what you call it. You cannot kill facts by labeling them! The splendid fact remains—and that fact is that Jesus did not remain in that tomb in Joseph's garden, but that Our Lord lives now. Not only is he alive but he is aglow with love and alert with plans to win the world. His fiery soul kindles the enthusiasm in our own hearts, and we sing, "My heart an altar and his love the flame." Every day's journey becomes an Emmaus road, every meal a supper in that Emmaus cottage, every experience a revelation of the partly misunderstood Christ. With all my soul, with every fiber of my being I believe in the Living Companion.

HASTINGS' ONE-VOLUME Dictionary of the Bible

Cleas, concise, popular and yet scholarly. The skill of its able and experienced editor, Dr. Hastings, is in evidence at every point. Unimportant subjects are treated briefly, making it possible to devote more space to vital themes. Among its contributors are found 100 of the leading Biblical scholars in England and America and each gives the results of his own special knowledge and research. The articles on the different books of the Bible are especially valuable. The point of view is that of progressive, modern Biblical scholarship. Extreme theories are avoided. In general, the conclusions which are destined to be the basis of present-day preaching and teaching, are fairly and convincingly set forth. The historical, geographical, and archæological data are also classified and presented with rare skill and effectiveness.

Seek Millions for Education of Oriental Women

The work of Christian missions has wrought no reform in the Orient more significant than the education of women. Racial progress has been delayed for centuries by ignorant mothers. Six colleges work together for the women of all denominations in India, China and Japan. These are Woman's Christian College of Tokyo, Ginling College of Nanking, China, Yenching College of Peking, Woman's Christian College of Madras, Isabella Thoburn College of Lucknow and the Vellore Women's Medical College of India. These institutions are asking for $2,840,000 for a more adequate equipment. Of this amount one-third has been offered by the Laura Spellman Rockefeller Fund. The committee will endeavor to get ten dollar gifts from at least one hundred thousand Christian women of America.

Y. M. C. A. Will Stress Religious Message

The leaders of the Y. M. C. A. in America have been in conference recently and have decided that the times demand the laying of a special stress upon their religious message. Much of the energy of the organization went into humanitarian work during the war. Ernest Nelson, an eminent Argentine educator and journalist, sat with the Y. M. C. A. men and gave earnest endorsement to the program of religious emphasis. Throughout his life he has been known as "liberal" and hostile to religion, but he now declares himself at one with the aims and purposes of the Association leaders. He will give a considerable amount of his time to the propaganda. The important task of the Association in his view is to influence the college men and future leaders in behalf of a religious view of life.

Performs Miracles in India

Mr. J. M. Hickson, the famous healing missionary who spent some time in America last year, is now engaged in ministry in India. The Madras Weekly Mail tells of a number of his reputed miracles. He conducted a three-day mission at Kotaayama. At the close of his ministry the crowd was so large that only a fraction of them could secure the laying on of hands for healing. At the next town his fame had preceded him, and he was thronged throughout his ministry.

Preparing to Help Mexican Immigrant

One-tenth of the Mexicans of the world now live in the United States and it is believed by competent observers that these people have come to stay. The home mission bodies have organized their forces to minister to the newcomers in such ways as will avoid as far as possible the duplication of effort. The need of native religious workers is already sensed, and an interdenominational school at Albuquerque has been established. It is planned that leaders should also be trained for work along the border, so the presence of a considerable body of Mexicans in this country may make it possible to strengthen greatly the work in Mexico.

Church Erection Societies Make Startling Forecast

The church erection societies of the various denominations are flooded with appeals for aid in building enterprises. Church erection has been greatly hindered by the war and the result is that many congregations feel their equipment does not fit their present conception of the task of the church. The various societies are flooded with appeals for aid. The compilation of various information secured by these societies would indicate that $65,000,000 worth of new buildings will be erected during the year 1921. The Roman Catholics are rapidly working out a program for parish houses, and it is estimated that $16,000,000 will be put into these structures this year. The low water mark in church erection was reached in 1917 when the total was only $20,000,000.

Chicago Disciples Want Million Dollars Worth of Buildings

At a recent meeting of the trustees of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society it was voted that the various constituent churches should be encouraged to erect during the coming five years a million dollars' worth of church buildings. At the end of that period the Disciples of Chicago will celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the beginning of their work in the city. It is not planned to have a common treasury, but each building enterprise will stand upon its own merit. The pooling of information and plans will enable the churches to erect more suitable buildings, and will provide mutual encouragement.

Building for Community Uses

The first use of the new Disciples church building at Independence, Mo., will be to entertain the farmers' organization of the community at a banquet. This fact is symbolic of the whole program of the church. Early in the war the old building burned down, and Rev. J. E. Wolfe the new minister, found that his service to the community would be to lead a building enterprise. Seventy-five thousand dollars has been expended, and with the walls of the old structure still standing, a commodious and modern structure has been erected with this amount of money.

Easter Offering for the Children of the World

The northern Baptists are holding missionary conferences in various cities of their territory looking forward to a big missionary offering at Easter time. The offering will be dedicated to the children of the world, and it is hoped that it will amount to a million dollars. The money will not be used solely for relief, nor yet altogether for religious propaganda, but will be devoted to education and medical progress. At the Christmas time a fund of a half million was raised for the children, and sent wherever there was suffering and need.

Dr. Aked Does Not Like Film

Dr. Aked has publicly criticized the film called "The Inside of the Cup." The film version of the popular novel makes very vivid the contention of the author of the well-known story. The church members who run shady stock operations and oppress the poor are strong features. Dr. Aked asserts that the showing of the film will increase the hostility of that section of the public which never goes to church. Meanwhile the motion picture house which brought the film to Kansas City does not wish to lose its two thousand dollars on the contract, and is going forward with the exhibition of the picture.

Will Organize Churches in Overchurched Territory

The competition of the churches where they work in a competitive spirit has been compared to the navy-building programs of the great powers. The Presbyterians are planning to put a number of new churches in Jefferson and Belmont counties in Ohio. This is in territory which has been quite fully described in Gill and Pinchot's report called "Six Thousand Country Churches." Their judgment is that these counties are already over-churched. The new churches will be organized by the St. Clairsville presbytery. It may well be feared that other denominations will feel that this infraction of good church policy will justify them in similar competitive moves.

Disciples Will Have Day for Special Problems

The Disciples national convention has always been devoted to missionary programs and inspirational addresses in the past, but the need of a doctrinal clearing house has led the International Convention officials to provide a day for special problems at the convention which will be held at Winona Lake, Ind., the first week in September. Rev. Graham Frank is now soliciting correspondence from those who have suggestions to make. For several years past conservative Disciples have been holding protest meetings in connection with the convention. It is hoped that an open discussion of problems on the convention floor itself may obviate these unpleasant performances.

Bishop Charges Intellectuals Are False Leaders

Bishop Nicholai, the Serbian bishop who is touring this country in the interest of the famine fund for Serbia, is a highly educated man with the best training of the schools. He holds honorary degrees from good universities in recognition of his attainments. He sees Europe from the inside and charges that for many years continental Europe has been building its civilization upon foundations of sand. He believes that very largely the teachings of the "intellectuals" have misled the people. They have exalted material concepts, and have placed self-interest and material prosperity above spiritual attainments. The civilization of continental Europe is tottering, and there is nothing to save it except a rebirth of its ancient religious interest. One of his sentences is very striking. He says: "America may feed and clothe the bodies of three and a half million of the children of Europe, but if it does not also feed their souls and give back to them with material things a vision of Christ and Christ's ideals, America's noble charity will fail and will only help to raise up three and a half million new war machines."

Missionaries in Mud House Up the Congo

No more thrilling task could be given to young people than that which has come to Rev. and Mrs. E. R. Moon, Disciple missionaries on the upper Congo. In the heart of the dark continent they have opened a new mission station in a wild region and among a strange people. The devoted missionaries have been living in a mud hut for lack of better accommodations. On account of the strong base farther down the Congo, the work at Mondombe has come to a quick success, for there was a corps of native workers to tour through the forests and carry the "Jesus news" to the people who had never heard it before. There were ninety-three baptisms at the Christmas time, and at the same time eighteen couples accepted the Christian ideal of marriage and were married by the missionaries. Among those baptized was the big witch doctor. The Sunday school now numbers three hundred and fifty. The work is under the auspices of the United Christian Missionary Society.

Rev. Shannon Will Speak at Lenten Services

Dr. Frederick F. Shannon, pastor of Central Church of Chicago, and successor to Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus, has been chosen to deliver the noon-day Lenten sermons under the auspices of the Chicago Church Federation. Dr. Shannon announces as his subjects for this period the following: "A Revaluation of the Church," "The Power of the Christian Faith," "Pilate Before Christ," "Things That Cannot Be Shaken," "The Sacrament of Suffering." The meetings will last just thirty minutes and will be held in First Methodist church, at the corner of Clark and Washington streets.

Federated Church Now Has Sheriff for Pastor

The war has made changes in many lives and particularly in the lives of ministers. Rev. Winfred E. Robb was a chaplain during the war and since his return from service he has been elected as sheriff. He also serves as pastor of the federated church at Urbandale, a suburb of Des Moines. This federated church was first conceived by Rev. W. J. Lockhart, a Disciple minister, six years ago. It has served the religious needs of its community so well that there is now talk of a new building which will cost a hundred thousand dollars. The congregation has purchased more land to provide room for the new buildings. Meanwhile at the end of the carline a second federated church is being formed which will do for another section of the city what the old original church has been doing. For a building for the second federated church over four thousand dollars has already been subscribed.

Advertise for Church Members

The exangelical churches have few worse problems than that of relating members from other congregations to the local church. In Portsmouth, O., this year the Presbyterians are leading in an advertising campaign to cost a thousand dollars in which the people of the city are urged to connect up with the local churches. All the local churches are cooperating with the campaign. Last year a little over $200 was spent in this way, and results were so gratifying that it is planned to do a bigger work this year. The churches at Kenton, Ohio, are cooperating in a similar plan. Were the churches to use a tithe of the money once used in tabernacle campaigns in intelligent newspaper publicity, they would be much forwarded in their work.

Strong Religious Programs for Colleges

The college program of the Y. M. C. A. is a very vigorous one for this season. In the central district, which is directed by H. T. Beaver, sixty-six college campaigns have been set up for the period following Christmas. Rev. J. Stitt Wilson was booked for seventeen institutions. This Methodist minister, who was formerly the socialist mayor of Berkeley, is very popular with the students. A. J. Elliott, familiarly known as Dad Elliott, has taken three institutions. George Sherwood Eddy, Henry Sloane Coffin, Fred B. Smith, Hugh Black, Prof. Cleland B. McAfee, C. W. Gilkey, Cornelius Woelfkin, Thomas Graham and others are being used in various colleges of the middle west. These speakers address themselves not only to campus problems, but to the personal religious problems of the students.

Will Hold Two Sunday Evening Services

During Lent Dr. Burris Jenkins, of Linwood Blvd. Christian church of Kansas City, is holding two Sunday evening services in order to accommodate all the people who seek to hear him. The church has been conducting its Sunday evening service with moving pictures in Atkins Hall an auditorium equal in size to its regular church auditorium. Dr. Jenkins always speaks after the pictures. For the Sunday evenings that lead up to Easter a regular church service is being held, also in the church auditorium. Dr. Jenkins is editor of the Kansas City Post, a prominent Democratic politician, and pastor of one of the largest churches of Disciples in the country.

Ministers Asked to Recommend Movie House

The Christian Advocate tells the following story of how a movie house undertook to dupe a group of ministers: "A week ago a moving picture theater manager in Chicago extended an invitation to all the ministers of the city to attend free a showing of the religious pictures at the theater. Many ministers were present. After the showing of the picture it was announced that the religious picture would be shown all week, and the ministers were urged to spread

Ohio Federation Urges Merging

THE Ohio Federation of Churches considered the question of the over-churching of small communities at its meeting in Columbus in February and adopted resolutions looking to the abatement of this nuisance. It was recommended that where possible the members of competing churches should get together and decide which church should continue in the community. Where the denominational leaders had to take part in the matter the principle of "trading responsibility" should be followed so the relative strength of the different denominations would not be disturbed. Where neither of these plans will work, it is recommended that the "federated" church be tried. It was the judgment of the Ohio federation that the "union" church seldom gives satisfaction. This judgment was rendered in the face of the fact that there are union churches throughout the country with fifty years of history. The federated church pleases the denominational leaders better, for it preserves to the denomination the benevolent offerings which by the union church plan are less regularly sent to the various denominational headquarters. In the forming of federated churches, it is provided that new members shall be received into the denomination of their choice. The ordinances are administered in accordance with the wishes of the candidate for membership. The auxiliary societies are all merged into one and the management of the church is vested in a joint committee from the constituent churches. The program for the federated church as set forth by the Ohio Federation of Churches is that each congregation should have a located pastor giving his full time to the work. There should be a modern church building particularly adapted to the needs of a modern Bible school. Both a manse and an automobile should be provided for the minister. The service program of the church commits it to serve the economic life by contributing to agricultural knowledge and to business honesty. To the social life the church is to contribute a program for recreation. In addition there is the historic ministry to the moral and spiritual life.

the news and advise their people to go and see the picture. At the end of the week the following announcement was made: "Ballroom festivals! Fashions! Fair women! Shipwreck at sea! A bathing orgy at night!"

Pays Large Sum for Bible

A Bible sold in New York the other day for $3,700. The reason for the unprecedented price of the book was that it had previously belonged to Martha Washington, and was her family Bible. It was printed by the Clarendon Press, of Oxford, England, in 1783. Martha Washington's autograph appears three different places in the book.

President Makes Address on Religion

President Harding addressed a laymen's convention in Marion, O., a few days before his inauguration at which religious problems were being discussed. His words on this occasion indicate his sincere intention to carry the precepts of the gospel with him into his high office. A president faces many temptations, but every Christian will wish him strength to succeed. He said: "I want you to believe that there is an individual who believes in the reconstruction of a religious republic. I have for my inheritance a Christian belief, and I have in my veins the blood of Christian parentage. I have been preaching to my countrymen the gospel of reverence. I do not believe that we can have the highest type of civilization without its religious strain. We need its influence, and we need its discipline. Sometimes I think that the world is adrift from its moorings of religion, and I know it will help if there comes a renewal of great faith. I am trying to bring into practice in America the government which emanates from the meeting of minds. I have no higher concept in the world than just government, and I do not see how a government can exist in the world without coming in contact with God. I could not hope for a happy relationship among nations if there is not the same current of recognition of the Supreme Being. America will take her place in making a world peace and answer every American aspiration without the surrender of one thing we hold dear as Americans. When it comes to an association of nations, I do not think that any association of nations could be successful in which God is not recognized. I do not intend to come as the finest example of what a man ought to be; but I rejoice in the inheritance of a religious belief, and I do not mind saying that I gladly go to God Almighty for guidance and strength in the responsibilities that are coming to me."

New Book on Christian Unity is Ready

"Christian Unity: Its Principles and Possibilities" is the challenging title of a new book which is being issued as the fourth report of a Committee on the War and Religious Outlook. A group of men have spent a year considering the problems that are dealt with in the book. The report falls into three parts. One deals with the "Present Situation." Another treats the "Historical Background," and still another the alluring topic of "The Future." Dr. Robert E. Speer tells what the war has done to the Christian unity interests. The present attitude of the various denominations is set forth by President Clarence A. Barbour, Dr. Frank Mason North, President J. Ross Stevenson, Dr. Peter Ainslie, Dr. Frederick H. Knobel, Dean Henry B. Washburn and the late Dr. Hubert C. Herring. Since the book represents the work of many minds, it sets forth as no other book does what the leading evangelical thinkers hold as convictions at the present hour with regard to the reunion of the church.

Bishop and Layman in Same Pulpit

The appearance of the Bishop of Durham in Dr. Jowett's pulpit with a layman there to read the scripture is some innovation for England. This service was altogether along free church lines, and the bishop joined heartily in the singing of the great old gospel songs. The announcement of the bishop brought a great crowd and an hour before service time people were sitting in the aisles. Though the interchange of pulpits is vigorously resisted by the high church party of England, it is very evident that they were to be over-ruled by public sentiment. There are many who express the judgment that the Oxford Movement has run its course and that England is now in for an evangelical revival. As a Roman Catholic writer points out in a recent issue of the Constructive Quarterly, the recent Lambeth proposals are far more consistent with free church positions than with Roman Catholicism.

Pastor Will Work in Factory

Rev. Joseph Myers, Jr., announced to his Budd Park Christian Church of Kansas City recently that he was laying down the ministerial garb to enter the service of a factory. He proposes to work beside the laboring man, eat with him and smoke a pipe with him. He believes that in this way he will come to some new appreciation of the workingman's problem. This announcement has traveled far and wide, and recently came under the eye of Arthur Brisbane, the editorial writer of the Hearst newspapers. Mr. Brisbane asserts that the young minister is making the same kind of a mistake that Tolstoi made. The Russian nobleman went on a pilgrimage barefoot, but took a chiropodist along. Life has only so much energy, and time given to manual labor is just so much energy lost from the intellectual labor of the world. Mr. Myers was educated at Wabash and Transylvania colleges. His pulpit ministry is being assumed by Rev. E. L. Thompson, recently of Oklahoma.

What the Laymen Think of Ministers

THE ministers of the country now have an opportunity to know what the laymen really think about them. A questionnaire was sent out containing many searching questions, and this questionnaire has been sent back with candid and startling answers. The account of all this is contained in a recent issue of The Christian Register, and reads as follows:

"Religion is a vital factor in the life of America. This is the unanimous opinion of one hundred and eighteen representative men of the United States who answered a set of questions sent out by Mr. L. C. Harworth, General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of Youngstown, Ohio. Mr. Harworth sent letters to two hundred and twenty merchants, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, judges, bankers, manufacturers, teachers, lawyers, physicians, brokers, real estate dealers, capitalists, Congressmen and Senators, editors and newspaper writers, mayors, social workers, students, advertising men, labor leaders, policemen, and laborers.

"Although opportunity was given for anonymous replies, only twenty-three declined to sign their names. But one letter was received unfavorable to the clergy, though in a number of instances ministers were severely criticised. Eighty-four of the replies were personally written, indicating close interest. Ninety of one hundred and five writers believe clergymen enter the ministry with different motives than those that prompt men to adopt other callings. Eighty-six of one hundred and seventeen said they would advise young men in whom they are personally interested to enter the ministry. Ninety-two count a clergyman among their intimate friends; nineteen do not.

"Sixty-five men thought ministers were as good mixers as men in other professions; fifty thought they were not. Sixty-five thought they needed to be; sixteen thought they did not need to be. 'Is it natural and easy for you to turn to the minister for spiritual advice as it is to turn to the lawyer for legal advice or to the physician for medical advice?' Yes, twenty-three; no, seventy-one. 'Do the ministers you know stand out as real community leaders, as men of other callings?' Yes, seventy-three; no, thirty-six. 'As a rule, could ministers have commanded a larger income had they pursued another calling?' Yes, eighty-nine; no, twenty-five. 'Is the average minister too idealistic and too uncompromising in his beliefs and teachings?' Yes, forty-seven; no, sixty-one. 'Does the average sermon interest you as much as the average secular address?' Yes, fifty-five; no, forty-eight.

"Sixty-two held favorable opinions and fifty-five unfavorable of the clergyman who smokes. Card-playing by ministers was approved by fifty-six and disapproved by fifty-five. Eighty-two thought ministers should attend the theatre; twenty-nine thought they should not. Fifty considered preaching the minister's most important work; fifty thought the things he did outside the pulpit counted for more."

City. Meanwhile Mr. Myers may justify his unique experience by turning up results worthy of his sacrifice.

Episcopal Writer Opposed to Unchurching

The recognition of each other as members of the church of Christ in the various denominations is obviously a fundamental condition of Christian union. An Anglican paper called The Challenge, edited by Rev. C. E. Raven, says: "So far at least as the student world is concerned they cannot bring themselves to unchurch those bodies from which the greatest prophets of the time are drawn. Take a list of the men who most deeply interest and inspire them, and observe how completely it cuts across the denominational lines. Herbert Gray and D. S. Cairns, the Presbyterians; T. R. Glover, the Baptist; H. C. Carter and W. B. Selbie, the Congregationalists; W. R. Maltby, the Methodist; H. T. Hodgkin, the Quaker, these and others—we owe them far too much to question for one instant the reality of their membership in the one body of Christ, or to refuse to seal our unity with them sacramentally."

Journalist Wants Preachers to Stay by Their Job

An article from the pen of William T. Ellis, the well-known journalist, appearing in the Saturday Evening Post of Feb. 12 has occasioned wide comment. He finds too much over-head in the church and not enough patient working at the task of the parish. In this he agrees with Rev. W. L. Sperry, who wrote in the January Atlantic on "A Minister's Declaration of Independence." He says: "What people want from the pulpit is information and inspiration concerning a living God, in satisfaction of the deepest needs of their nature. This may be temporarily obtained by sensationalism and by lectures on current events, although they know that they may get better entertainment, even of the same sort, elsewhere. . . . One of the pathetic sights of our days is the spectacle of clergymen turned into vice raiders, municipal reformers, prohibition enforcers, lyceum lecturers, board and society secretaries, life insurance agents, and almost everything else. To make the eternal timely, and to bring the infinite near, and to introduce burdened and dissatisfied men and women to the sufficiencies that lie outside the realm of the physical senses—this is the mission of the minister. For him to accept any other position, however eminent, is a descent."

Organize an Independent Christian Science Church

The rift among the followers of Mrs. Eddy is growing wider. The lawsuits to secure control of the big publishing interests, with their rich financial returns, drags on, but in the meantime there is protest against the alleged autocracy of the directors of the mother church in Boston. At the Hotel Astor in New York there was formed recently the First Independent Christian Science Church of that city. In their first meeting these independents followed the regular Christian Science order of service.

Plain Talk on Union

THE church of England has for nearly a century been isolated in its fellowship. Not recognized by Rome as a true church of Christ, it has in turn refused fellowship at its altars to evangelical ministers, often withholding even the sacrament from people who had not been confirmed. Thus the church which has had so much to say about Christian union has been practicing the least of it. This anomalous situation is felt by all the more sensitive thinkers of the church, and Dean Inge of St. Paul's, in a recent address sets forth in a vigorous fashion a demand for action in the matter of fellowship with evangelicals. He says:

"A greater misfortune than a postponement, but not than an abandonment of the hope of reunion. For my own part, at least, I would purchase reunion with the Presbyterians and Wesleyans at the price of a considerable secession of our own extremists. We do not sufficiently realize how completely the path to various church reforms is barred by those who refuse to consent to any change which would be an obstacle in the way of submission to Rome. If you look at the pronouncements of this party you will frequently come upon such a phrase as this: 'The proposed change is ultra vires for a provincial church.' This argument has lately been raised against the very sensible concessions made by the conference with regard to the ministry of women. 'It is ultra vires.' This means that the church of England must not alter its formularies or its terms of membership or its rules for the conduct of divine service without the consent of—of whom? Of a general council of the Western Catholic Church! Could anything be more absurd?"

"According to this school, the only body competent to deal with questions relating to the faith and order of the church of England is a body which, as everybody knows, can never meet. This principle, whether avowed or not, is at the bottom of the stiff opposition which those who wish to broaden the basis of Anglicanism always encounter. It is the ignis fatuus of reunion with Rome which blocks the way to reunion with our Protestant brethren. And I maintain that we cannot allow the road to be permanently blocked in this way. We may think it right to exercise patience for the sake of internal peace; but we must push steadily against this absurd barrier till it breaks. For the only way to terminate our isolation in Christendom is to repudiate decisively that pitiful theory which divides all the rest of the worshippers of Christ into those whom we unchurch and those who unchurch us. We must show by actions as well as by words that we do not unchurch our brethren, that we wish to acknowledge them and the societies to which they belong. I repeat that it is recognition, not complete fusion, which we have to aim at.

"Let me conclude by quoting the words of Field Marshal Lord Haig, spoken in Scotland at the end of last year: 'Now that the ordeal of war is over, I believe that the churches, if they will act together, have a great and unequalled opportunity to secure and preserve for all time, to the lasting advantage of our race, that capacity for common effort, spirit of fellowship and community of ideals which by their teaching and example they did so much to foster during the war. . . . I desire to see a beginning made in Great Britain itself by forming a united national church. Then I look further afield, and desire to see a great imperial church. . . . It will not be enough to have a great United Church of Scotland. . . . All the churches of the homeland must combine together and enter upon a great crusade. . . . To-day all things are possible to men who have a passionate faith in the things that are worth while—and back up that faith with courage, resolution and the spirit of mutual confidence and good will. To-morrow the opportunity will have gone, and who knows when it will return? These are the words of a great man of action. The time of grace of which he speaks is rapidly passing; the bishops have not done what many of us hoped; it is for us to act, to act quickly, as opportunity offers, in no spirit of disloyalty or contumacy, but in accordance, we believe, with the true character of our national church, with its best traditions, and with the hopes and prayers of British Christians generally.'"

The Shorter Bible

The New Testament

By Charles Foster Kent

THE AIM of the Shorter Bible is to furnish in logical order those parts of the Bible which have especial bearing on the present age. Here can be read in a straight-ahead narrative the thrilling account of the life of Jesus and his teachings as they began their work of revolutionizing the world's life. Short, pungent sentences characterize this new translation by Professor Kent, who stands almost alone in his especial field. A most compelling presentation of the New Testament story.

The Meaning of Baptism

By Charles Clayton Morrison

The Continent says of this work:

“It required courage to publish this book. It is by a minister of the Disciples’ church, which has been peculiarly strenuous in behalf of the scriptural necessity for immersion, and he writes that ‘the effect of our study is absolutely to break down the notion that any divine authority whatsoever stands behind the practice of immersion.’ Instead, in the New Testament, baptism simply means the conferment and acceptance of the status of a Christian. He is strongly against the rebaptism of Christian believers who apply to Baptist or Disciple churches for membership having been accepted in other churches by any mode of baptism whatever. Equally he opposes infant baptism, because the subject of baptism must be voluntary. At the root of his argument lies a sound desire for Christian unity.”

The Christian Advocate (New York) says:

“This is probably the most important book in English on the place of baptism in Christianity written since Mozley published his ‘Baptismal Regeneration’ in 1856.”

The Congregationalist says of it:

“A daring and splendidly Christian piece of work, in which the author frankly asserts that Jesus ‘had no intention of fixing a physical act upon his followers. He did not have in mind the form of baptism but the meaning of it.’”

Is Christianity Practicable?

By WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN
Professor of Systematic Theology
Union Theological Seminary

"In this time of world crisis," says Dr. Brown, in the preface of his book, "when existing customs are everywhere being challenged, it is essential that we raise anew the question as to the nature and grounds of our faith, and that we ask ourselves whether the enterprise in which we are engaged is a practicable one, worthy of the allegiance of sensible men." In the book, Dr. Brown considers his great theme from the following viewpoints: "The World Crisis as Challenge and Opportunity;" "The Christian Interpretation of History;" "The Duty for To-morrow;" "What the Church Can Do."

DO THE TEACHINGS OF

America's foremost thinkers will discuss this theme

THE YEAR 1921 is to be The Christian Century's greatest year. More than two score of the nation's foremost religious and ethical thinkers will conduct a thorough-going and unhampered discussion of the place Jesus Christ holds in the life of our times. Here is an example:

The Mind of Jesus and the Competitive System

will be discussed by

Robert Hunter, Spokesman for submerged humanity, author of "Poverty," "Why We Fail as Christians."

Harry F. Ward, Constructive radical, professor of Christian Ethics, author of "A Better Industrial Order."

Roger Babson, America's influential adviser of business men, author of "Religion and Business."

Scott Nearing, Socialist authority, a fearless agitator who believes in religion and the ethics of Jesus.

This single group alone makes The Christian Century indispensable to any man or woman who feels how urgent and how basic the industrial question is in religious and social progress. But these writers will represent only one of the many aspects of the great theme. The list of participants is a growing one. Each week adds a new stellar name to the brilliant galaxy. At this moment the writers and their themes are:

ESUS FIT OUR TIMES?

The Christian Century during the year 1921

NEVER in the history of American religious journalism has there been so eager and widespread a response to a program of complete freedom in the discussion of Christian themes as that which The Christian Century is receiving. Its circulation has burst all denominational bonds. Thoughtful churchmen, both lay and clerical, in all communions are enthusiastic subscribers. They rejoice in a journal of religion which, without displacing denominational organs, undertakes squarely to face the problems of this new age without regard to denominational interests. The discovery—and it has been a discovery—that a periodical can be religious and at the same time free, positive and at the same time liberal in its hospitality to all enlightened points of view, has seemed to thousands of unsatisfied hearts like coming upon a refreshing spring of living water in a desert place. The Christian

Century has extended its influence into all the communions of the American church. It is equally at home among Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Disciples, Baptists, Episcopalians and other Christian groups. Its subscription list is an album of the signatures of the church leaders of the nation. Besides, it is gripping the minds of thinking men and women who have no church connection. They are astonished that from within the church which they supposed had become moribund and incurably denominationalized in its vision there should emerge a journal loyal to the church, devout and evangelical, and at the same time as free as a university class room. And they stand amazed to find themselves actually enjoying a religious paper! Churchmen and earnest-minded non-churchmen are saying that The Christian Century points toward a new day for Christian faith and practice.

Wanted—A Congregation!

By LLOYD C. DOUGLAS

is helping to solve the essential problem of the preacher. The reception given the book upon its first appearance indicates that Dr. Douglas has rendered the church public a genuine service in producing this unusual book.

Press Comments on "Wanted—A Congregation"

The Christian Advocate, New York:

"What is the matter with the churches? How shall the preacher get a congregation to hear his message from Sunday to Sunday? Well, here is a preacher 'whose own great church is packed every morning,' who tells his brethren of the pulpit how to do it. The whole is cast into the form of a story, but it may as well be stated that there is not very much romance in this story. 'The Rev. D. Preston Blue,' who is the 'goat' in this case, and to whom 'are assigned many ideas, convictions, plans, and executions thereof,' is a very real person, as many a preacher, as well as a member of an official board, can testify. The preacher who goes through this story will get many valuable pointers on how to do it, as well as many on how not to do it, and it is hoped that there will be, likewise, many official members of the churches who will read the story and be profited thereby, coming away from the reading wiser, even though sadder, men."

The Christian Endeavor World, Boston:

"Preachers especially will enjoy Lloyd C. Douglas's story, 'Wanted—a Congregation.' It is a clever discussion, in story form, of some church problems that puzzle most of us. Why, for instance, are the churches often empty and the theatres full? What can be done to attract people to church services? What, in a word, is the matter with the church? The hero is a minister who goes to a birthday party and meets two old friends and a new one. They tell him some startling things and advance some daring theories, with the result that the minister goes back home and preaches his church full. The story is cleverly told. Let us hope that it will put new courage into many a weary pastor."

The Continent, Chicago:

"In this remarkable story by a minister two college chums and a successful surgeon help a discouraged preacher to catch the vision that transformed an empty church into one crowded to overflowing—that changed a lifeless church into a living church. It is especially to be recommended to pastors who Sunday after Sunday preach to empty pews. The layman with a keen interest in church matters will find the story exceedingly interesting and perhaps as a result of reading it will devise ways in which to aid his minister friends."

A Prayer on Easter Morning

THOU who wast stronger than death, whom death bound but could not hold, in the power and truth of Thine upstanding from the tomb our hearts rejoice this day. We rejoice in the revelation of Thy survival and the clear proof which Thou hast brought to us of the soundness of our hope and dream of immortality. Thy victory is our victory. Because Thou livest we shall live also, and we know that our dear ones who have passed beyond the touch of our hand are in the eternal presence of the Father. In the vision of Thy glorious resurrection our lips break forth in songs of praise and we join the innumerable host to crown Thee King of love.

Yet, Lord, in the joy of Easter suffer not Thy cross to be eclipsed from our vision. While we bask in the light that comes streaming from the open door of Thine empty tomb, may we not miss the effulgence with which it bathes the cross still standing on the little hill. We who followed Thee to Calvary, timid, disappointed and full of fear, may we find in Thy resurrection the verdict of God upon the soundness of such a life as Thine. As Thy radiant reappearing sheds light upon our future joy, may it shed light also upon our present duty. Banish from our hearts all misgivings as to the efficacy of a life of simple love and good will such as Thou didst carry through to the end. In the Easter light may Thy supreme adventure of faith and trust reveal and confirm to our hearts the fact that our universe is spiritual through and through as Thou didst believe it to be.

And may we, O Lord Jesus, go forth with courage to whatever cross may await us. May we stake our all upon a life of love. May we refuse all compromises with evil, all obeisance to mammon, all dependence upon material resources, all trust in reeking tube and iron shard. As Thy supreme challenge to the powers of a secular order was answered by the glorious victory of Easter morning, may we keep the path of loving service and unselfish good will, unafraid even though it lead us to a cross like Thine. May we stand fast in the power of Thy resurrection assured that the approving verdict of God upon Thy way of life will be given us also when the morning dawns and the shadows flee away. Amen.

Catholic Piety in a New Literary Expression

OFTEN the question has been asked why in our age, and particularly in the Protestant fellowship, no such devotional classic as "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas a-Kempis, has been written. Many reasons have been given in explanation, one being that such a book could only be born out of the cloistered quiet of the middle ages. Another is that the Imitation is a fruit of the Latin temperament and genius—though a-Kempis himself was not a Latin, nor were Rolle and Julian of Norwich of that race. No, the fact seems to be that the Roman church has developed, in its great souls, a quality of piety unique and precious, the like of which is hardly to be found elsewhere. A shining example is "A Soldier's Confidence with God, Spiritual Colloquies of Giosue Borsi," which a most exacting critic has described as "the finest religious literature that has appeared since the Confessions of St. Augustine." It is a golden book, and if not already a classic, it is destined to be read and loved for generations. It is a spiritual diary not meant for publication, but for the comfort and strength of the writer in the trenches. It is not the work of a cloistered mystic, but of a young man of the world, poet, scholar, amateur actor, dramatic critic, commentator on Dante, darling of the salons of the gay world of Rome and Florence. His father was hostile to the church and brought up his son in that atmosphere, but, like Augustine, he had a wonderful mother whose piety finally won him to faith. He was killed in action, November 10, 1915, while leading his men. In his pocket they found a copy of Dante and a farewell letter, which thrilled all Italy. So the Colloquies came to light, like a white star to guide the souls of men, war-weary and bewildered, into the Presence. Its abject humility, its awed intimacy of fellowship with the divine, its gem-like beauty of style—bright, yet tender—make it an everlasting possession.

To Guarantee Freedom of Speech

SENATOR BORAH recently introduced into the United States senate a bill designed to guarantee freedom of speech, a free press and full liberty of assemblage. He did not expect action in the session just closed, but gave notice that he would push it in the new session. In introducing the bill he said: "The civil rights of the private citizen have of late often been challenged, and many times wholly denied. This condition has been on the increase for the last quarter of a century. More and more there has been a disregard of the great guarantees of the federal constitution so far as the rights of the private citizen are concerned. The facts in support of this judgment are at hand and overwhelming. Men in authority, officers and their agents, have made arrests without warrant, broken into private dwellings without authority, and practiced brutality toward citizens guilty of no offense. The private citizen under such conditions is practically without recourse. This practice seems to be greatly on the increase. Lawlessness in public office and in public places fattens on what it feeds upon. High and sincere regard for law, a profound respect for our constitution must begin with those who are entrusted with the execution of the law. Obedience to the law is the primal pillar upon which free institutions rest. When this spirit of obedience is broken down, law itself becomes in a sense mockery."

Striking at a Real Evil

THAT Senator Borah's bill strikes at the root of a genuine evil is being made clear by the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches which has recently issued a study of two hundred deportation cases under the title "The Deportation Cases of 1919-1920." The study was made by Constantine M. Panunzio, a Christian pastor and American citizen. His findings are in full agreement with those of Professor Chaffee of Yale and the group of famous lawyers who last winter issued a public letter condemning the overt activities of the United States Department of Justice. Innocent men and boys and even women were rounded up like cattle and herded in vile rooms without a warrant for their arrest; agents provocateur were used; charges were changed in the course of trial and a type of narrow official intolerance was used to railroad suspects through, instead of a calm administration of justice. War times gave a certain narrow minded type of citizen a large chance to make the country what his limited mind would have it be. The proposed law would have been very salutary during the steel strike.

Paying the Expenses of Christian Unity

ONE of the difficulties involved in any forward movement is the expense of propaganda. A well known modernist of the Roman Catholic church once declared that his cause would have won in the church if there had been money with which to print literature and to provide expenses for meetings. The various organizations committed to the cause of the reunion of Christendom are having the same difficulties in financing their work that every new cause confronts. It seems astonishing that only fifteen hundred dollars has been received from all the communions this year to support the World Conference on Faith and Order. Half of this money is from Episcopalians. The committee has asked for fifty thousand dollars with which to make ready for the world conference. If the whole project should fail for so paltry a sum, it would indicate a lower state of interest in the cause of union than most Christian leaders have thought to be possible. The world conference has been financed up to this point by a group of Episcopalian laymen, but they rightly hold that now their project is properly before the Christian world, it will be supported if there is any interest in it. The continuation committee represents sixteen great communions with many millions of adherents. There is an evil cynicism in the air in these post-bellum days concerning every dream of reform for the race. Let us hope that the cause of Christian union does not fall a victim to the all-devouring skepticism.

The Christward Tendency

TOKENS multiply that many of the finest minds of the day, among them former radicals, are turning to Christ as the only way out of the blind alley in which the world finds itself. Another example is Giovanni Pappini, who is recognized as one of the leading writers not only of Italy, but of Europe. Hitherto he has had a tone of mordant criticism, and his "Twilight of the Philosophies," as well as his poems and stories, have given him an undisputed place as a sceptic and iconoclast. He has been a disciple of Nietzsche, uncompromising in opinion, bitter and violent in attack upon Christianity as a gospel for weaklings. Now Pappini has found Christ—fallen in love with him, in fact—and for more than a year has been working hard at writing a story of the Master; a story not after the manner of Renan, or even Didon, but in the spirit of Erasmus or Francis of Assisi. The social questions, Pappini thinks, are never to be solved by violent revolutions, which only change the externals, but by every man undergoing in his soul that true revolution which will change the face of the world. The war taught him that all efforts of man after happiness by force or cunning fail miserably, ending in blood and tears. There is no hope but in listening to Christ. A notice of his book appeared recently in the London Daily Telegraph, and the writer adds: "His progress is not unusual among thinking men today. A renaissance of the religious spirit, the spiritual side of man, is abroad." Deep down and far back the silent mind of today seems to be turning Christward in quest of light and hope and healing.

Let Us Finish the Job

ONE of the last acts of President Wilson was to sign a repeal of an amendment to the espionage act. The amendment was one which particularly threatened the liberties of the American people. In time of war it would have been illegal to agitate for the change of the eighteenth amendment, or for any other constitutional change. It made it possible for the political party in power to suppress any kind of progressive opinion that deviated very far from the track worn by custom. The American people have made free speech a constitutional matter. The constitution was being nullified by various kinds of limiting legislation. Senator Borah recently delivered an oration in the senate defending the principle of free speech and a free press. Many who differ with the senator on other subjects will be pleased to read his trenchant words on that occasion. Thus we are undoing some of the unjust acts that were incident to a great war. There still remains some more to undo. In our prisons are a great many men who are held because of unorthodox political opinion. The foremost example of this is Eugene Debs, the socialist. If he ever was a menace to the peace of the United States, which many good men disbelieve, he is more of a menace in prison than he is outside. He has become the rallying center of emotions that are hostile to the administration. A million citizens voted for him for President last year. The sense of injustice in the minds of citizens gives him a prominence and an authority which his words would otherwise hardly command. While some of the conscientious objectors have been released from prison, others are still there. To enforce the sentences against them would be to exercise a severity unknown in countries which have kings. The new administration has an opportunity to vindicate the American principle of freedom of speech by undoing an evil of the previous administration.

Using the Jew as the Decoy

THOSE interests which are seeking to break down the Sunday laws of the nation and to use the American rest day as one of unrestricted commerce, are making the Jew the decoy. Already most states protect the legal rights of the Jew. If a Jew rests on Saturday, he is not compelled to rest on Sunday. Now the New York legislature is considering a measure which not only allows the Jew to work on Sunday, but also to open business houses on Sunday. Under this proposed law the Jewish proprietor of a moving picture house could open it on Sunday. This movie house would soon be open every day of the week, unless there was the most vigorous action upon the part of the friends of the American rest day. As a matter of fact the great body of American Jews are satisfied with the laws. They realize that they are but a small minority in the total population. The first day of the week is kept by the Jews of the liberal persuasion as a day of rest and worship, for these do not regard the question of changing the day back to the seventh day as one of importance. The Jew is only a pretext. His religious rights are not a matter of real concern to the powerful amusement corporations which hire skillful lawyers to find ways of circumventing the laws and of finally securing their repeal. The cry of "blue laws" has proved a "dud." No one is asking for any blue laws. The great majority of the members of the Christian churches ask only for a continuance of the present laws and their honest enforcement. The only exception is where the present laws still permit Sunday business. The church has her face set against all unnecessary Sunday commerce. In the moral slump following the war, when so many are weakened in their convictions, there is danger of a sad reaction in our observance of the day of rest. The church needs the reinforcement of right-thinking citizens everywhere in defeating the amusement corporations in their effort to degrade a great American institution.

The New Ruling on Beer

ATTORNEY General Palmer's new ruling on beer was made public after he retired from office. It allows, in short, the brewing and prescribing of beer for medicinal purposes. It brings a shout of exultation from the light wine and beer advocates and some hope to the whole brewing fraternity. But it is not so dangerous as it looks. In the first place there are only nine states in which the ruling applies, because all others have state enforcement laws which explicitly forbid this particular thing. Next there is the possibility of the new Attorney General nullifying the rule. The Anti-Saloon League reports that Mr. Daugherty is a bona fide, well-tried and trustworthy friend of the dry cause. Congress and the nine states can pass laws covering this leakage in the Volstead act if it really does exist, and congress is counted upon as being bone-dry. The prohibition law has put the ban of bad practice upon any large prescribing of liquor medicinally, and unless beer is prescribed in considerable quantities the boozers will not greatly rejoice. The headlines of certain papers gladden at any sign of retreat by the government in the enforcement of prohibition, but it is safe to count upon the integrity and increasing stability of the eighteenth amendment to our national constitution.

The Job Hunts the Man

EVEN with the reduction of the personnel of the navy to a peace-time basis, there is need for eighteen more chaplains. The board of personnel is having a hard-time finding the men. As these are now selected on the basis of denominational strength, it is possible to allocate responsibility. The various denominations should furnish more chaplains in the following ratio: Baptist, South, 3; Congregational, 1; Disciples, 1; Lutheran, 3; Presbyterian, South, 2; Methodist Episcopal, 2; Methodist Episcopal,

South, 2; Roman Catholic, 4. While in war-time there was a great rush for the chaplaincies, the jobs now seek the man. Probably it is a more attractive religious opportunity at the present time than during the war. The sailors are living under more normal conditions, and are not working as hard. They have more time and more inclination to give attention to religious things. The reason that young ministers are passing up the chaplaincies is that they have not properly assessed the possibilities of this service. The great majority of young men who get through the seminary are already married, or assume family responsibilities soon after graduation. These are clearly not under obligation to do anything about this situation. But there are young men who have no immediate disposition to give up their celibacy who might very well consider the opportunity of carrying the gospel to the men on the battleship. The sailor is beset with peculiar temptations. Every foreign port swarms with harpies to seek his money at the expense of his character. Many a boy has started in the navy in a spirit of wild adventure. Unless surrounded with Christian care such a boy may become a derelict. It takes a vigorous man to stand the test of a navy chaplaincy. The life on a ship is so intimate that every man's character stands clearly revealed. The churches now take an active interest in providing their best for these important positions, and it is to be hoped that the chaplaincies will all be filled at an early date.

Why Do the Chinese Starve?

IN Manchuria to the north and in Fukien to the south of the famine district in China, there is an abundance of food. There recently arrived in San Francisco a consignment of eight million eggs from south China. This started a rumor through the press of America that the China famine was practically over. As a result, there is an almost cruel let-up among the churches and charitable forces of the country in the matter of giving succor to a great people in unspeakable distress. But how, it is asked, could food be brought from China if China is starving? Why does not China feed her famine sufferers? The reason is transportation. There are other reasons, but this is the big one. China's chief material need is railroads. Railroads would do more to give homogeneity to the nation than any one other factor. The Chinese are determined to have railroads but they are also determined to keep them under government ownership and control. In this the young republic is wise, for great concessions to foreign capital to construct railroads would bring grave problems to its diplomacy. Professor Guy Sarvis, Dean of the College of Arts and Science in Nanking University, writes of his trip into the famine region as a relief officer. He left his wife and children and braved the typhus and other diseases, traveling through slush and snow and over frozen ground on foot and in a springless cart with roads a trail of ruts and bumps, that he might lend a hand. The roads, snow and discomforts of native inns, however, gave him no such pain as the necessity of selecting from among the sufferers those who alone could be fed because of lack of food enough to distribute to all. This cruel necessity compelled him to select those whose chances to live and be useful seemed to him more hopeful than the rest.

The Faith of the United Church

IF there is to be a united church, in what form, if any, shall the consensus of its faith find expression, so as to command the allegiance of all who follow Christ as Saviour and Lord? Such a question becomes every day more urgent, in answer to the twofold desire everywhere so manifest in the church of today—the desire for unity and for a re-statement of faith. Faith is more than unity, and comes before it. There can be no unity—there should be none—if the vital, dynamic, redeeming faith of Christianity is to be reduced to a minimum. It was the pressure of this problem which prompted the World Conference on Faith and Order, as the outcome of its meeting in Geneva, to put forth the following questions:

1. What degree of unity in faith will be necessary in a re-united church?
2. Is a statement of this one faith in the form of a creed necessary or desirable?
3. If so, what creed should be used? Or what other formula would be desirable?
4. What are the proper uses of a creed and of a confession of faith?

Even before these questions had been propounded at Geneva, Dr. Martin, moderator of the United Church of Scotland, had discussed the matter in two assembly addresses, on unity and a creed. There should be a creed, he held, if by a creed we mean not assent to a form of words, but consent to a way of life. Otherwise, a form of words may be constructed which any man could understand and believe, but which would demand nothing of him. It is faith, not mere belief, that counts, and the acceptance of a creed involves the will to live it. Any statement of faith, the moderator insisted, must be both credible and intelligible, and he was unable to find a single historical creed which meets those demands for the modern mind. Not that he is inconsiderate of the past, or willing to break with it. Far from it. He is ready to receive from the past all the past can give, but it cannot give us a credible or an intelligible statement of faith for today.

The creed needed for today must be an instrument not of discipline, but of comprehension; and Dr. Martin sets out to find it. Two modern creeds arrest his attention, one the famous short creed by the late Dr. Denney: "I believe in God through Jesus Christ his only Son, our Lord and Saviour." But he is not content with that creed, which, after all, is not intelligible without much explanation. Even Dr. Denney filled two closely packed pages in exposition of it. The other creed is embodied in the Service for the Ordination of Ministers in the Presbyterian Church of England; but that he finds unsatisfactory, save as a "partial and temporary" form. A sufficient creed, the moderator thinks, would be this: "I believe that through faith in Christ I am brought into communion with God." It is intelligible, and it is the acceptance of a way of life. It is short, and every Christian professing it may find the doctrines in it as the teaching of the Spirit and his own experience, guide him.

So much for Scotland. Let us turn now to a symposium of opinion in answer to the questions put forth at Geneva, as it appeared in the Modern Churchman, an Anglican journal of fine spirit and high merit. It is interesting to note how many, both laymen and clergymen, think a definite statement of faith neither necessary nor desirable, since any unity that is real must be a unity of spirit, not of words. Dean Inge, of St. Paul's, thinks it best to drop all the creeds and keep the Te Deum as the authentic voice of the common Christian faith. Hardly one of the writers will accept any of the ancient creeds as satisfactory for our time, however noble and useful in days agone. A number of very suggestive substitutes are put forth, and they always unite personal devotion to Christ with comprehensiveness of outlook and fellowship. One new formulary is as follows:

I believe that God is love; I accept Jesus Christ as my Master and Teacher; I acknowledge that it is the will of God that I should love and serve my fellow-men.

More than one writer—all of them distinguished men—insists that the Lord's prayer is the sufficient creed of Christianity, in that it expresses the faith of Jesus himself. Others object—rather strangely, it would seem—on the ground that it is not distinctively Christian, and might be repeated by a Hebrew or a Hindu, as was actually done at the opening of the Parliament of Religions in Chicago. They hold that we must have faith in Christ, as well as the faith of Christ. Two think that the so-called apostle's creed, if "edited," might serve the purpose; while others prefer a creed woven of the words of Jesus, and made a part of the devotional service of the church. If a formal confession were put forth today, they argue, it would be outgrown tomorrow, but the words of Jesus shine like stars to light the path for all the journeying generations.

Very significant is the view of Mr. Clutton-Brock, of the London Times, one of the most influential laymen of the church of England. It may be summed up after this manner. As the value of a divided church is its unity, so the value of a re-united church would be its variety. Uniformity is not needed, as it was in the early ages when the church had to differentiate itself sharply from many kinds of paganism. The trouble with modern Christianity is that its dogmas no longer express its unity of faith. They only express its diversity, in the main obsolete. No adequate statement of faith, expressing the real unity of Christian faith, as it exists, can be found in any creed now used. What is needed is a creed in terms of our own day, and that will be difficult, but not impossible, to make. With this may be joined the striking response of Mr. G. G. Coulton, author of "Christ, St. Francis and Today," as follows:

We ought to welcome to our churches all who have any religion whatever: all who believe that there is a right worth fighting for, a wrong worth fighting against, and something infinitely higher than ourselves, to which we are brought nearer by common worship. However that man's religion, or ultimate analysis, may differ from my own, if he believes that he comes nearer to God by worshipping with us, it would be unchristian in us to forbid him. . . . The policy of exclusion having utterly failed, let us try the policy of inclusion

Such discussions—tentative, suggestive, and altogether fraternal—show in which direction the Christian mind is moving. It is casting aside and leaving behind all narrowness, all bigotry, all idea that any one sect has a monopoly of truth or of devotion. In short, we are learning to exclude the spirit of exclusiveness, and we are discovering that if, hitherto, churches have been built upon unlikeness, now they are being drawn together by a re-valuation—nay, more, an application—of "a like precious faith" which is the inspiration of each and the consolation of all. The very fact that Christianity is a life promises variety of experience, expression and interpretation. No one wishes an intellectual blur, much less a "mush of concessions." But it is one life, after all, even "the eternal life in the midst of time, by the strength and under the eyes of God," as a great scholar has described it. To which we beg leave, and deem it not amiss, to add the words of Lincoln, as expressing the attitude of many both outside and inside the church. When asked why he had never united with a church, he said:

I have never united myself to any church, because I have found difficulty in giving my assent, without mental reservation, to long, complicated statements of Christian doctrine which characterize their articles of belief and confessions of faith. When any church will inscribe over its altars, as its sole qualification for membership, the Saviour's condensed statement of the substance of both law and gospel, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself, that church will I join with all my heart and all my soul.

It would seem that Lincoln's simple words and tone of voice point the way to unity for men of modern feeling where the theologians and ecclesiastics fail.

The Book and the Pocketbook

A Parable of Safed the Sage

THERE was a day when I watched the ringing of the doorbell, and hasted that I might open it; and Keturah she noticed it. And when the Bell Rang and the Expressman brought a Large Package, I was at the door, and so was Keturah.

And I essayed to slip the package into mine own room unobserved, but it profited me nothing.

And Keturah required of me an answer, saying, Hast thou been buying more books?

And I was speechless.

And she asked, Are they New Books, that look well upon the shelves, or are they Dusty and Rusty and Musty?

And I answered her not, for they were all that she had said, and then some.

And she said, Let me behold them.

And I cut the string, and opened the package.

And Keturah said, Of all the purchases which thou hast made of old and tattered books, these are verily the worst.

And I said, O, thou most lovable among women, be silent that I may entreat thee. Behold, there is in the City a Dealer whose place of business is in Strange Basements and Garrets, so that he moveth every time the rent cometh due. And I found him yesterday in a Different Place. And it was darker and more crowded than the last place, and that was more than the one before. And he is about to move as soon as he can find a place more dark and with lower rent. And my heart pitied him. And forasmuch as he is about to move, he sold me these books Very Cheap.

And Keturah said, Yea, and that is the worst of it. For had his prices been high, thou hadst looked at his books and bought one, or peradventure thou hadst bought two, it had not been so bad. But where wilt thou put these?

And I said, I think I can find room.

And she said, Yea, and will thy Second Wife dust them as I have done all these years?

And I said, I hope not. For neither do I desire a Second Wife nor yet that my books should be disturbed.

And she said, My lord, I have heard that sad tale about the old bookseller and his poverty. When an Habitually truthful Man attempteth to deceive, he should begin practice on some one other than his Wedded Wife, for thou canst not fool me. Yea, that old bookseller hath more money in the bank than thou hast, and that is very little.

And I said, O thou most gracious of all the daughters of Eve, all my life hath there been war between the Book and the Pocket Book, and the Pocket Book doth ever get the worst of it. Yet have we money for our honest debts.

And Keturah smiled, and said, There must be granted unto every man at least one little folly, and thou dost not Drink nor Swear nor Gamble; and I will be patient in the matter of the Books.

VERSE

India

SILENT amid unbroken silence deep
Of dateless years, in loneliness supreme,
She pondered patiently one mighty theme,
And let the hours, uncounted, by her creep.
The motionless Himalayas, the broad sweep
Of glacial cataracts, great Ganges' stream—
All these to her were but as things that seem,
Doomed all to pass, like phantoms viewed in sleep.
Her history? She has none—scarce a name;
The life she lived is lost in the profound
Of time, which she despised; but nothing mars
The memory which, single, gives her fame:
She dreamed eternal dreams, and from the ground
Still raised her yearning vision to the stars.

FLORENCE EARLE COATES.

Open Windows

OUT of the window a sea of green trees
Lift their soft boughs like the arms of a dancer.
They beckon and call me, "Come out in the sun!"
But I cannot answer.

I am alone with Weakness and Pain,
Sick abed and June is going,
I cannot keep her, she hurries by
With the silver-green of her garments blowing.

Men and women pass in the street
Glad of the shining sapphire weather,
But we know more of it than they,
Pain and I together.

They are the runners in the sun,
Breathless and blinded by the race,
But we are watchers in the shade,
Who speak with Wonder face to face.

Prayer

CONQUERING LOVE, that rose to lift
The gloom from Calvary's day,
Rise still, as at His kindling glance;
Talk with us by the way!

Upborne and shielded in thy might
The enraptured fishers came
To the gray realms of Cæsar's pride,
And set dull hearts aflame.

Storm-shadowed, down the wayward years,
Thy glories fade and shine;
Old spells dissolve; new battles rage
On Faith's advancing line.

Thy power abides. Give us to learn
The magic of thy name;
Touch the gray world of smoke and steel,
And set all hearts aflame!

HELENA GAVIN.

Resurgam

I shall arise
From the dark, damp mould, from the silence of the tomb.
But who shall say in what immortal guise?
Some essence in the heliotrope? Some shade
Of color in the tulip? A new note
Of ecstasy in a small woodland throat?
A shaft of sunlight in a darkened room?
Or a young spirit fittingly arrayed
For the court of Heaven? Who can dare to say? . . .
I shall arise. And in His chosen way.

The Minister's Professional Mind

By Joseph Ernest McAfee

WHEN a certain small boy was asked which of two girl acquaintances he fancied the more, he replied, after some cogitation, that the one he liked better to speak to as he passed by, and the other he liked better to play with. The American public is happily not forced to such a choice in relations with its professional leaders of religion. By and large, and on the whole, they are admirable both to grace the ceremony of the great occasion, and to liven the familiar associations of daily contacts. No large society in the world is thus so highly favored as is ours. The ministers of religion in the United States are the most genial and likable human beings who are committed to the religious office, and have not lost the dignity which Americans, at least, would choose to have them preserve.

In many lands, on this continent as on others, the professional religionist is cordially despised by an increasing proportion of the populace. His aloofness from the common life is elemental, physical, personal, institutional, inherent in the official religious program. A tendency in the same direction in America has been often noted, but nowhere, except among groups of aliens perpetuating antipathies bodily transported into our society, has an extreme been reached. The increasing prevalence of the professional dress among ministers is perhaps contributing to this tendency. But a high collar and a closed waistcoat do not disbar even the relatively few who affect them for daily wear, from the breezy comradery which most Americans still conceive to be the chief charm of our society.

In the Academe of political and social philosophy, which is in perpetual session in the Pullman smoking-room, the minister of religion is almost universally welcomed, and his contribution to the discussion often gains general acclaim. The typical American Maecenas, making up his shooting party for the Canadian wilds, or on his outing to the fishing coasts of Florida or Texas, scarcely feels the personnel and equipment complete without a parson in the group. And the parson is usually not the least game in the sport, while as a story teller in the circle around the camp fire—well, that is what he is taken along for, and the fact that he remains of the party year after year is conclusive evidence that he makes good.

PROFESSIONAL MODES OF THINKING

To many Americans who know the minister of religion in daily and familiar relations, and who find him charmingly alert and adaptable, the deepening complaint of the artificiality and remoteness of religion from the common life is meaningless, and often cordially resented. Our discussion makes every recognition of this point of view. The writer shares the general admiration of the multitude of ministers who grace and enliven the social life of America. Few laymen enjoy so wide, so confidential, and so highly valued personal acquaintance as does he with ministers of numerous faiths and ecclesiastical connections. This very intimacy has revealed what he is bold and serious enough to style, as in the heading of this article, the menace of the thinking among professional ministers of religion.

This verdict is based, of course, upon the mental attitude of ministers of the free churches, the typical expression of American religious life. The causes which have, in other lands, led to the aloofness of popular society from the religious professional, operate in the United States quite as definitively, where the same hierarchic systems are concerned, or, rather, they would operate to the same effect, if the same hierarchies were so definitely in control. The fact is, of course, that official religion never assumes the arbitrary, dogmatic expression in America which even the same ecclesiastical systems affect in lands where religious traditions are not so liberal, and where religious freedom has not been so securely guaranteed under the common law.

No analysis of the professional religious mind in America is true to the facts which does not take the genial, companionable, free church ecclesiastic as the norm. He sets the pace for all, and establishes standards of thinking and conduct to which all ecclesiastics more or less fully conform. If one doubts this, only let him move about a bit in lands where the so called catholic systems prevail without appreciable opposition, and compare the clergy of those lands with the clergy of the same system in the United States. The free churches of America force a tone and character upon the officialism of the hierarchic bodies which is far from characteristic in regions where freedom in religion does not prevail.

DEMOCRACY AND THE MINISTER

It is of the first importance that our American democracy should realize what it has to reckon with in the mental content and attitude of its typical and dominant religious professional. The ideals and spirit of democracy are more to the purpose even than its forms and laws. The character and spirit of our schools determine the democratic temper of the young. Not less do the cultural influences exerted through the institutions of religion have a determining effect upon the character of our democracy.

In the degree in which the churches have influence, in that degree and in those terms are the cultural aims of the ministers to be socially appraised. For our law courts are not more absolutely dominated by the professional men of law than are the institutions of religion controlled by the clergy. In neither is the lay voice or attitude more than a passing incident, to be noted and benevolently commented upon on occasions, but to be treated with the unaffected and unruffled complacency of superior and unimpeachable professional authority.

Each calling cultivates its own peculiarities, and gives its own twist to thinking upon the common social interests. The financier thinks of everything in the terms of money—unless he has cultivated the compartment mind, and has successfully fended against the mixture of the contents of the several compartments. The successful organization of such minds is far more rare than is often supposed. Never does a mental compartment prove absolutely thought-tight. The financier takes his religion, and his learning, and his art, with a taint of finance, even the most resistant. The politician is always a politician, though he may serve as vestryman of his church, or play Santa Claus at the holiday fete of his Elks' lodge.

RESTRICTIONS OF VOCATION

The professional religionist is always any everywhere himself. He may lay off his preacher coat when an undignified task is required of him, and may even relieve his temper in highly appropriate language when he fozzles on the golf links, but he carries his mind with him all the time and everywhere, and when he does any thinking at all it is with that self-same mind. One should neither overlook this inevitable fact nor censure any one for it, when one contemplates the menacing effects of the ministerial mind. The minister, as a professional, should be expected to be no more and no less successful than any other professional, in throwing off the restrictions of his vocation. Some ministers who preach a rigid, authoritarian theology, vote the democratic political ticket, and are, or at least think they are, committed to a thoroughly democratic civil program, just as some bankers are political liberals. But such cases are exceptional. The conservative is usually everywhere conservative, and of course has the same right to be what he is in one department of thought as in any other. The true liberal is likely to be liberal all around.

But this pertinent consideration still does not meet our issue in the case of the minister of conventional religion. His professionalism is unique even among professionals.

The issue is set forth in the following quotation. This is one of the least glaring displays of the professional temper which could be chosen. The writer quoted is one of the most liberal minds in the whole ministerial order. In years gone by, he has more than once been threatened with trial for heresy in the communion of which he is a member. Only those esteemed too liberal in thought are thus threatened; the extreme conservative is never officially called to book. As a teacher in a theological school this minister has affectionately attached to himself generations of students now in active religious leadership. None who knows him personally can fail to love him. The sentiment expressed is the farthest from being that of an extreme conservative. This is what he says in a brief essay recently published:

In our time there has arisen an earnest desire to do away with all artificial and false distinctions between the sacred and the secular, and to recognize all activities, if carried on in a Christian spirit, as religious. Honesty, fidelity, diligence in our daily tasks can be as truly religious as prayer and daily meditation upon divine truths.

"Honest toil is holy service; faithful work is praise and prayer."

Such a conception has led naturally to the question whether in entering upon any occupation one may not consider himself called of God to that particular way of serving him. May not a man be called to be a physician, an engineer, a merchant, as well as a minister? The possibility of it is beyond question. How many men, e. g., have entered upon the study of medicine in order as physicians to serve God in far-away lands! More than one man has honestly gained a fortune of which he has considered himself God's steward. The mere fact, however, of being in any occupation is no guarantee that one has been called of God thereto. That can be inferred only from the Christian spirit that attends all its activities.

The difference between the ministry and other occupations in this respect is just the difference between "must" and "may." A minister must be called of God if he be genuine. He is engaged in a spiritual office. His real efficiency depends upon the presence and power of the Holy Spirit. His very right to think of this exalted work must have its origin in a personal relation to God and an earnest desire to bring God to the needs of men. Wholly and devotedly he must give himself to this. No divided service will do. He is primarily God's man in the community. As the lawyer must know law, or the physician medicine, so must he know the realities of the spiritual life and help others to realize them.

It is this single spirit-inspired ambition that the call of God to the ministry is meant to insure.

The logical hiatus between the first and second paragraphs on the one part and the third paragraph on the other, is, of course, entirely unconscious. That a mind can be unconscious of the hiatus is the menace. That in the face of the premises laid down such a conclusion can be reached shows how deeply inground is the guild spirit, and how essential "divine right" sanctions are esteemed by the profession. Such claims, in the end, endanger the whole fabric of social institutions which a consistent democracy seeks to erect and to keep efficiently functioning.

MONOPOLIZING SPIRITUAL SCIENCE

To assume that there is a science of the "spiritual life" which any group of individuals, any organized profession, can master, is to rob religion of one of its most potent ministries in a democracy. The ministerial guild would itself, for the purposes of less ex parte claims, be the foremost to repudiate the claim that "the spiritual realities" can be reduced to a science comparable to those which the physician and the lawyer must master to be capable in their professions. This is implied in the very quotation above. The minister has the same right to build a barrier around his profession, shut himself in and shut the unelect out, as have the physician and lawyer in their professions, but it must never be forgotten that comparisons of the ministry with other vocations are illegitimate, a sort of lese majeste. Thus, in a very literal sense, the ministry is incomparable.

The slavish use of these ancient scriptures as the body and soul of religious realities today, is, indeed, of a piece with the mental aberrations which afflict our official religious leadership. The homiletic method in all but universal use is of itself demonstration that our religious leadership is hopeless for the purposes of an advancing democracy. Its bondage to antiquity, ages charged and surcharged with ideals of human relationships and with interpretations of the facts of nature which our modern science and democracy have thoroughly repudiated—its fundamental conceptions are so far out of harmony with our present world that every thought and every human relationship is more or less vitiated.

Yet hosts of the laity respond with confidence to this leadership, and sometimes outdo their preceptors in their devotion to magic and old-age ideals. Not unnaturally.

Such devotion is largely confined to persons, for one reason or another, unconcerned or out of touch with the ideas and ideals which inform current science and social philosophy. They are in large numbers in those vocations where routine absorbs the mind so profoundly as to preclude three consecutive independent thoughts devoted to religion between Sundays. On Sundays these lay people have all their lives been attending upon preaching services and Sunday schools where these socially enervating doctrines have been the sum and substance of instruction. The mental twist of childhood has never been corrected by independent thought, or by contact with the vital thought tendencies of our civilization. Their thinking apparatus has atrophied, and such religious instruction as they have gained in later life has usually delivered indiscriminate and wholesale attack upon "modern science," when it has deigned at all to refer to its discoveries.

MR. BRYAN ON MODERN SCIENCE

Mr. Bryan some time since joined the prophethood of this ancient-current religious order. On the Chautauqua circuit of last summer, and on many more important occasions, he has attacked the doctrine of the inception and development of human life which is now accepted as the truism of every class-room of the departments of biology and of history and of sociology and of political science in every standard college and university in the land. He even resorted to that puerile challenge of calling upon any who desires to claim his monkey ancestry, while the speaker protests for himself a more exalted progeniture. By this bromidic banality he contrived to stir the risibles of many stagnated minds to a show of mirth.

This performance has called forth protest from certain religious circles, but where one has publicly protested a thousand ministers of religion have applauded, and Mr. Bryan's stock as a religious leader has risen very perceptibly during the period when he has been posing as a biological Hercules, reducing the whole structure of modern scientific thought to powder in the assumed interests of religion.

He recently delivered this address before a university audience, made up largely of students come immediately from class-rooms where the principles he so scornfully swept aside are the pabulum of daily and hourly mental consumption. Their answering scorn for a religious leader of such incapacity, and for the system of religious leadership which applauds and thrusts such spokesmen forward, was exceedingly disconcerting to at least one minister of religion who had been laboring with yearning heart and intellectual discernment to interpret "the spiritual realities" in their true relationships and implications among these same youth. His moan of disappointment recently published in The Christian Century is a real contribution to current religious literature.

THINNING RANKS OF THE MINISTRY

Recruits for our conventional religious leadership are of course not coming in proportionate numbers from the standard colleges and universities. None understands this more clearly than do denominational propagandists themselves. For long the foremost argument advanced by those seeking to build and maintain denominational colleges has been the hopelessness of expecting recruits from the public or other standard schools to fill the thinning ranks of the ministry. In the case of certain denominations the percentage of the present ministry released from the protected and censored instruction of the denominational schools is not fifteen or even ten.

If, indeed, the ministry is educated at all, according to accepted standards. Even denominations long boastful of their devotion to education and an educated ministry have, for a generation, been so largely recruiting with uneducated men, or those who have taken on a superficial "Bible-training-school" veneer, that the leadership of considerable areas now includes no ministers who have pursued the full college or university course, nor that of a standard theological seminary.

Thus a process of spiritual in-breeding has been going forward, which has now reached a stage and is producing results alarming even to those who have fostered it. The scant enrollment in theological seminaries has sent a wave of consternation through practically all of the denominations. And those who do attend the seminaries are so largely of the ill-prepared type referred to above as to deepen the general anxiety. These students, when they enter from college standing at all, come in large majority from institutions sheltered by the denominational financial program and its theological censorship. They emerge from this protracted incubation of both preparatory school and seminary, either to share permanently the rigid mental attitude of current religious officialism, or, after the inevitable unprotected contact with social realities, to rebel with the violence of a Bouck White and an Arturo Giovannitti, or, yet again, to withdraw less ostentatiously into other callings.

THE MILLENARIAN REVIVAL

One of the foremost ministers of the Protestant group now declares in print that during a recent brief period twenty-five thousand men have withdrawn from the already depleted ministry to pursue other callings. The disturbed economic conditions following the war are usually held responsible for this exodus, and campaigners for increased ministerial salaries make great capital of the phenomenon. But acquaintance with these deserters sufficiently intimate to understand their mental and spiritual estate will point the unprejudiced investigator to different and even more moving causes. The war has inaugurated a new day in the world of thought, has revealed new spiritual realities, as well as thrown the old economic order topsy-turvy. Ministers in large numbers have had these realities forced upon them, and their loyalty to truth compels many appropriately to respond. Desertion from the bound and enervating conventional religious ministry is their inevitable response.

Space here admits of no more than a passing reference to the immensely significant revival of millenarianism, one of the phenomena of the spiritual upheaval through which we have been passing. These millenarians are not a freak of the current religious nature. They are its ripened fruitage. Their program is but the product of the rigid application of logic to the doctrines on which the ministry generally bases its own call, and the sanctions of their churches as "divine" institutions, in some unique sense not shared by other institutions of human welfare.

The millenarian propagandists were at a certain period of the war so confident in the assurance they extracted from scripture, that the Kaiser and his hosts would win and dominate the earth for a season, that they were involved in toils with the authorities administering the espionage laws. A few even went to jail, and others softened their voices while they taught the alleged seditious doctrines, under warning from the federal department of justice.

Such incidents have scarcely more significance than their contribution to the humor of a period which was tragically lacking in humorous features. Furthermore, no discerning scientist and no true democrat will countenance such treatment even of such so-far-deluded misleaders.

But the millenarian revival ran deeper than these ludicrous incidents revealed. It has not spent its force yet, by any means. The Kaiser has not triumphed, but the doctrine which was so certainly to enthrone him as the Anti-Christ has not been exploded. A new interpretation of that scripture has been found, and the doctrine is almost as sound as ever. The millenarian dogmas are fundamentally anti-scientific, and not less thoroughly anti-democratic. And they are, as already intimated, only the bolder deductions from the thesis on which the most of our official leaders base their "call."

A few Sundays ago a minister in a center of culture on the Atlantic seaboard, who is far from classifying himself among the millenarian extremists, declared in his weekly sermon, and entirely in line with the tendencies of his whole preaching, that democracy is but a grotesque and blundering human experiment, that it has notoriously and irretrievably failed, and that the only hope for human society is the recognition of the divine "autocracy," and in the whole moral order the absolute "dictatorship" of Jesus Christ. The spiritual discernment of one who assumes to be acquainted with the teachings and spirit of Jesus Christ, and can adopt such a term in reference to him, is not to the present point, though a passing exclamation is not entirely impertinent.

HOSTILE POINTS OF VIEW

The present point is that about two hundred thousand officially designated, officially accepted, officially sworn religious leaders in our land are living in an intellectual atmosphere essentially hostile to the dearest and most seasoned conceptions of democratic society, and every week in as many pulpits the "spiritual realities" are being interpreted to the rank and file of American citizenship by those breathing this atmosphere. Their thought is diverging sharply from the intellectual life to which our civilization must look for its guidance in the development and realization of democratic ideals. Hopes are here at stake which we most devoutly cherish on our own account, and which a much-distraught and bewildered world entertains through our social leadership. The more influential press, and university and college circles where the search for truth is sincere and untrammelled, find fundamental fellowship with official religion increasingly impossible. Official religious leadership is itself disposed to widen the breach when the effort will not react with too damaging effect in the public esteem.

The issue is not the clash between religious dogma on the one part, and scientific dogma on the other, which so greatly entertained the past generation, and of which the present generation is so thoroughly wearied. Nor is the controversy between "revealed religion" and rationalism. For our official religious leaders have no thanks for the pragmatists whose service was finally demanded to effect the discomfiture of the rationalists. It is the irrepressible conflict between magic and the scientific spirit, between dogma and the dispassionate, unafraid search for truth. In this issue religion has a stake as truly as, and not different from that of every other human interest. For it is writ into the charter of religion as of all science, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

ATROPHY OF DEMOCRATIC ORGANS

The present situation involves a menace not of a boldly positive and openly destructive character. The loss is rather negative. It need not be feared, even by the most ardent sleuth armed with espionage acts, that our ministers of religion will break out in sedition and treason, that they will organize a propaganda directly to undo the all-too-meager achievements of our bewildered democracy. As already remarked, ministers are happily inconsistent. Their religious doctrines are not permitted too violently to conflict with the amenities of their social relations. The virus they admit into their own thought processes, and which they instill through their homiletic and other instructions among the laity, is not permitted to break forth in violent eruption—or irruption. But its debilitating influence is nevertheless felt through all our social organism.

It operates like a paralysis. Important organs and functions of the body social are atrophied, deadened for the purposes of democracy, until they not only do not furnish motor energy, but add their inert matter to the load which active democratic organs must carry.

If it might be assumed that our civilization is normally under the driving power of a three-cylinder motor, corresponding to our social trichotomy, one of the three may be said to have gone dead, and the other two must not alone carry the whole draft, but the dead weight which the useless portion of the motor imposes. The ratio is indeed too scant. Religion must normally furnish much more than a third of the driving power of a full and true democracy. Ideals and impulses of the higher life must more and more dominate a society which aspires to the goals towards which our civilization has been directed. It may be nearer the truth to say that half the normal power is lacking. It is no wonder the motor wheezes and coughs, plunges violently now and again stops short. An essentially undemocratic religious order is not only not contributing power for progress in the right direction, but is clogging the progress of the other parts.

If the situation were hopeless there would be no point in calling attention to it. An unavoidable evil is not alarming; it is only to be accepted. Because this menace is no longer unavoidable, a discussion like this is worth while.

A crisis in our religious affairs is now rapidly advancing. The past two or three decades have witnessed the steady decline of recruits for an educated ministry, the not less steady influx of intellectual deficient into the ranks of official religious leadership, the steady desertion of ministers to other callings, accelerated in very recent times to something like a stampede, and the now almost complete alienation of the best brains and scientific enthusiasm of youth trained in the standard colleges and universities. All these causes cannot fail to precipitate a crisis which will issue either in the transfer of the vital religious purposes and energies of our civilization to social agencies other than those dominated by religious officialism, or else in revolutionary changes in the official religious order. The former has already far advanced, and the transfer will soon be complete for all the practical purposes of social progress, unless the latter very speedily transpires. It must be agreed that there is less positive hope of a thorough renovation of the existing ecclesiastical order than of the general acceptance of other religious leadership, but perhaps a stampede of both lay and ministerial intellectual and social forces away from the official ecclesiastical system will have an effect not now apparently reasonably to be expected.

The rise of a new religious leadership, personal and institutional, outside of the ecclesiastical order, is one of the most fascinating phenomena of the times. But that is another story, and happily one much more entertaining than can be a ground-clearing discussion like this one. Those who appreciate the enormous significance of the religious impulses in the issues of our American democracy, may well find new courage in the very breakdown of a religious system so patently dominated by undemocratic, unscientific, often magic-inspired intellectual officialism. The leadership soon to prevail will discern the "spiritual realities" through processes which a wholesome scientific temper and a whole-hearted passion for democracy will inspire.

The Parable of the Father

By John Andrew Holmes

AMONG the student members of the congregation of the First Church in Lincoln there was at one time a young man named Paul Harrison. He is now a missionary physician in Arabia, and not a great while ago I was told of a remarkable incident of his ministry there. So impressed was I by what I heard that afterward in a dream I heard Jesus speaking of Dr. Harrison in what he called the Parable of the True Father. While I cannot recall the perfect words he used, I feel constrained to report as best I may their substance, as follows:

"And Jesus said, Call no man your father on the earth; for one is your Father, even he who is in heaven. But a certain lawyer said unto him, That I have a father on earth I know, and why sayest thou that our father is in heaven? And Jesus made answer and said unto him, A certain man brought his son to a physician, who had come from a far country. And there was water on the child's brain, so that he was deprived of the power of thought, and the man entreated the physician earnestly, that he should heal him. And the physician answered, There is but one chance that I may be able to help thy son. I will take a vein from a living body, and place it in the child's throat, that thus the water may be drained from his brain, and he become well again. And the father said, Let it be done even as thou sayest. And the physician said, Give me a vein from thine own arm, that I may heal thy son. But the father drew back, and said, What? Wouldst thou cut into my living flesh? Rather, let my child die. Then the physician, moved with compassion, took his knife in his right hand, and cut open his own left arm, and removed a vein a third part of a cubit in length, and bound it, according to the manner of surgeons, in the throat of the child, that he might live. Which of these two, thinkest thou, proved father unto him that was suffering from disease? And he answered, He that showed mercy on him, and sacrificed even of his own body for his necessity. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Thou hast spoken truly. As the body is more than the raiment, so the spirit is more than the body. And even so doth the Father in heaven love his children."

AND God said, Let there be light, and there was light; but the Commonwealth Edison Company raised its price—and the lights went out.

And God said, Let man have dominion over the fish and the fowl and the cattle; but Armour and Swift and Nelson Morris put the fish and the fowl and the cattle in cans, and doubled the price—and man went hungry.

And God said to man, I have given you every tree; but the Lumber Trust bought 'em up, and agreed with the contractors to stop building operations—and half the world were homeless.

And God saw everything that he had made, and said, behold it is very good. Yes, said the Commonwealth Edison Company and Armour and the Lumber Trust, very good—for us!

Contradictions

MEN tell me that God is to be worshiped in houses made with hands, but the trees point me to the open sky. Men say that God is a god of vengeance, but if that is true the roses and lilies bear false witness. Men tell me that God loves the righteous and hates sinners, but the sunshine refutes their statement. Men tell me that salvation can be attained in a day, but an oak that has been saving its soul for several centuries speaks more convincingly than they. Men tell me that God made His world, then rested, but my garden declares that He is still working. Men say that earth is a vale of tears, but a warbler under my window tells me they lie!

Unorthodox Sins and Sinners

By Ervin Moore Miller

AMOS tells his people: "For I know how manifold are your transgressions, and how mighty are your sins—ye that afflict the just, that take a bribe, and turn aside the needy in the gate from their right." And Micah says: "Woe unto them that devise iniquity upon their beds; when the morning is light they practice it, because it is in the power of their hand. And they covet fields and seize them; and houses, and take them away; and they oppress a man and his house," . . . "And are there yet treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked, and scant measure that is abominable? Shall I be pure with wicked balances, and with a bag of deceitful weights?"

These men are preaching about the unorthodox sinners of their day. Their people had developed a new civilization, which brought far-reaching changes in their mode of life and labor. These new fields of labor opened new opportunities for the greedy to invent and play new games of exploitation and trickery. These new practices became the unorthodox sins which the prophets tried to call attention to in order to make them recognized as worthy of a place on the list of sins that were counted orthodox. The prophets were able to recognize sin no matter how often it changed its clothes. "Shall I be pure with wicked balances, and with a bag of deceitful weights?" In other words, is it not just as bad to steal with these new fangled contrivances as it used to be and still is to steal a neighbor's sheep, or his ox, or ass? Doubtless many a man in those days thought the wealth that came to him through these new devices was an active evidence of God's special favor. It may be that many modern men have developed huge fortunes and thanked God for their prosperity when they should have given all of their praise to the devil.

GOD SICK WITH ORTHODOX PIETY

The manipulators of the traditional religious system of Israel demanded burnt sacrifices and offerings. But the prophets of God demanded righteousness as the will of God. They said God was sick of their everlasting offerings and smell-producing sacrifices. Thus it was that the prophets themselves were looked upon as unorthodox preachers of religion because they sought to have new sins recognized as orthodox.

According to the popular interpretation of the religion of today, the orthodox sins are refusal to believe certain ancient doctrines, which the church has long held to be true; and the performance of certain acts which the church holds to be unworthy of Christian men. To many people of religious faith today no record of a life of unimpeachable Christian character is satisfactory as a religious life unless it believes what orthodoxy demands of her children. On the other hand many a person who believes what orthodoxy demands may get away with a life the character of which is far from unimpeachable.

The orthodox sins are unbelief, robbery, murder, stealing, card-playing, dancing, gambling and theater-going, and others more or less familiar to us all. The call of Jesus has long been presented in an individual turning away from these sins. And many a person has been assured that he left all of his sins behind him when he accepted the doctrines without question, and left off swearing, dancing, card-playing, and going to the show.

The unorthodox sinner may be neither a wife-killer, nor baby-beater; he may not be a gambler, dancer or hold-up man, but he may be, and usually is a genuine sinner. He may satisfy all the requirements of keeping himself unspotted from the world so far as his relations to the orthodox sins are concerned, and still be a wretched sinner in the sight of God and in the judgment of common sense.

THE LIST OF SINS

It is not true that all unorthodox sinners are in the churches or affiliated with religious activities. But it is true that there are many in high places of influence in our churches. They believe what the church requires and gain respectability by not committing orthodox sins, therefore society sees in them what the churches regard as a high type of Christian character. But whether the unorthodox sinner is or is not within the church, society must come to recognize his sins as orthodox if we are ever to be safe and saved. Society and the church together must make the list of sins long enough, and the character of sin such, that all forms of unrighteousness and iniquity will be included.

A man may live in his community as an active and influential member of his church. He may have one wife and a few children. He may love his wife and be a good husband to her, and a faithful father to his children. He may, being wealthy, give generously to the upbuilding of the church and other worthy objects. Thus he may come to be known as a leading Christian citizen.

But suppose this man should be the president of a manufacturing company. A company, let us say, that makes products of which the raw material is lumber. He would not steal your pocketbook under any circumstances, but when it came to measuring lumber for his factory he might rob you of a thousand feet of lumber and never bat an eye. To steal your purse would be a raw orthodox sin. To steal your lumber with a scale rule would not be.

NEW TIMES, NEW TRICKS

Moreover, the building in which his business is housed might be fearfully unsanitary, and unsafe for his employees. Hours might be long and wages as low as possible. The organization of his business is for money and not for men. Money he must and will make even though he does it by unmaking men. It is not an orthodox sin to sap the life strength of the men who work for him and cause their wives and children to go through the hell of poverty and ignorance in order to live at all. It is not an orthodox sin to evade the laws of sanitation and safety in his factory, but it may be worse for his employees than the influence of some orthodox sinners is.

New times bring new tricks and the opportunities for performing them. The present organization of society is especially well adapted for this kind of sinning. The stream of life flows through such a complexity of impersonal things that it is extremely easy to manipulate society for selfish purposes, and, ignore the personal elements involved. It is easy to sit in an office and develop schemes for skinning the public, soaking customers, or beating labor, and never think that "the public," "customers," and "labor" are all made up of individuals like oneself with rights and privileges; and forget that life and happiness are just as dear to them as it is to anyone. It is equally easy to carry out the schemes and never come into personal contact with any of the victims. The blood of the victims is spilled, but thanks to progress one doesn't have to get it on his hands as Macbeth did.

There are a host of these unorthodox sinners. They include the owners of firetrap buildings, or disease-breeding tenements, of dangerous places of business where life is lost by preventable accidents, owners of unsafe means of transportation, and the like. They are the promoters of dishonest schemes for robbing the public under the pretense of honest business. They are the quacks who deal out dope to unsuspecting and ignorant people. They are those who corrupt our courts and legislators for the sake of satisfying their lust and greed.

SIN IS SIN

Imagine the church harboring these wicked ones as foremost citizens of the kingdom of God, and looking with suspicion upon young people who play cards and go to the theater. See society honoring them with places of public trust and proudly pointing to them as the "leading citizens" of the land. "Leading" they certainly are but where they lead us if we let them God only knows.

It is time for the church to add a long new list to its roll of sins. Those that are now unorthodox must become orthodox. Wrong doing must be reckoned as sin regardless of the means of operation. Someone has said of a certain scientist that he created an atmosphere in which falsehood could not exist. The church must create an atmosphere that will be hot and uncomfortable for every form of unrighteousness. By doing this the church will help to make a public sentiment against all forms of iniquity, which will go far toward making these unorthodox sinners feel uncomfortable in their old robes of respectability. If the robe of respectability comes off there is at least a chance that they will seek to cover their nakedness with a garment of righteousness.

Let the church stop asking its candidates for membership if they have bought a ticket for heaven with the shekel of faith, and ask if they mean to line up and work like merry hell for the doing away of any sort of iniquity with which our common life is cursed. When people once get to work at this task they realize straightway how heedless it is to overeat of the sweet food of future bliss, and how unnecessary and burdensome are the thick clothes of dogmatism. When sweat starts from hard work in the cause of righteousness, the worker finds means of sustenance that the selfish know not; and the only creedal clothes he requires are those necessary to keep him in working comfort.

Ignorance, jealousy, bigotry, superstition, disease, hatred, laziness, love of power, greed, deceitfulness, and gluttony are among the sins of which the church has had all too little to say. One great benefit that will come from getting these sins put on the orthodox list will be the help thus rendered in defining for the church the things which must be removed from society before the kingdom of God can fully come.

GLARING SOCIAL UNRIGHTEOUSNESS

Just here should be mentioned another prominent unorthodox sinner—the person who is indifferent to the existence of glaring unrighteousness in society. This person may content himself by sitting peacefully in the shade of the old doctrine tree, and musing about the joys of the future life. If he thinks of the woes of this life at all it is only to thank God that he is not as other men and to wish that every man might believe as he believes and be saved hereafter. Or he may be one who covers all human wrong with the blanket of man's natural depravity and incapacity for goodness, looking away into heaven from whence he hopes for the coming of a great event, which will bring him a white robe of eternal joy, and fire enough so that the wicked will get all that is coming to them. Or he may be less theologically inclined and simply sit still on the cushion of comfort. Or he may be one who is engrossed in the mad race for private gain or pleasure. In any case he is one who lives in a world reeking with wrong and crying aloud for readjustments in the direction of righteousness, and makes no response. Is not he who looks with disfavor upon cooperative and aggressive movements for establishing the kingdom of God quite as much a sinner as he who does not believe the creeds? Is not he who is indifferent to the injustice and suffering of this world indeed a sinner? Surely to do these things is to put off the day of the kingdom of God on earth and hinder God's only purpose. Is not he who does this wicked in the sight of God? What sort of doctrinal or ceremonial offerings shall such lives make to God to satisfy him?

Who among us can face these sins and not feel the need of repentance and greater consecration to the service of the Kingdom of God? Who of us has not added something to the iniquity of our day by ignorance, laziness, love of power, greed, or over interest in the other world? Who dares to call himself a Christian and excuse himself from service in the cause of the common good? Who can escape the condemnation due to indifference, bigotry, or private gain? Have we not all fallen short and failed to do our fullest service in the kingdom of God on earth?

Let us then be the first to confess our sins in honest repentance and thus make clear and easier the way of repentance among all men. Let our repentance be real and sins be real from which we turn away, and for which we seek forgiveness. Let us pray for prophetic insight which will enable us see the sins and sinners of our day as truly as the prophets of Israel did. Let us pray for courage to stand for righteousness in all the affairs of life, whatever the cost may be. Let us seek to put the emphasis in wrong doing on the place where the greatest evil is done even though custom has put it elsewhere. May God help us to make our religion a religion of rugged righteousness, and whole hearted service which shall, with his help, make this world his kingdom!

Steel's Answer

LAST week I gave an account of the temper in which the steel corporation and its allies answered the report of the Interchurch investigating committee. Their whole attitude toward Christian men taking any part in industrial relationships was well summed up for them by Ralph M. Easley, secretary of the Civic Federation and one of their very best servants it would seem from his part in this affair, when he says of one of the social service leaders, "In other words he intimated that the teachings of Jesus Christ should be brought into the industrial field and that the cardinal principles set down in the sermon on the mount should be injected by the church into industrial relations." There is your "fanaticism," and men who advocate it are "pink tea socialists," and "deluded and demented fanatics." You could not expect men of such viewpoint to do other than produce "a report remarkable only for its prejudice, its bias, its erroneous findings and its misleading conclusions." Was the New York World right when it said editorially: "Capital has served notice on the Protestant churches of the United States that they must keep their hands off industrial relations. It has told them, in effect, that their concern is with the life to come, not with the life here."

* * *

Acknowledging the Wrongs Though Defaming the Critics.

The significant thing in this "answer" is that the wrongs are acknowledged even in the act of defending them and of defaming the Interchurch commission for publishing them. On page 34 of the "answer" is an enumeration of the evils in the steel mill towns. It is given frankly but brought to point in an ironic suggestion that "in the minds of the reverend gentlemen" they are all due, together with the "influenza," to the refusal of Judge Gary to see Messrs Fitzpatrick, Gompers and Foster. The sarcasm was to be expected but the admission of the existence of the wrongs is a surprise. Here they are:—"long hours, low wages, bad housing conditions, military discipline, Cossack brutalities, the labor spy system." Here at least is some evidence that the writer did not expect to get by the public mind by a mere attack upon the probity and intelligence of the commission, so he adopts the gesture of fairness while making a thrust at the investigators. This at least leaves the suggestion that the evils are inescapable and that only an ignorant and prejudiced committee would condemn those involved.

The writer says he "could continue these evidences [of bad sources and ex parte prejudice] indefinitely." He could; he could exhaust the vocabulary of an unabridged dictionary if he wished to carry on in that way, because there is no limit to the language of diatribe, and he could continue to repeat his insinuations in many phrases.

* * *

Collective Bargaining

The kernel of the report is correctly diagnosed to be a criticism of the denial of representation and conference and of collective bargaining. The very first paragraph of the answer however makes a false assumption in charging that the commission refused to consider any but the A. F. of L. type of collective bargaining. This is pure assumption, made for the sake of escaping the issue and without a figment of truth in it. The commission advocated no special type of collective bargaining. With this gratuitous assumption comes the further charge that the commission advocated what Foster one time defined as the purpose of the labor union, i. e. "the overthrow of capitalism and of the wage system." The man who can make such charges must be well paid by his employers. The commission was not investigating what Mr. Foster might have said at some past time, nor would the merest tyro ever do aught but laugh at such a charge against the American Federation of Labor.

With a single exception the above is a sample of the entire answer to the demand for collective bargaining, representation and conference. That exception is that the unions cannot be legally compelled to keep a contract because they are not incorporated. The Report explicitly states that labor cannot maintain its cause in this regard until it validates its contracts. But the further fact remains that hundreds of firms are practicing collective bargaining and are pleased with it, and still more striking is the fact that the switchmen in the very yards where this strike was on refused to join their fellow workmen simply because they did have a contract and would not break it. To say Mr. Foster did not approve of this action may be telling the truth about Mr. Foster, but to insinuate that therefore the commission and all other advocates of collective bargaining do so also is unworthy of any honorable mind.

The critics now duly denounced, the author of this amazing document finally says: "Some form of employees' representation may prove to be the best possible method of promoting harmony between employer and employee, and when it is so proven, the steel industry must accept the practice or justly suffer condemnation at the hands of public opinion." He then acknowledges that three members of his own association had such plans and that "according to reports, these plans were functioning nicely." Then, on the very next page, with a sudden somersault from logic to passion, we find the following startling revelation of the military attitude of mind in steel organization: "Kerensky gave the soldiers of the Russian army a share in the control of the armies, and the deplorable conditions existing in Russia today are a result of that action." To all of this is added a labored argument against the closed shop, to which we can but say, "Physician heal thyself," for the only closed shop in steel is that conducted by the mills themselves against all union men.

Twelve Hour Day, Seven Day Week, Long Shift, and the Wage Issue.

Many pages are given over to a defense and explanation of the twelve hour day, the seven day week and the long shift of from eighteen to twenty-four hours; the commission is accused of one-sidedness, and then it is said "that if the shorter working day is right and humane, and public sentiment has undoubtedly decreed that it is; if the twelve hour day and particularly the seven day week is prejudicial to the best interests of the church, the home and the nation, as well as the individual, and I believe it is, then as soon as the labor supply of the country will permit, the twelve hour day and the seven day week must end and public condemnation will be rightfully visited upon the head of any manufacturer who refuses to adopt the shorter working day and week." Nothing more need be said, and the commission said nothing more, and as fruits meet for repentance are its abolition, the announcement noted below as coming from Judge Gary is the report's best justification. If it soothes the nerves of the writer of the document to denounce the commission for it, its members are willing, no doubt, to allow him the soothing potion.

Many pages are given over to the wage issue. The Inter-church report does not assert that the wage issue was primary to the strike but analyzes the situation to show that even with the large increases allowed during the war the annual earnings of one-third of the men are below the standard set by the War Labor Board as an existence wage and that 72 per cent were still below that set by the same board as a "minimum comfort level for families of five." Much good ink is spent in contending that the standards set by the War Labor Board were too high with the reminder that the poorest paid labor is foreign, thus intimating that American standards do not need to be maintained, and as conclusive proof it is asserted the strikers were well fed out of the union commissariat for a fraction of their regular wage. The old bromide regarding ministers salaries is also lugged in. Neither ministers nor strikers are ever well provided for as a whole, but what does that have to do with a discussion of sharing equitably the total vast earnings of steel with the men who work before the furnaces?

Steel's only logical answer is the one Judge Gary has just made in announcing the abolition of the seven day week and the long shift. Right will be done when the twelve hour day is likewise abolished and some form of representation and conference is arranged for.

British Table Talk

London, March 1, 1921.

THE livest minister and the most active church in London are Rev. H. R. L. Sheppard and St.-Martin-in-the-Fields, of which he is vicar. "Dick Sheppard" or "Dear Dick," as he is familiarly and affectionately called, is what Americans call a live wire. Son of Canon Edgar Sheppard, sub-dean of the Royal Chapels, who officiates at royal weddings, he came into direct contact with the working classes when head of Oxford House University Settlement in East London, and during the seven years he has been at St. Martin's he has started and kept going one agency after another for reaching people and making religion vital and helpful. He is at once a personal friend of the King and Queen and of the poorest people in his parish. Four services a day are held at St. Martin's. On Sundays the imposing building, on the east side of Trafalgar Square (where the copy of the Houdon statue of George Washington, the state of Virginia's gift to Great Britain, is to be erected this spring) is thronged from morning to night by between 4,000 and 6,000 people. At the afternoon People's Service half-an-hour's band music is followed by hymns, silent prayer—the vicar suggesting the petitions: e. g., national problems, for those "whose luck is out," the unemployed, girls and women who nightly walk the streets and a ten-minutes' address. The church is open all day and all night, so that any one can enter for prayer or rest at any time during the twenty-four hours; uniformed women constables are on duty at night. Throughout the week St. Martin's is the center of a ceaseless round of beneficent activity; clubs, classes, Bible study circles, social evenings for children, games, occasional dancing, and a canteen with good and cheap food and drink. The dominant note in every department and all the time is brotherliness, homeliness, simplicity, reality. Sunday collections range from £50 to £100; at a recent Sunday afternoon service £52 was collected for the unemployed. The Master of the Music is Martin Shaw, who holds a similar office at Miss Royden's services at Kensington Town Hall. St.-Martin-in-the-Fields Review, a six penny monthly, with a wide range of contributors, has a circulation of about 5,000 and pays its way. On Good Friday evening Mr. Sheppard, in conjunction with his sympathetic neighbor, Canon Adderley, holds a mission service in the Strand Theater where earlier a three-hours' service, with addresses by seven preachers, Anglican and non-conformist, will be held. Recently Mr. Sheppard called his parishioners together and invited suggestions "for making our church count more for our Lord Jesus." He gave as his reason for preferring the old familiar tunes and hymns that "we are always angling for the odd fish, and do not want them to feel strange when they come in." Thus is being shown what, given a man of consecration, courage and ideas, the church can be and do, and how keen is the need of it, how great is the opportunity, how ready the response to the right appeal. Mr. Sheppard, who is well under forty, is not satisfied with cultivating his own ecclesiastical patch, he wants the whole church to "get a move on" and is impatient for effect to be given to the recommendations of the Lambeth Conference.

"Without Parallel Or Precedent."

Mr. Sheppard and Dr. Temple, the new Bishop of Manchester, are the leading spirits of the Life and Liberty Movement, of which they are honorary secretary and president respectively. Having achieved the enabling act, the movement, whose watchword is "The church's liberty for the sake of the church's life" has opened "Chapter II" by holding a series of meetings that the Archbishop of Canterbury describes as being "without parallel or precedent not only in the history of our country, but in some respects in the history of Christendom." For five evenings in the second week in February Queen's Hall was crowded with assemblies that were throbbing with life, hope and resolution. Organized by Mr. Sheppard, the meetings had for their object the promotion of fellowship in church, nation, and world. Though the platform was mainly Anglican, the speakers included Nonconformists, labor leaders, and women. At the open meeting, when the subject was "The Call for Fellowship Between the Churches" the Archbishop of York had to confess that hitherto all efforts towards reunion had reached an impasse; "but," he quickly added, "if all roads so far have been cul de sacs, as wise men we must try to find out a new road and make a new start along it." A novel feature was the opening of the proceedings on three evenings by a "challenger" who presented a case that subsequent speakers had to answer. Thus when the appointed subject was "Fellowship in Industry," Mr. Ernest Bevin, "The Dockers' K. C.," presented the challenge from labor, demanding "Can the church show me where she has stood in an organized capacity on the side of the poor?" In his answer Rev. G. A. Studdert Kennedy ("Woodbine Willie"), whilst submitting that labor did not acknowledge as it should its debt to the church, exclaimed, "For God's sake let the church join hands with labor and together march against the curse of war!" Dr. Orchard's conclusion was that there must be a revolution—the only question was whether by church people standing beside the common people, or by the common people rising to claim their due. Miss Royden pointed out that in the 163 pages of the Lambeth report only one page is devoted to the subject of women in industry, and in that page there was hardly a single idea, though there were arresting phrases, e. g., "the newly acquired capacity of women for all kinds of work," which she would like to alter to "the newly discovered capacity of women for highly skilled work." Discussing fellowship among nations, Lord Robert Cecil said excessive nationalism was preventing the return of peace and that the League of Nations was merely an attempt to put into practice the doctrine of a universal church. Mr. Runciman, Methodist, announced that American Methodists are coming from all over the States to meet other English-speaking Methodists at a great conference at Westminster, and they are pledged to support whole-heartedly and enthusiastically a resolution in favor of the League of Nations.

Dr. Orchard Challenged.

Dr. W. E. Orchard, who has converted one of the oldest Congregational churches into a center of "Free Catholicism," is being challenged by his ministerial brethren to justify his proceedings and his utterances. He spent a week recently in retreat at the Benedictine Monastery at Buckfast Abbey, Devonshire, and says he has never had such a time in his life. "I went because my soul needed it, and I shall go again." On returning to the King's Weigh House he preached on The Catholicising of Nonconformity. As the nineteenth century saw the catholicising of the church of England, so, he said, the twentieth might equally see the catholicising of nonconformity. "The Catholic revival has been aided by the gradual discrediting of Protestantism," which "is for many the way down to an unabashed atheism; for many more, to the deceptions of pantheism. . . . Meanwhile, Catholicism has been slowly rehabilitated." If it be said that the Vatican is purely political, he retorts, "so is the Free Church Council." Courteously but firmly, Dr. Orchard is being asked to define his terms—does he mean an ideal catholicism, or Roman Catholicism? The only catholicism that counts, says Rev. H. E. Brierly, is that which "has obstructed every liberating movement, every restatement of belief, every adjustment of eternal truth to changing expression," and that has "shackled the mind and fettered the individual conscience." Particularly is Dr. Orchard pressed to explain his dictum: "It is a question either of Catholicism or atheism." Says Mr. Brierly: "The men who founded America on the principles of civic liberty based on the spiritual liberty wherewith Christ has made them free were not exactly fools. I wonder what they would say if confronted with the dilemma that they must either repudiate their personal religious liberty or confess themselves unbelievers." Dr. Orchard has an irritating way of saying too much or too little; as when during the war he preached a pacificism which, acted upon by some of his hearers, landed them in prison, while he was immune. He cannot abstain from making clear his position as a Congregational minister and his statement is awaited with much interest. Some Nonconformists say that Rome is his place, but he says this is not his judgment. Doubtless he is himself, as are many others, seriously considering whether one of the historic shrines of Independency is his place.

The Ministry Of Women

Convocation has been addressing itself to the important question of women's ministry in the church, which has been made an immediate issue by the Lambeth proposals. After much discussion the bishops of the province of Canterbury eventually decided that under conditions laid down by the bishop of the diocese it would be permissible for women duly qualified and approved by him to speak and pray in consecrated buildings, and that such ministrations should be "on occasions other than the regular and appointed services of the church, and are intended normally for congregations of women and children." York Convocation passed a similar resolution minus the last ten words. All the bishops wish to make fuller use of women's services, but they are divided as to the extent to which they should be allowed to minister in the church. Committees of the two provinces are to confer with a view to drafting regulations for carrying out the formal recognition and restoration of the Order of Deaconesses. The Bishop of London quoted from a letter which threatened secession if the Lambeth resolutions were adopted: whereupon the Bishop of Exeter protested that it would be immoral to allow their deliberations to be affected by such a threat. The Bishop of Ely (Dr. Chase) would allow deaconesses to preach occasionally at the "appointed" services. The Dean of Worcester (Dr. W. Moore Ede) points out that Miss Royden's address on marriage at the National Assembly, which represents "the whole body of the faithful," was of the nature of a sermon and was an exposition of the teaching of Christ as she saw it. The Bishop of London was in the congregation. "Church" does not in the New Testament sense of the word mean "building"; there were no churches in the sense of buildings set apart for worship when St. Paul gave regulations as to the preaching of women in church. The dean contends that if women may address the body of the faithful assembled at a Church Congress or National Assembly, the line cannot be drawn there, and that it is prejudice, not principle, that is keeping women out of church of England pulpits. A growing number of people agree with Dr. Moore Ede.

Personal

The Archbishop of York addresses the Baptist Spring Assembly on Reunion as well as the Free Church Council.—Owing to its unsuitability and the expense of maintenance, the Bishop of Chester is selling his palace and will live at the deanery.—Rev. F. Lewis Donaldson, who has been made a canon of Petersboro, once led a march of the unemployed from Leicester to London, rang the bell at Lambeth Palace, and invited the Archbishop to come out and shake hands with the men.—Rev. James Black has been invited to St. George's United Free Church, Edinburgh, where his brother, Dr. Hugh Black, now of Union Seminary, New York, was formerly colleague to Dr. Alexander Whyte, who died recently.—Dr. Jowett goes to Rome in March, and will spend some weeks in Italy before returning to England in May.—One of the most influential churches in Australia has invited to the pastorate Rev. F. C. Spurr, of Regent's Park Church, which owing to an impending crushing ground rent must find another home.—Dr. W. J. Dawson sends glowing accounts of the evangelistic campaign of Gipsy Smith, who in his judgment is the greatest living preacher, in Newark, N. J., where in two weeks 8000 cards of profession of faith or rededication have been signed.—Originally a butcher's boy, and taken by Spurgeon into the Pastor's College, Rev. W. Cuff, 45 years pastor of Shoreditch Tabernacle, has celebrated his 80th birthday; he preaches occasionally.—The 78-years' widow of Dean Farrar (author of "Life of Christ," etc.), whose faithful companion she was for 43 years, has passed away. Five of their ten children married clergymen.—Dr. W. J. Lowe becomes moderator of the General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church next June.—Rev. E. P. Lowry, for twenty-eight years senior Wesleyan Chaplain at Aldershot, and who served in South Africa during the war, has passed away at the age of 78.—To induce mothers to attend his services, Rev. J. H. Brookshank, a Baptist pastor at Leighton Buzzard, has started a crechs at the chapel and is himself helping in the nursing.

General.

"This tablet presented by American friends marks the place whence a piece of timber, given by the British Society of Friends, from the Mayflower Barn at Jordans, has been taken to be placed in Pacific Highway Association Peace Portal, located on the boundary between the United States and Canada. This gift commemorates our common ancestry and especially the peace which has lasted for more than 100 years between the United States and Great Britain. February 12, 1921." The piece of wood mentioned in this inscription has been handed over at Jordans, Buckinghamshire, where are the graves of William Penn and his family, by a representative of the British Society of Friends to representatives of the American Society of friends, including Mr. Sam Hill, who originated the idea of the great concrete road that links Canada and the United States.—Lord Desborough has introduced into Parliament a bill providing that in 1922 and all subsequent years Easter Day shall be kept and observed on the second Sunday in April and all other feasts and fasts dependent on Easter shall be kept on days ascertained by reference to this fixed Easter, except Advent Sunday, which shall remain unchanged.—Rev. G. W. Hudson Shaw states that public opinion has killed the City Churches' Commission's proposal to demolish nineteen London churches.—Appealing for 30,000 pounds for the restoration of Peterborough cathedral, the dean states that the eastern chapel is in imminent danger of collapse.—The government has promised to introduce a bill to facilitate the union of the Established and United Free (Presbyterian) Churches of Scotland. The union proposals have been accepted by large majorities in both churches, a minority contending that disestablishment should precede reunion.—The Church Missionary Society's receipts at the end of January amounted to 243,588 pounds, as compared with 308,804 pounds a year ago, the expenditure amounting to 571,226 pounds, as against 482,839 pounds a year ago.

"Practical" Endorsement

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: While I have been reading The Christian Century for some time, I have not been a subscriber, because it seemed to me that I had gone beyond the limit of my budget for periodical literature. But you are doing, in such a splendid way, what needs to be done for the Christian thinking of this age, that I want to make my endorsement of your attitude more personal and more practical by enclosing my check for a year's subscription. We shall never reach the truth we need except in an atmosphere of free discussion and catholic sympathy. It is this note in The Christian Century which grips every one who has his face turned toward the sunrise.

We Plead Guilty!

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: Many readers of The Christian Century have written to it condemning it for one thing or another. I, too, wish to join in the chorus of condemnation, but for a quite different reason. Receiving a sample copy some months ago and discovering that it is waging a valiant fight against all forms of traditionalism and obscurantism in theology, I at once got under conviction and said to myself, "Here is a journal that is not only entitled to my support, but has a right to demand it." So I condemn The Christian Century for adding to the strain on my already overburdened pocketbook. It brings to religious problems a sane, enlightened liberalism.

Through Friendly Eyes

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

SIR: The Christian Century is, I believe, the most charming example of the typographer's art my eyes have ever caressed. And what is more important, its articles are among the best of their kind now being produced. All success to your undertaking.

THE CALL OF THE ORPHAN CHILD

March has brought together three great events and three great calls and has laid them as a mighty challenge upon the hearts of every member of every church.

The Call to Personal Evangelism

For three months the Department of Evangelism has stirred our hearts and fired our souls for the lost. The results have made the angels rejoice.

Every disciple of our Lord is an evangelist.

Every other adult we meet is out of Christ.

Every day is the day of salvation.

Have you led some soul to Christ? No! Why not?

Have you made an offering toward the Department's budget of $10,000? It will be necessary if it is to continue.

The Call of Foreign Lands

March is the month for the offering in answer to the cry of the perishing in Foreign Lands. Your Department of Foreign Missions is at work in ten countries. It is sustaining 282 missionaries and 1393 native helpers in 501 stations and outstations. It is teaching in 893 schools and Bible schools, healing in 25 hospitals and dispensaries and rescuing children in eight orphanages.

The budget necessary to maintain this great work for the last six months was approximately $463,000.00. The available receipts have been approximately $338,400.00.

"Brick without straw," did you say?

The March offering supplies the straw.

Do not fail to take it.

Do not fail to send it in.

The same increase in the March offering as in other offerings this year will close the gap.

The Call of the Orphan Child

March and Easter spell bread and butter, clothes, shelter and love for the widow, the orphans and the aged of the church.

The Homes are full; scores seek admission.

The budget for the first half of the fiscal year is approximately $93,775.00.

An Easter Offering of Not Less Than $100,000

Will keep open the doors of 14 Homes,

Will maintain a daily family of 600,

Will minister during the year in love to 3,000 souls in distress.

Did You Take the Easter Offering?

No! It is not too late.

Take it now. Send it now.

The children cry for bread.

All remittances should be made payable to

The United Christian Missionary Society
1501 Locust Street St. Louis, Missouri

You will find enclosed herewith a sufficient sum to bring me the paper for the coming year. Thanking you for your kindly perseverance in keeping it before me until I "took notice," I am very cordially yours.

The Finest Art*

TO LIVE in the right relations to others—that is the finest of the fine arts. Painting is truly a fine art; to blend and apply to canvas or plaster the colors and forms is a delicate and refined business. I stood before the fresco in the Congressional Library in Washington—the fresco in the series of human interests, entitled "Religion"—a man and a woman knelt with clasped hands before a rude pile of stones whereon burned a holy fire. It is a strong picture, well done: religion—the holy flame.

Music is a fine art. Last Tuesday evening I sat with fifty people listening to one of America's best pianists, a Jewess. For more than an hour she thrilled us by her brilliant performance and interpretation. With exquisite touch, with perfect intelligence, with stirring tones she ranged through the masters and all without the use of a printed note. It was fine, gracefully done.

We will not speak here of sculptors, architects, landscape gardeners, teachers, poets and preachers as artists who work in fine fields; we want to say a word about the art of living together.

I know of a man who was invited to join a colony of select spirits. Beautiful cottages set in delightful gardens faced a marvelous landscape. He thought favorably of the project and went up to spend a few days before he would choose his lot and build his house. For three days he thought he was in heaven, and then he began to discover the petty jealousies and selfish ambitions among the "choice souls," and he left, never to return. It seemed to him only a potential "Brook Farm" experiment. With flowers, birds, hills and lakes, with charming cottages and purring cars—he came home singing, "Where every prospect pleases and only man is vile." The artists had not mastered the finest art—how to live together.

We are ready to assert that only those who keep the golden rule and who follow the spirit of the Master can dwell together profitably and happily.

Even Christians fail to dwell together when the principles of Jesus are forgotten or neglected. Recently I read the story of a community of Pious Germans which, after attaining wealth and prominence, went to pieces when the spirit of the Saviour was forgotten by certain ambitious leaders. Interesting experiments in colonization by Shakers and other sects could be freely cited to prove the same point.

Only the applied principles of Jesus can solve the problems arising from complex living conditions in rural, urban and international communities.

In the next few years we must determine how nations shall behave toward one another while occupying the same planet.

Only the golden rule can cut that Gordian knot. Emigration, commerce, ownership of land, taxation and tariffs—all these wait upon the applied principles of Jesus.

Take a moment to picture to your own satisfaction that man or that woman who has mastered the art of living among men. How gracious yet how brave, how industrious yet how calm, how sympathetic yet how just is this person!

I sat in a Bible class taught by a professor of theology within the last fortnight, and I could not help but note how all of his time and attention was absorbed by the fine shadings and meanings of the Greek words: he was a very old man, he belonged to a passing generation, for today we are concerned in the social implications of our Lord's words. The difference between "fileo" and "agapao" is interesting mental employment, but to love someone is a different matter, and to unlock the world's problems with the golden key of Love is still a greater matter. I believe it is right to live and love as Jesus did; this is the finest of fine arts.

The Malden Survey

By Walter S. Athearn

THE Interchurch World Movement gave us some valuable things, and here is one. This survey of a typical urban community, Malden, Mass., with regard to the seventeen church buildings and religious educational plants, is made and compared to the standards on the Interchurch score card. The book is abundantly illustrated with photographs and should be of large value to a community wishing to have a building program that will eventually result in an "adequate number of properly constructed and well located churches."

If Not a United Church—What?

By Peter Ainslie

THE first of a series of Handbooks presenting the proposals of a United Christendom. Dr. Ainslie, who has been a pioneer in the cause of unity, has given much thought and labor to attempting a solution of the difficulties which bar the progress of the movement. This volume deals with the necessity, growth and outlook of Christian unity, to which is added a copious appendix. The argument adduced is that if unity be not attained, the church inevitably faces an era of gradually weakening power. Dr. Ainslie writes vigorously, yet without heat or partisanship, and presents a cogent and lucid plea for the cause that must be answered.

NEWS OF THE CHRISTIAN WORLD

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance

Celebrated Rabbi on Moral Deterioration of America

Rabbi Krauskopf of Philadelphia, who is the spokesman of the liberal Jews of his city, has recently spoken some prophetic words with regard to the decline of moral ideals in America. He says: "There are times when I sincerely wish society might dismiss its ministers, turn its churches into dance halls and convert its Sunday schools into gambling-rooms, so as to have a taste of what it would mean to be completely without religion. The value of the church and the ministry to society and the state is not realized in these days when virtue is no longer in fashion and vice no longer infamous; when people talk seriously of trifles and triflingly of serious things; when they set up new commandments, that bear little likeness to the Ten Commandments of old; when, with increasing numbers, the home is no longer a sanctuary, nor marriage a sacrament; when the moral imperative has died out of the hearts of the people; when there is not enough of the salt of holiness left to keep the flesh untainted; when the school compositions on the subject, 'What Would You do With Ten Dollars?' two-thirds of the girls speak of spending it on dress and luxuries, and two-thirds of the boys on sports; and in another competition on the subject, 'What Would You Like to Be?' boys name celebrated baseball players, prize fighters and Rockefeller as their ideals."

Interchurch Finally Rid of Greenhut Building

The leasing of the Greenhut Building in New York by the Interchurch officials was violently criticised at the time since it involved a rental over a ten year period at $536,000 a year. This action was defended by the officials with the statement that the building could be subrented at any time. Nevertheless the building has not been sublet since the collapse of the movement last summer. An agreement between the officials and the Movement has finally been arrived at by which a lump sum of $750,000 has been paid and the contract voided. The business men's committee of the Interchurch is now raising funds with which to meet this amount.

Sherwood Eddy Emphasizes the Social Gospel

Mr. Sherwood Eddy is speaking in the universities of the country on the great Christian issues of the day. There is a marked change in his emphasis as compared to his speeches of a few years ago. Less of the note of personal evangelism is sounded. The evangelization of society is the major theme. On the Pacific coast some of his wealthy friends have come to fear that his political economy is no longer orthodox. Mr. Eddy is declaring everywhere that industry cannot be run on a basis of autocracy in a country where the government is democratic. The books he recommends are the most modern in the field of the application of the Christian principle to the economic and industrial questions of the day.

Disciples Working Hard on Interchurch Obligation

The Disciples are in great distress over their Interchurch underwritings. Last December a call was made on the churches which yielded only sixty thousand dollars toward the total of $600,000. The officials of the United Christian Missionary Society and of the Board of Education are now holding meetings of the pastors and leading lay people in the different states in which an effort is being made to meet the obligation. There is widespread denominational chagrin over the conspicuous financial embarrassment in which the Interchurch failure has put this communion.

Methodist Publishing Interests Have Loss

The publishing interests of Methodism suffer a great loss in the death last month of two great leaders. Dr. Charles Parkhurst was for many years the editor of Zion's Herald, where he wielded a powerful pen in behalf of righteousness. He was 76 years of age at the time of his death. Another loss is occasioned by the death of Dr. Edwin R. Graham, the senior publishing agent of the Methodist Episcopal churches. He was born in a Methodist parsonage and educated in a Methodist college. He had admirable business ability and has spent his life in the development of the Methodist Book Concern, the most successful of all the church publishing houses.

Dedicates a New Building

Third Church of Disciples, Philadelphia, recently entered into its new educational building under the leadership of Rev. T. E. Winter, the energetic and accomplished pastor who went to Philadelphia from Missouri a few years ago. On the occasion of the dedication Rev. George W. Muckley of the Board of Church Extension was present. The entire cost of the building is covered by five year pledges, a large part of which are already paid. With the completion of the new building a community program will be put into operation.

Disciple Churches of Chicago Well Supplied With Leaders

The itinerary of pastors in the large cities is even more marked than in rural districts. The average pastorate among the Disciples of Chicago is about two years, in spite of certain outstanding exceptions to this rule. There are thirty churches of the denomination in the metropolitan area, and all but two of these are now provided with pastors. Several of these churches paid off their indebtedness the past year. The immigrant work of the Chicago Disciple is largely among the Russians, and this population has been given to them by interdenominational comity for exclusive cultivation.

The Brotherhood House on West Fourteenth Street carries on a settlement work, and there is a church on Crystal Street. Two Negro churches are in a flourishing condition and one of these is rapidly accumulating funds for the erection of a new building.

Presbyterians Will Build Churches and Manses

The Presbyterians have already started on their building campaign. Dr. David G. Wylie, general secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Church Erection, announces that grants of $128,605 have been set aside to aid in the building of 28 churches and manses. A part of this money will be used for a science hall in connection with the Presbyterian Technical School at San German, Porto Rico. The building of manses is receiving special attention and the board has adopted the slogan, "A manse for every Presbyterian minister."

Church Efficiency Expert on the Road

Formerly, Rev. Albert F. McGarrah was connected with McCormick Theological Seminary, but he is now a field director of the Presbyterian New Era Movement. He is engaged at the present time in conducting a series of conferences in the principal cities of the United States. On March 11 he addressed a mass meeting of all Presbyterian churches in Louisville, Ky. On March 13 he addressed a representative meeting at First Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis.

More Members and Fewer Ministers

The annual report of the American churches for 1920, compiled by Dr. H. K. Carroll, may be summarized in this fashion: "More church members and fewer ministers." In the Reformed church conditions are particularly shocking. More men left the ministry last year than will be graduated from all three of the seminaries of the church during this coming spring. The Reformed Church Messenger states the case of the ministers leaving in these words: "I rather believe that my friends have given up their work because they are discouraged and disheartened through loneliness and lack of help. Some have lost the freshness of their vision. For them the glory of the task is dimmed; they have let go; their courage has oozed away; their stock of patience has been exhausted. They have been too much alone; they have been unsupported. And so the task seems overwhelming."

Scotch Preachers Going to the Country

In these days of unrestricted profiteering in rents, the city preacher who has no manse to live in is in a desperate situation. Hundreds of men are being crowded out of the ministry by sheer economic pressure. In Scotland the ministers are meeting the situation by leaving the city charges for the country. In the fellowship of the United Free Church alone, twenty city churches are now vacant because the ministers have become pastors of country churches. In America where so long the pulpit ability has been drawn into the city, such a tendency would not be an unmixed evil. Many a minister would find new health and a fresh grip upon reality by a country pastorate, and the churches which are furnishing the pillar members of the city churches would be built up by vigorous preaching.

Disciples Congress to Meet at Springfield.

The annual Congress of Disciples of Christ, which was postponed last year because of an over-crowded church calendar, is scheduled to be held at First Christian Church, Springfield, Ill., beginning Monday evening, May 9th, and closing Thursday evening, the 12th, with an unusually strong program. Rev. John E. Pounds, of Hiram, Ohio, is president of the congress; Wm. F. Rothenburger, Springfield, Ill., vice-president; Mr. W. E. M. Hackleman, Indianapolis, Secretary-treasurer. For all those who do not wish to make hotel reservations the Harvard plan of lodging and breakfast will be followed.

Catholics Will Have Great Cathedral in Washington

The Roman Catholics hope to make their new cathedral in Washington their greatest American church building. It will be located on a commanding spot of forty acres of ground overlooking the national capitol. Two million dollars have already been expended and when the cathedral is completed it will involve a total expenditure of twenty million dollars. The building will be five hundred feet long, and will accommodate twenty-seven thousand people in its capacious depths. Such a structure, if rightly designed, should rival many of the greatest cathedrals of Europe.

New Religions Still Being Manufactured

It is not only ancient Athens that may be considered as hospitable to new religions. Either Boston, Chicago or Los Angeles may well compete for the palm with the Athens of Paul's time. The latest manufacture in religion is in Los Angeles. A recent newspaper announcement in that city startles the reader with these words: "A New Messiah! A New Christ has been born upon the earth. Has been seen by Mrs. E. R. Drollinger, author of the New Messiah and God's Kingdom. Do not fail to hear this divinely inspired woman. She claims that the new Christ is now a little babe, and she has the honor of having discovered him. She is setting out on a tour to tell of her discovery."

Establishes Endowment for Theological Student

St. James Episcopal church of Montclair, N. J., has started an endowment fund with which to help prepare its young men for the ministry. The fund starts with a thousand dollars, but will be increased as rapidly as possible. Every denomination feels the lack of competent ministers and this church will try to keep one of its own young men in the seminary. Failing this, a young man from some adjacent parish will be chosen. The young men will be encouraged to pursue college as well as seminary studies. Those going to difficult missionary fields will be given additional credit. There are a number of churches through the country which appropriate money from their budget to aid some young man in securing a ministerial education.

Meadville Establishes Branch in Chicago

Meadville Theological Seminary is a Unitarian foundation with large endowments and scarcely any students. There are property difficulties about moving the entire institution to Chicago, but the Unitarian campaign has made it possible to erect near the University of Chicago the Meadville House. In this a Meadville professor will live and there will be dormitory facilities for twenty or thirty students. In the building will be a club-room and library which will be used not only by the theological students of the Unitarian faith, but by all Unitarian students in the university. The new structure will cost between $100,000 and $150,000.

Women Should Supersede Ministerial Tramps

Rev. Sarah A. Dixon declares that women ministers should supersede the "ministerial tramps" by whom rural pulpits are being filled all over the land. Contrary to the common impression, she states that there were as many women ministers twenty years ago as now. In her view, the common prejudice against women ministers is due to the Bible. The story of the forbidden fruit in the garden and the injunction of Paul that the women should keep silence in the church have influenced unreflective religious people to conclude that religiously women have an inferior status. Miss Dixon does not expect much from the liturgical churches but believes that in the ranks of the evangelicals women are to play a larger part in the pulpit ministrations.

In the rural churches that are served with uneducated men she believes that an educated woman would be an improvement. Miss Dixon has a doctor's degree from Boston University, having previously completed a seminary course, and she is now pastor of a community church in Hyannis, Mass. She has in these latter days affiliated with the Congregational denomination. She is one of the two hundred women ministers included in all denominations in this country.

Morale of the Ministers Is Low

Alfred W. Birks in a recent article in the Christian Register discusses the question of the loss from the ministerial ranks within the Christian denomination. In the year 1901 he was one of a class of eight which graduated from the Meadville Theological Seminary. He is the only one who has remained in the ministry, the others either going into other professions or into business. It is the impression of Mr. Birks that the matter is one of ministerial morale. On this question he says: "If our denominational officers could solve this problem of the minister's morale they could go a long way toward eliminating that other problem of a plentiful supply of ministers. It is not a question of money, nor is it a question of pensions. The young man who enrolls in a divinity school knows just what to expect along these lines. Spiritual genius cannot be lured by high salaries, nor conserved by bounteous pensions."

Universalists Extending Into New Territory

The Universalist church proposes to follow its people into new territory. Recently word came to Rev. John M. Ratcliff, pastor of the Church of the Redeemer, in Halifax, N. S., that there were many Universalists in western Canada. His church has passed a resolution requesting the Universalist Publishing House to carry advertising in the various cities in western Canada, and whenever these scattered members of the flock reply, they are to be presented with the

Chicago Y Issues Report

THE Chicago Young Men's Christian Association has recently issued a book containing the annual reports of the institution. The personnel of the institution is imposing. There are 177 full-time workers and 29 part time employed workers. Besides this there is a volunteer force of 4,154 volunteer officers, managers and committeemen. During the past year the men and boys enrolled as paid members have totaled 38,041 which is an increase of 2,474 over the previous year. The average daily attendance in the different buildings was 12,480. The dormitories have been crowded to the limit and the thirteen restaurants have served 4,308 meals per day. The attendance at the religious meetings has increased 45 per cent over the previous year. The latter feature of the work is receiving fresh emphasis as it is believed by the general secretary, L. Wilbur Messer, that after all it is the religious work of the association which is most appreciated by the general public. He likes to tell the story of James J. Hill, the railroad magnate, who was approached to support the Association. The canvasser told of the educational and social work and other features but failed to mention religion. The big railroad man said: "How does it come that you have not mentioned the first important branch of your work, religion? That is the only part that interests me. We have tried all these other things that you mention—social and recreational, etc., and they have all proven flat failures after a few months. The boys don't want books and games and eats alone, and our gym is a thousand miles long. Now if you want to push religion, I will help you."

Universalist Leader for a period of six months free of cost. The church in Halifax has appropriated two hundred dollars as the beginning of a fund for this purpose.

Voices Need of More Ritual

The evangelical churches have in most cases abandoned ritual, and the "liberal" communions have in many cases quite forsaken the two ordinances usually associated with the historic church. All of these communions are hearing a demand for the development and use of ritual in worship. Rev. John Clarence Lee, D.D., recently proposed in the meeting of Universalist ministers of Greater Boston that a book of ritual for their churches should be created. The ministers have endorsed the suggestion, and have asked the General Convention to consider the matter.

Boys' Organization Leads to Church Membership

While some forms of boys' organizations are exalting the virtues of the red Indian, there is an organization which gives the boy the tradition of chivalry, and which exalts in his mind the privilege of uniting with the church. The Knights of King Arthur is a kind of secret order for boys which has recently celebrated the twenty-eighth anniversary of its founding. Rev. William Byron Forbush, the noted boy specialist, founded the order while pastor of a Congregational church in Detroit. Fifty thousand boys have been added to the membership of the churches through the work of this organization. There are three degrees to ritual which emphasizes the best in chivalry. The last degree is open only to boys who are members of the church. The matter of church membership is interpreted to the boys in terms which they can understand.

"Lest We Forget"

The tendency of religious organizations to boast of their successes has recently been rebuked by the Catholic News. The comment is important, not only because of its plea for humility, but also as revealing the attitude of progressive Roman Catholic thought with regard to the growth of Protestantism in this country. The article says: "American Methodists claim to be increasing tremendously. They have nine million members and twenty-seven million adherents—a total of thirty-six millions. They seem to take complacency in the thought that they outnumber the Catholics of the United States, says the Catholic Transcript. Catholics of a decade or two ago had the habit of publishing their numbers—active and passive—perfect and imperfect—but it was found that this eternal beating of the big drum did not pay. It added not a single cubit to the ecclesiastical stature of the Catholic body, and it provoked envy and hatred on the part of those who fear Rome. However, if the Methodists want to glory for a while in their numbers, the happiness ought to be denied them not. Better that they should prosper, and every other Christian denomination, than that infidelity and irreligion claim a great and growing number of our citizens."

Preacher-Editor Has Time to Write a Novel

One of the busiest ministers in the United States is Rev. Burris Jenkins, pastor of Linwood Building Church of Disciples, Kansas City, who is also editor of the Kansas City Post. He has found time the past year to write a novel for which the publishers predict a great future. The book is called "Princess Salome." Lippincotts, who publish the book, say in the Publishers' Weekly: "The dramatic possibilities of the Princess Salome are very unusual and it is only a matter of time when it will be introduced into moving pictures. We will tell you more about it in later issues, but please reserve a large place in your calendar for it. Literary and religious circles will talk about this novel for many a day."

Ministers and Prize-Fighters at Cross Purposes

The ministers and the prize-fighters of the country do not see eye to eye these days. In many of the state legislatures there are bills which would once more legalize the prize fight. When it is remembered that previous to the war not a state in the union would permit a commercialized prize fight, and Johnson and Willard had to go to Cuba for their mill, it will be seen that there has been a big swing in public opinion. The American Legion is backing the prize fight bills in the various legislatures which gives strength to the movement of revolt. In Indiana the prize fight bill was killed on account of the strong leadership

A Typical Letter

The Christian Century Press,
508 S. Dearborn Street,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

You will be glad to know that our church has decided upon HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH (edited by Charles Clayton Morrison and Herbert L. Willett) as the hymnal for our use. We examined four hymnals with great care and discrimination—the best known hymnals published. We finally chose yours. We like the general appearance of the book, binding, paper; your hymnal appears to us more substantial than the others under consideration. Then, in the selection of hymns and tunes, we consider HYMNS OF THE UNITED CHURCH the superior of the other collections. Yours is the only book of the four that has ALL the hymns printed between the staves. This we regard as a great advantage. Enclosed you will find our order.

Very truly,

JOHN C. BLACKMAN.

of the Rev. W. S. Fleming of the National Reform Association. The modern-minded ministers are not opposed to boxing as an amateur sport, but to the commercialized brutality of the prize ring. Once more we have an example of how a sport that is relatively harmless in the gymnasiums of the country becomes a degraded thing when used by the commercialized amusement purveyors.

Sunday Question Is Agitated in Colorado

The state laws of Colorado now forbid the opening of theaters on Sunday. Agitation against these laws has been started by the moving picture interests. The efforts of the exhibitors has been countered by the ministers of Denver. They have passed vigorous resolutions and sent them out over the state. The legislators have heard from their constituents in no uncertain terms and it is believed that the present Sunday laws will be maintained against the assaults of the commercialized movies.

Standing Offer of a Thousand Dollars

The connection of conservative religion with discarded scientific views is no more amusingly illustrated than in the case of Rev. Glenn Voliva, the head of the Zionist movement at Zion City, Ill., and successor to John Alexander Dowie. Mr. Voliva offers a reward of a thousand dollars to anyone who will prove that the earth is round. A number of people have undertaken to claim the reward, but the triumphant Voliva always answers the proof with doubts. His doubts in the field of scientific theory are about as amusing as some of the doubts paraded by stubborn opposers of well established religious truth.

Will Take Up Survey Work Again

The collapse of the Interchurch World Movement brought to an end a great deal of investigative work before the surveys had advanced enough to be valuable. A group of laymen have formed an organization to continue this survey work in three different typical communities for the purposes of establishing certain principles and view-points in religious work. A committee composed of Dr. John R. Mott, Professor E. D. Burton and Mr. Raymond E. Fosdick will be responsible for surveys in St. Louis, a rural section in Ohio and one small city. These typical situations will be used to illustrate the problem of religion over the country. The survey in St. Louis will be directed by Rev. Frank O. Beck who was in charge of the survey in Chicago when lack of funds closed up the work.

Southern Baptists Gaining on the Population

Few denominations in the country have made a more distinct gain on population than that recorded by the southern Baptists. Though among the most exclusive of American denominations, their very intensity of loyalty has seemed to bring numerical results. The increase in membership in twenty years has been 84.1 per cent while the increase in population in their territory has been 32 per cent. Their increase in contributions to benevolences in that period has been a thousand per cent.

Evanston Minister Prints a Sermon Every Week

Mr. John C. Shaffer, editor of the Chicago Post, has asked his own pastor, Rev. Ernest F. Tittle, pastor of First Methodist church of Evanston, to supply a column of material every Saturday in the form of a sermon. The Post prints a religious editorial in each Saturday issue. This daily, without calling itself a "Christian Daily" has set for itself such excellent journalistic ideals as to leave but little for church people to ask in the way of a metropolitan daily. In the handling of crime and in the treatment of religious news a new standard is being set by the Post.

Chicago Boys' Club has Religious Features

It was once assumed by social workers that it was inexpedient if not suicidal to introduce anything like religious worship in connection with the uplift devices of the great cities. The earlier settlements were nearly all established upon a secular basis. In more recent years many settlements have introduced religious features, and these have proven to be popular and in no way a hindrance to the other activities. The Chicago Boys' Club is a unique institution, and gathers within the circle of its influence boys who would not be touched by the ordinary organizations. The president of the club is Prof. Solon C. Bronson, of Garrett Biblical Institute. The secretary, Mr. John H. Witter, is a member of the Epworth Methodist church of Chicago. The club is divided up into smaller groups according to their interests, some of them being Boy Scout troops. Every week there is a religious meeting at which the boys attend voluntarily. Opportunity is given them to take part, and many of the street urchins have come to a state of religious interest where they lead in public prayers. There are six centers for the club work, and recently club house number five was erected at a cost of $150,000, the gift of Mr. William H. Jones. It is estimated that the attendance at these various clubs is about 200,000 annually. At club house number five there are basket ball games, a carpenter shop, an art room with pyrography and brass hammering, game rooms, a reading room and a small museum.

Power of the Letter Writer

William J. Showalter, assistant editor the Geographic Magazine, has told the preachers something about bringing about reform. Resolutions passed by preachers' organization have little weight. But personal letters make every man in public life sit up and take notice. An editor who received letters from as much as one-tenth of his constituency would probably be impelled to change his policy. If the church is to count in reform, its members must be taught to write letters to the men in public office whom they desire to influence.

Lutheran Attitude Toward Union Movements

There is a definite proposal that a world conference of Lutherans be held this year on the quadricentennial of the Diet of Worms. Such a meeting would consider the attitude of the Lutherans toward the various union movements that are under consideration in the world. The official paper of American Lutheranism, called The Lutheran, doubtless expresses the majority opinion of this group at the present time. It says: "In the first place,

A Methodist Council of Cities

THE Methodist churches of Buffalo recently entertained the leading city workers of America of the Methodist denomination at the Hotel Statler. The meeting was called a Council of Cities. Dr. Harris Franklin Rall made an appeal for sermons with more of the teaching element in them, sermons that were in the better sense doctrinal. The response from the floor was very definite and positive. It may be summarized as follows: "Doctrinal, yes. Old terminology, no." The question of publicity for city churches was given special attention. It was the conviction of the council that the city organization of Methodism should also be a publicity bureau from which should go out to the public information with regard to Methodism. The community church was considered by the delegates and there was an overwhelming conviction that Methodism must found community churches without any desire for denominational aggrandizement through these organizations, but as a means of giving some communities religion which otherwise would not have it. The industrial question in the large cities as a factor in church progress was considered. Dr. D. D. Vaughan of Boston University School of Theology declared that "street and shop meetings are killing the prejudice among toilers that has caused them to shrug their shoulders, smile and ignore the message of the church." The Open Forum idea was presented by Mr. George W. Coleman of Boston, and found hospitality in the minds of the Methodist parsons. The problem of the immigrant was another topic of study. The speakers insisted that our immigrant children should be in the public schools as the only place where a true Americanism could be taught. The three day session of the Council of Cities with 250 of the leading city workers of Methodism present has made the Methodists sharply conscious of their urban responsibilities. They, like the Baptists and Disciples, have been reputed to be a rural people. This notion of Methodism is rapidly becoming out of date. There is probably no denomination in America organized as are the Methodists to face their urban responsibilities.

the time is ripe for a Lutheran pronouncement. There are vital questions that concern not only church unity, but the welfare of evangelical Christianity, on which the voice of the Lutheran church should be heard. This has been made apparent by three distinct efforts at church union—that of the General Convention of the Episcopal church, which is seeking “a concordat, between the Anglican, Eastern Orthodox and old Catholic churches”; that of the Lambeth conference for “the reunion of Christendom,” and that of the Presbyterian church for union among Protestants, which is now under fire in its own midst. In all of these the question of fellowship is made supreme, and the need of unity in the faith entirely obscured. There is no clear, evangelical pronouncement that rings true to the fundamental teachings of the Gospel. External union, not faith unity, is the goal that is set before the eye. In only the third effort has the demand for a clear and unequivocal basis of faith as a necessary prerequisite to union come to life, and by Presbyterians who are not willing to sell a rich heritage of faith for a mess of sentimental pottage. In the midst of all this vagueness and indefiniteness the Lutheran church cannot be true to its trust and remain silent. The hour has arrived to speak, and to speak not for a particular church body, but for the Lutheran church throughout the world. Fortunately, Lutherans do not need to speak through some world organization; they can speak through the organism of a great faith.”

The Tokyo Sunday School Convention

THE press reports on the World Sunday School Convention held in Tokyo revealed a wide variety of opinion. There were some of the conservative minds that were frankly disappointed. The fellowship with Buddhists displeased them. Heathen should be held tabu! The salutation given to the picture of the emperor was held by some to be idolatry. Rev. George Whiteside of Evanston, Ill., attended the convention. He does not represent radical opinion of any sort when he writes his account for the United Presbyterian. His version of the convention is very different from that of the conservative brethren already mentioned. He says:

“I have been greatly surprised at the criticisms by the editor of the Sunday School Times relative to the World’s Sabbath School convention held at Tokyo, Japan. I attended every session of the convention, so did all the members of our party, and we returned home with no other thought than that the convention was a great success. To advocate the contrary is surely a responsibility few would care to assume. During our thirteen days’ stay in Japan, after the convention we met scores of delegates who, with one exception, were delighted with the convention. One man claimed the addresses were all too conservative. He argued we were not receiving the courtesies of a people who did not believe as we did, therefore, out of deference for their opinions, the speakers should have been less dogmatic. In conversation with Dr. A. D. Little, president of the Methodist Theological Seminary at Tokyo, he expressed himself as being pleased with the convention. When asked if he considered it was run on too conservative lines, he replied, ‘No, sir!’ We would not have stood for it on any other lines.”

“Our return trip was made on the Empress of Russia. Some forty or fifty delegates were on board. The second Sabbath evening of the voyage an ‘echo meeting’ was held for the mutual benefit of all who were interested. It was by far the largest and most spirited meeting of the trip. Business men, professional men, secretaries and missionaries spoke on different topics and phases of the convention. There was not a discordant note, but a mutual agreement as to the helpfulness and power of the convention. Dr. H. T. Owens, one of the thirty-seven missionaries from Korea, writes in ‘The Korean Mission Field’: ‘Whoever could have imagined that the Sunday schools of Tokyo could have mustered a parade strength of fifteen thousand for a Sunday afternoon rally? Or that a Japanese choir could have rendered anthems such as: ‘Send out Thy Light,’ ‘Unfold Ye Portals Everlasting,’ ‘The Hallelujah Chorus,’ etc., in a manner that would have done credit to an Occidental choir? I will not elaborate,’ said he, ‘further than to say, all the addresses, both by Japanese and others, were of a high order, breathed the spirit of international friendship and yet were frank and outspoken on the pol-

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as “a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea.”

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffeine contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful.....	1.54 gr.
(hot) (5 fl. oz.)
Green tea—1 glassful.....	2.02 gr.
(cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice)
Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz.....	.61 gr.
(prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup)

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man’s use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

icies for which Christian brotherhood stands."

"In 1903, when the late Mr. H. J. Heinz conceived the idea of taking the next world's convention to Japan, he designed three things: First, to break down prejudice against Sabbath school work in the minds of the general public in all parts of Japan; second, to turn the thoughts of Japanese Christian leaders and pastors to the importance of saving childhood and young people; third, to enlist the interest of young people and give the Orient a demonstration of something of the power and influence of the institution to which they were asked to subscribe. If such a Christian gathering, he reasoned, is good for the Occident, why should it not be good for the Orient? It was a great conception. So the first great world's convention in the history of Asia was held at Tokyo, Japan, and from the character of the reports coming in from every quarter the original purpose of the convention is being wonderfully realized. While, therefore, the great Sabbath school leader rests from his labors his works follow him.

"The convention, however, did not contribute everything to Japan; Japan contributed something to the convention. We found much more than Buddhism, shrines, temples, and the Torii. First of all, they had a great organization to meet the convention and take care of all its needs. They had also a great welcome with courtesies, kindness and service unexcelled in the history of conventions. Homes were opened that never opened before to strangers or foreigners. Buddhist and Christian alike vied with each other to see who could do the greatest kindness. Many private automobiles, street car service guides, interpreters, excursions, etc., were all cheerfully furnished without money and without price. There was not the slightest intimation of bigotry, jealousy or hatred manifested on the part of one of them, no matter what his creed or caste. Their country was full of guests. They were going to be courteous and let each guest decide how far he should go.

"But, furthermore, the Christian churches of Japan presented substantial evidence of a consecrated and devoted following that might well be coveted by many more enlightened communities. At present there are more than two thousand missionaries at work in Japan, with some 208,000 church members. The people are of a teachable spirit, and the desire of both old and young to learn amounts to a veritable passion. Herein lies their hope and strength. Japan, with its churches, its schools, its Young Men's Christian Association, with its but two per cent illiteracy, and with Tokyo, the greatest student center in the world, etc., etc., it was, therefore, not so much of a compromise that was made after all in taking the convention to the "land of the rising sun." Nor need any of the delegates apologize for being there. It was not one sided by any means."

FOUR HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED GOSPELS

Being a series of character studies cast in the form of personal memoirs of John the Baptist, Andrew the Brother of Simon Peter, Judas Iscariot, and James the Brother of Jesus.

By William E. Barton, D D.

Author of "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln," "Wit and Wisdom of Saged the Sage," etc.

THESE brief "new gospels" while of course wholly imaginary in form are based on the facts found in the Gospels which have been skillfully woven into historic unity so that the setting of each story has the vividness of reality. The narratives display true dramatic instinct and the character analyses rare psychological insight. The author says in his preface: "These narratives make no pretense of antiquity. They are a modern attempt to discover what kind of side-light would have been cast upon the ministry of Jesus if four other men, beside the four who have told us of him, had written brief stories of what they saw and thought about Jesus."

Some Aspects of International Christianity

Mendenhall Lectures, Fifth Series. Delivered at DePauw University.

By JOHN KELMAN

Six lectures on the relation of Christianity to international subjects. Dr. Kelman is a keen student of Christianity and speaks out of a wide experience.

"The author's effort is a fine piece of work—in the reviewer's opinion, the best so far from his pen. It shows a finished scholarship, a trained mind and a sure touch, a glowing spirituality, a clear vision, robust common sense, all in a style that makes reading a luxury as well as satisfying.

The Sword or the Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

THE WORLD TOMORROW says of this new volume: "This book is a valuable contribution to the discussion of the Christian attitude to war, coming as it does from the experience of one who went overseas with a quite different conception. Mr. Page portrays the terrible reality of war, shows how the church now defending war has often taken the wrong side on great moral questions, and makes it clear that Jesus faced a similar situation to that of 1914. In his analysis of Jesus' teachings on the subject the author avoids the doubtful proof-text method and also steers clear of side issues as to possible uses of force, and shows how the whole spirit of that teaching is a repudiation of the way of the sword, and an enthronement of its opposite, the way of the cross. The remaining chapters discuss the practicability of that way of redeeming love and the necessity for Christians to follow Jesus in it."

Other Comments on the Book

Charles E. Jefferson, Pastor Broadway Tabernacle, N. Y.:

I like the style of your presentation, and also the noble Christian spirit that breathes through what you have written. You know that I am not able to go quite so far as you do, but I am always happy to have men who feel as you do express their convictions, for it is possible that you are right, and that the rest of us will have to come up where you are.

Peter Ainslie, Minister Christian Temple, Baltimore:

I have taken the time to go over your manuscript and find it very informing and ringing true. A book so well prepared as yours may not have the deserved circulation, but it is certainly worth putting on the market.

Miss Maude Royden, recently of the City Temple, London:

I have read your manuscript with the deepest interest and with the most complete agreement. I admire especially your insistence on the spirit as distinct from the letter, and your dismissal of the idea of non-resistance. Nearly all criticism of our position is aimed at these two points—which we do not hold!

THE EXPOSITOR'S Dictionary of Texts

Outlines, Expositions and Illustrations
of Every Major Text and Dominant
Passage of the Bible

Editors: Sir W. R. Nicoll, Lane T. Stoddart
James Moffatt, D.D.

Its Methods

Each exposition is a sermon compact and complete in itself. Each text suggests a theme by which it is headed; for instance, the exposition on "Like as a father pitieth his children," is entitled "THE GOD OF THE FRAIL"; to the exposition eight minds contribute.

Plan and Purpose

The Editors' purpose in planning THE EXPOSITOR'S DICTIONARY OF TEXTS was to compile a compendium of Scriptural insight and comment. They did so by glean- ing from the master theologians and preach- ers of the past half century the best exposi- tion on every major text and dominant pas- sage of the Bible.

Great Sermon Makers Approve It

"Judging by the effect on myself I should say that its value lies in this: That by its wealth of apt and unhackneyed illustrations it starts the mind on lines of thought reaching far beyond the text under review. I welcome it as a precious boon to preachers."—REV. PRINCIPAL DAVID SMITH, D.D.

"In suggestiveness, originality and practical useful- ness I should think the Dictionary stands alone. This book flashes light on one everywhere."—REV. G. H. MORRISON, M.A.

"Its comprehensiveness seems to me to be one of its chief merits. I look forward to much assistance from constant reference to its pages."—REV. CANON J. G. SIMPSON, M.A., D.D.

"All is sifted, modern, thought-provoking. The hard- worked pastor will find much gold here for his mint- ing days."—REV. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D.

"It is a prodigy of toil, and the result is admirable. It is a treasury of the best things chosen with unerring wisdom, arranged with skill, and made immediately available for the preacher's use. The Outline of History

A Plain History of Life
and Mankind

By H. G. WELLS

Written with the advice and editorial help of Ernest Baker, Sir H. H. Johnston, Sir E. Ray Lankester and Prof. Gilbert Murray. Illustrated by J. F. Horrabin.

HERE is history from the beginning of life on our earth so far as we can trace it by paleolithic records, through the civilizing and decivilizing ages down to yesterday. And much of it is history from the stand- point of common sense. We would hold this view even after you pointed out that Mr. Wells does irreparable damage to many an ancient convention and orthodox tradition. He trains his guns fearlessly on superstition, on corrupt- ing tradition, on historical malpractice.

The author's conclusions stimulate thought. He is an optimist. He sees a new sanity emerg- ing from the hatreds of the war. He looks for a revision of ideas and institutions and the de- velopment of a citizenship of the world, with the breakdown of nationalism. Religion to his mind has been obscured by creeds—"the old political and social assumptions, the old reli- gious formulas have lost their conviction." But he expects the future to bring a brotherhood of men rather than of nations, wider education and a religion apart from forms and creeds. Man is to become happier and more contented on earth. He does not seem to fear that, judg- ing by the rate we are going, the old ball may become cold before we achieve that ideal.

This is the big book of the season. Every thinking citizen of these pregnant times should have it.

In two volumes. $10.50, plus 20 cents postage.

The Missionary Outlook in the Light of the War

By the Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook

THIS COMMITTEE included such men of vision as Robert E. Speer and William Adams Brown. The increased significance and urgency of the missionary enterprise, embodying as it does our noblest ideals in the World War; the changed outlook in every mission field; the new light thrown on missionary policies and principles—the discussion of these subjects by outstanding experts gives to the volume authority and inspiring power.

Charles Clayton Morrison,

Editor The Christian Century, says:

“In this great book I see Christian missions as a science, the science of the kingdom of God. Nothing human is foreign to it. The present mighty currents of internationalism flow directly into its categories. The vast enterprises upon which our political statesmen have embarked in these post-war days cannot be carried out by any mere secular power. Until the Christian religion accepts these world undertakings as its own undertaking and pours its energy and grace into them they cannot be consummated. This is the thesis of the book I hold in my hand. It will feed and broaden and vitalize the minds of churchmen. I do not see how a minister, especially, or a Christian leader in any capacity can get on without the inspiration of such a vision as this book is sure to give to everyone who reads it.”

The Meaning of Service

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

ANYONE who thinks at all in our day about humanity's condition must think about service, its meanings, motives and aims. This book conceives of service as the indispensable expression of discipleship, the practical overflow of the Christian life. A life that rightly conceives of prayer, and that is dominated by faith, must be serviceable, and so there is now the trilogy of Dr. Fosdick's interpretations of Christian character. His other books, "The Meaning of Prayer" and "The Meaning of Faith," have been more widely read than any other books on religion published in many years. These are all intensely suggestive to makers of sermons and addresses.

The New Jerusalem

By Gilbert K. Chesterton

Author of "Heretics," "Orthodoxy," etc.

CHESTERTON, English poet, essayist, dramatist, philosopher, prophet, critic, champion of religion, is now in this country. He says the two things on earth worth seeing are America and Jerusalem. He has visited Jerusalem and now he comes to see America—especially Chicago—and to tell this New World what he saw in Old Jerusalem, and to prophesy somewhat concerning "The New Jerusalem."

When a short time ago the world was thrilled by the news that British troops had entered Jerusalem, visions of unheard of possibilities opened up before the minds of millions. Palestine in Christian hands! What new act in the historical drama was about to open? Egyptian, Roman, Saracen, Turk—and then, perhaps, the Jew restored. Is this what is meant by Zionism? Gilbert K. Chesterton went out to see. This book, which resulted from his visit, is a spiritual journey, and it presents a reconception of the meaning which Jerusalem and its unique history has for the world today. Mr. Chesterton discusses the world-wide movement of Zionism and the position of the Jew, contrasts the ideals of Mahomet with those of Christ and devotes most interesting chapters to his impressions of Jerusalem today. In pages full of penetrating observation he sets before his readers an historical pageant that begins with Christ and comes down through the Crusades to our own time. Full of Chestertonian humor, this book is of deep interest at this hour of world-readjustment.

It may safely be predicted that this newest book of Mr. Chesterton will stir more discussion than any previous work of his. Every minister and every layman interested in modern religious movements, as well as every person alert to genuine literary achievement, will wish to possess this book.

Your Bible Should Be the Best and Most Accurate Version of the Scriptures

The American Standard Bible

Authorized and Edited by
The American Revision Committee

The Same Old Bible

The American Standard is The Same Old Bible that we have always used, but it gives the exact meaning of the inspired writers, in the LANGUAGE OF TODAY instead of in the language used three hundred years ago.

The Authorized Standard Edition

The American Standard is used by all the Colleges, Theological Seminaries and Bible Training Schools in the United States, and has become with them, as with the editors of all Sunday School periodicals, The Authorized Standard Version.

The Bible in the Language of Today

It is used exclusively by the great religious denominations in their Sunday School periodicals, because they realize that it brings a plain reader more closely into contact with the exact thought of the sacred writers than any other version now current in Christendom.

The American Revision Committee devoted thirty years to the work and at the end of that period produced what is now recognized as the best version of the Scriptures ever published in the English language.

The Sword or the Cross

By KIRBY PAGE

THE WORLD TOMORROW says of this new volume: "This book is a valuable contribution to the discussion of the Christian attitude to war, coming as it does from the experience of one who went overseas with a quite different conception. Mr. Page portrays the terrible reality of war, shows how the church now defending war has often taken the wrong side on great moral questions, and makes it clear that Jesus faced a similar situation to that of 1914. In his analysis of Jesus' teachings on the subject the author avoids the doubtful proof-text method and also steers clear of side issues as to possible uses of force, and shows how the whole spirit of that teaching is a repudiation of the way of the sword, and an enthronement of its opposite, the way of the cross. The remaining chapters discuss the practicability of that way of redeeming love and the necessity for Christians to follow Jesus in it."

Other Comments on the Book

Charles E. Jefferson, Pastor Broadway Tabernacle, N. Y.:

I like the style of your presentation, and also the noble Christian spirit that breathes through what you have written. You know that I am not able to go quite so far as you do, but I am always happy to have men who feel as you do express their convictions, for it is possible that you are right, and that the rest of us will have to come up where you are.

Peter Ainslie, Minister Christian Temple, Baltimore:

I have taken the time to go over your manuscript and find it very informing and ringing true. A book so well prepared as yours may not have the deserved circulation, but it is certainly worth putting on the market.

Miss Maude Royden, recently of the City Temple, London:

I have read your manuscript with the deepest interest and with the most complete agreement. I admire especially your insistence on the spirit as distinct from the letter, and your dismissal of the idea of non-resistance. Nearly all criticism of our position is aimed at these two points—which we do not hold!

A Meditation After Easter

HOW long must we wait for Christ's reign to be consummated amongst men? Ages have passed since his uncouth cross stood transfigured with holy light on the little hill, and the empty tomb echoed with the voices of angels and astonished men. Easter day was God's pledge that Christ should at last rule this world of men, setting up his cross in their hearts, and not in their hearts only, but in the state and in business and in industry and on every level of their lives. But the cross has not yet been set up, and the resurrection is not yet seriously believed. The kingdom of goodwill and justice is not yet come. Our world still moves within the ancient grooves of fear and hate, of suspicion and pagan strife, of material force and the lust of riches. Pilate still believes he has power over Christ. Those who are called his disciples still follow him afar off, faint and dismayed at his unresisting meekness and unequal to the demands of his cross or the implications of his Easter vic-

What is a reasonable time to wait for the promised kingdom? How many Easters must pass before we might expect men to take Christ seriously? What should be the limits of our patience, our credulity, our hopefulness? Have we not waited long enough? Now that nineteen hundred Easters have passed what hope dare we reasonably cherish that Christ's cross is not in truth as impotent as it has always appeared to be?

There is only one answer: Christ's kingdom will come when he finds for himself a church that will bear its cross as he bore his. He has not yet found for himself a church that would bear the cross. The church gilds its cross. It caps its steeples with it. It wears the cross as a charm. It even worships the cross. It does everything with the cross except to bear it. Cursed with prosperity, with popularity, the church finds its glory more in its secular conquests, its institutional prestige, than in its spiritual mission. The world will go on in its secular grooves until doomsday unless there arises a church—a fellowship of souls—willing to bear the cross in the Easter faith. But when such a church comes into self-conscious being, Christ's social kingdom of good-will will come more swiftly than our interpreters of the so-called laws of social evolution imagine.

Legal Censorship is Being Defeated

THE question of the better control of the movies has become an issue in many of the states of the union. It seems astonishing that the churches have been so indifferent to the important issues involved. Proposals for censorship have been defeated in New Hampshire, Vermont, Georgia, Indiana, Minnesota, South Dakota, Montana, Idaho and Tennessee. In spite of all of these defeats, the issue is still a live one and there are bills pending in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, West Virginia, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Mexico, California and North Carolina. One of the great producers has threatened a barrage of propaganda that would make censorship inoperative even if it were voted in. Meanwhile a group of scientific investigators are making a study of the workings of the state censorship laws. The Russell Sage Foundation is financing this inquiry. When the report is given, we shall all be in better position to speak intelligently upon the use and the abuse of the censorship laws. The argument of those who are in favor of unrestricted movies is that censorship lends itself to the plans of propagandist interests. In case of labor trouble, for instance, a censorship board could easily misinterpret the whole situation. Probably this very issue best illustrates the fallacy of the contention of those who profess to disbelieve in censorship. At the present time New York capitalists with their millions invested in the production of film control the publicity in the show houses with regard to current events. Are these millionaires to be trusted more than a board of citizens representing the public at large? The movies even now are full of propaganda, as anyone knows who watches them discerningly. It is partly because the present propaganda against religion and decency may be checked that the big interests are raising their cry against censorship.

Smelling Out Heresy in the Seminaries

THE Moody Bible Institute of Chicago is rapidly assuming the leadership of the most repellant type of theological reaction in the middle west. Dr. James M. Gray in a recent public address stated the creed that he required of men who taught in his institution. "We require that he shall believe in the plenary inspiration of the scriptures, the Deity of Christ, the sacrificial nature of his atonement, the personality and work of the Holy Spirit, the lost condition of men, the necessity of the new birth, the eternal retribution of those who die in their sins." He asserts that belief in premillenarianism is not required, but expresses the naive judgment that a teacher coming in without such belief would soon be taught it "by the students." Dr. Gray has made a public attack upon the orthodoxy of Dr. Harris Franklin Rall, professor of systematic theology in Garrett Biblical Institute and of Professor Shirley J. Case of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. Each of these gentlemen has written a book recently. The attack on Professor Rall is that he has omitted so many things that would prove him orthodox. The real ground of attack upon him is not to be found in his book on the Life of Jesus, but in a more recent book in which he exposes the errors of premillenarianism. Professor Rall's chair at Garrett is supported by the Methodist Episcopal church and they will know what to do with the gratuitous charges that have been hurled against this eminent scholar of their denomination. The positions taken by Professor Case in his book, "A Study of First Century Christianity in Relation to Its Religious Environment," are more challenging than those of the Garrett professor. Meanwhile, if the heresy-hunter would start after Dr. Gray, which the Lord forbid, he would find him guilty of enumerating the "fundamentals" and leaving out most of the things that both Jesus and Paul regarded as fundamental. The Moody Institute professor in his diatribe seems not to have distinguished between charging heresy and proving it.

Business Men Want Their Sundays

MOVING season about Chicago has had its horrors, not the least of which was the stream of people who came on Sunday to look at your apartment, if you were going to give it up. In the north shore suburban towns outside the city this abuse has at last been remedied by the realtors themselves. While asserting that they are in favor of no "blue laws"—the old houn' dog that everybody kicks around without knowing his identity—they assert their right to one day in seven for rest. They believe that quite as much real estate can be sold in six days as in seven. Yet no one except these realtors know how hard it has been to educate the public to the new regime. The business man could not stay home for he would be hunted up. He has learned to get in his car early Sunday morning and depart for regions unknown. A few unscrupulous men have tried to profit by the reform. They have opened up offices on Sunday and though possessed of but little other business they reap a Sunday harvest. Whether these pirates will at last force all the reputable agents back into their offices on Sunday remains to be seen. It will be seen from this example just how necessary Sunday laws are. Only the enforcement of law can save the realtors who want a six day week from the aggressions of those who would force a seven-day week on them. In spite of the present unpopularity of Sunday laws which has been worked up by the moving picture business and other business interests it will be seen that the community which has no Sunday laws will in the end have no Sunday and no rest day. The whole community will be forced back into the paganism of the seven-day week. It is clear that men of one occupation should respect the Sunday of men of another occupation. No business man should ask a barber to work on Sunday. No carpenter should ask a moving picture operator to work on Sunday. No capitalist should ask a caddie to chase his golf balls on Sunday. Only by mutual consideration expressed in the form of law can we save ourselves from a grave relapse in working conditions as well as religious welfare.

Board of Censors is Condemned

THE National Board of Review is the organization which passes upon films before they are given to the country. The work of this organization has been denounced in New York as being a mere rubber-stamping of moving picture corporation interests. The Brooklyn Federation of Churches recently spent a day considering the question of the censorship of movies. Mr. Frederick Boyd Stevenson, whose startling articles in the Brooklyn Eagle have finally given expression to a nation wide protest, spoke showing the utterly inadequate work of the Board of Review. He was answered by Mr. Orrin C. Cocks, secretary of the board. Ex-Police Commissioner O'Grady made an earnest speech on the work of the Board of Review, and declared that in her experience among criminal girls, she was convinced that the movies had much to do with their downfall. After the 125 clergymen had heard all of the discussion pro and con, they voted unanimously to condemn the work of the National Board of Review and asked for a state commission to regulate the morals of the movies. This action and the journalistic protest that is going up all over the country has frightened the movie producers and they are now proposing to reform themselves. In this group of men there are no doubt some who honestly wish to see the nation have better pictures. But these have to compete with other producers who care for nothing but the dividends. The efforts of the better movie men in the direction of reform will be impotent unless the public has a voice in the matter. There is urgently needed in every state some organization which will carefully inspect every film that is offered. It is not enough for the movie men to offer the sop that they will no longer cartoon the Protestant ministers of the nation upon the screen. That question is negligible by the side of the question whether the movie shall be a school of crime or a school of virtue for the young people of the land.

Christianizing the High Schools

ALREADY great progress has been made in organizing the religious influences at the great state universities. So successfully is this done that there are some state universities which are more definitely religious than some church colleges. It is done by creating a religious cabinet that meets regularly, and assigns definite duties to the various religious forces. A beginning is being made in bringing religious influences into the grade schools. There are a number of communities over the United States in which religious instruction is given by teachers appointed and paid by the church. The educational group most neglected is the high school. The young people of high school age are passing through the doubt period, and through the age of revolt against authority. It is at this age that the church loses most of its young people. Yet there is very little that is definitely done for the souls of these young people in most communities. It is at this age that the young people are first definitely conscious of a break between the theological instruction of the pulpit and the scientific instruction of the laboratory, in cities where religion is still given the dogmatic interpretation. The Y. M. C. A. is the first Christian organization to sense the need of Christian work in the high schools. Their Hi-Y clubs have been signally blessed for good. These clubs gather outstanding Christian boys together for fellowship and for definite religious work. In most cities this is the only organized study of the religious needs of the high schools. In cities where there is no Association there is usually nothing provided for high school students except the Sunday school class organizations in the local churches. It is an interesting observation that the young people's organizations like Christian Endeavor and Epworth League make their chief appeal to employed young people. The need of the hour is for a definite and pedagogically correct program for the young people of the high schools of America.

Shall We Abolish the Clergy

THE clerical profession has fallen upon evil days, says Dean Inge, of St. Paul's, London. In other callings there are more applicants than places, and some selection is possible; but bishops must take what comes to them in the way of recruits for the ministry. Indeed, the dean finds that the social level of the clergy of the church of England has fallen steadily since it reached its highest point in the novels of Trollope. He also agrees with Dr. Orchard that the preaching in the Anglican church is "really worse than necessary." Many are the causes named for this state of things, but what of the remedy?

On one side the dean sees the attempt of the clergy to magnify the sacerdotal theory of their office, and thus set themselves further apart from the masses, and on the other to bid for popularity by allying themselves with secular movements which reject the fundamental principles and methods of Christianity. So he proposes that the clergy be abolished. "Is there any reason," inquires Dean Inge, "why we should not return to the example of St. Paul, the missionary who earned his living by tent-making? Why should not we have in every parish several men and women who are licensed to read services in church, to administer the sacraments, and do all that the clergy now do? Such persons should wear a badge, but no distinctive costume; and they should earn their living by their secular work, not by their spiritual ministrations. There would be several advantages in this change. The church would be set free from the endless anxieties and humiliations of begging for money. We should be rid of the clerical professionalism which is fostered in the theological colleges, and which erects a barrier between clergy and laity. The ministers, being engaged in secular work, would have the laymen's point of view, though they would of course be chosen as being earnestly religious persons.

Christian Treatment for Drug Addicts

WHILE alcoholism has been predominantly a man's sin, drug addiction has been frequently the sin of women. No doubt there are reasons for this. They are ill oftener, and drug addiction often starts through the legitimate use of a drug in the hands of a physician. There does not seem to be any evidence that the use of drugs has been increased through prohibition. Indeed many institutions devoted to the treatment of unfortunates with the habit of taking narcotics have been compelled to close on account of lack of business. The charity of the Christian church which has been so busy with alcoholics in the past now has opportunity to consider the sad case of those who are ruining their lives through the various drug habits. The Presbyterian Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare has recently established a department of drugs and narcotics and opened an institution for the care of these patients, adding to the usual medical treatment the moral and spiritual influences of the Christian religion. The work will be in charge of Miss Helen K. Strain, a returned missionary from Japan. Miss Strain has learned that the illicit trade in drugs has extended to dance halls, places of amusement, and even into the public schools. Business women seem to be more frequently addicts to the evil because of the temporarily energizing effects which they secure from certain drugs. The Presbyterian home will be open for women of all creeds and any woman, no matter what her previous lapses, may come and spend a night and have her breakfast. It is said that in New York there is nowhere else for a woman to go except to the city jails when she has a relapse from former treatment. Meanwhile there should be an important by-product in this redemptive work in securing information from the women that would lead to the arrest and conviction of the human sharks who fatten upon the sins and weaknesses of the human race by selling habit-forming drugs contrary to law.

The Disciples and the Interchurch

OF all the great religious bodies the Disciples alone are delinquent in their obligations to the eastern banks in connection with the underwritings of the Interchurch World Movement. The Congregationalists, Methodists and Baptists have paid in full, and the Presbyterians have paid in part and made definite arrangements with the banks which are considered satisfactory. It was stated by the bankers at the time the big loan was made that no Protestant missionary society in the history of the country had ever defaulted in a business obligation. It was this credit which led the banks to loan money on what might otherwise have been considered inadequate security. The Disciples missionary and educational leaders have shown no disposition to regard their obligation lightly, but are now organizing a series of conferences to get the churches to accept their rightful share of the Interchurch underwritings during April and May. The plan makes all pledges conditional. It is all or nothing. Until the debt is paid it would seem that the eyes of the whole American church will be on the Disciples. Protestant credit is now in their hands. Their failure would weaken the credit of every religious organization. Their success will triumphantly vindicate both the financial solvency and the high degree of honor of the evangelical communions. Burying the corpse of the Interchurch may be a disagreeable duty, but every day the task becomes more necessary.

The Meeting of Extremes

THERE are two groups of men who hold a strong aversion to the social service program of the churches, whether expressed in terms of local church activity or in more general and cooperative pronouncements, like those of the Federal Council, and the recent Church and Industry Commission of the Interchurch. They are, on one side, the capitalistic class, who feel that they are engaged in a most serious and alarming conflict with organized labor, and resent any effort on the part of the church to mediate in the controversy; and on the other the company of conservative leaders in various denominations who have undertaken to champion an intensely individualistic gospel, with its attendant features of protest and reaction, and are therefore fiercely antagonistic to any emphasis upon a social message in preaching.

At first glance it would appear that there could be nothing in common between the two groups, and perhaps there is less community of plan and effort than is suggested by their respective attitudes. But common animosities frequently lead to mutual understanding and cooperation, even where the point of view appears unrelated. It is at least a subject of conjecture and inquiry as to whether these two interests are not on confidential and cooperating terms.

The first of them constitutes the organized and aggressive party on the financial and administrative side of the industrial problem, the group that is committed to a policy of sharp antagonism toward all labor unionism, and that proposes to resist to the uttermost what it regards as the arrogant demands of labor. These demands include the efforts of artisan leaders in behalf of shorter hours, collective bargaining, profit sharing, the maintenance of as full a proportion of the present wage scale as is possible, and other items in the program of the employed class. It is not too much to affirm that without mature reflection upon the many problems involved in the complicated industrial situation, the average men of the business and professional classes incline to this attitude. The demands of the labor unions appear to them to be excessive and continuous, and the numerous strikes, with their embargo upon almost all forms of readjustment to normal conditions since the war, seem an intolerable burden upon business of every sort.

Christian leaders in many of the churches have become convinced that the arguments are not all on one side in this contest, and that, as representing a very large section of that public which is always the chief sufferer in industrial warfare, it is the duty of the church to ascertain the primary facts of the situation. This has led to several surveys, investigations and inquiries, such as the Interchurch probe into the conditions attending the steel strike, the inquiry of the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of Churches into the strike situation at Lawrence, and other investigations of like nature. In these instances, as was natural, both sides to the controversy insisted that the opposite party had been favored by the investigators. But the reasonably unbiased attitude of the commissions chosen for the work, and the value of their findings, were best attested by the appreciation with which their reports were received by the public, and the ineffective, not to say self-annihilating attempts made to discredit them.

But if the attitude of certain of the capitalistic journals, such as Industry, the Manufacturers' Record, and the Wall Street Journal, is to be taken as symptomatic of the feeling in the business world at large, it is evident that the church is regarded in these circles as inhibited from social inquiries and restricted to the type of preaching which an older generation regarded as the essence of the gospel—the salvation of the individual soul and the inculcation of individual morality, as having no relations to the morality of the community or the standards of business ethics. That this is not the prevailing conviction in the churches is proved by the rising tide of social and industrial solicitude manifested in the pulpits and the official gatherings of all communions. But it still lingers in many areas within the church, and reveals a degree of dull resentment that Christianity should be thought capable of meddling with matters not strictly parochial in character.

It is just at this point that the forces of theological reaction are ready to join with those of capitalistic contentment with a vanishing social order. The war quickened into fresh life a declining form of literalism in the interpretation of the scriptures, of apocalyptic zeal in insistence upon the imminence of catastrophic events in fulfillment of prophecy, and of concentration of attention upon a form of evangelism which counted individual conversions as the chief element in a successful extension of the kingdom of God.

It is easy to perceive the negligible or even disdained position which a message of social reconstruction has in the opinion of these apostles of the theologies of literalism and despair. It is not by the preaching of the good tidings of a new social order that relief is to be sought for the sin and sorrow of the world. It is by insistence upon certain dogmas, such as the verbal inspiration of the Bible, the virgin birth of Jesus, the vicarious blood atonement, and the immediate visible return of the Lord. Now no one is interested to deny any of these tenets. Indeed they are all of them sufficiently within the range of biblical teaching to secure from the unreflecting the homage due to essential truth. But their distance from the vital elements of faith in Jesus and his redemptive purpose for human society is to be calculated only in wide diameters.

Yet it is apparent that men obsessed with such views of Christianity are certain to be fiercely hostile to any form of the social gospel. In fact there is no term that more quickly arouses them to denunciation and resentment. It is not strange that they have organized in the most effective manner for the campaign against it. And that campaign is projected under the plausible name of Bible Institutes or Conferences, held in different portions of the country, where under the guise of exposition of the Word of God an opportunity is sought for insistence upon this precise catalogue of cherished dogmas, all of which might be true without having the least value for practical Christian service. Comfort may be found in the fact that in spite of emphasis upon particularistic and inconsequential things, the communities in which such conferences are held are encouraged to read their Bibles, which offers a corrective where practiced.

But the most interesting phase of this propaganda of obscurantism is its financial support. These so-called Bible Conferences in which the social message of Christianity is denounced as a device of the devil, where the efforts of the Interchurch and the Federal Council to direct the thought of the church to its community, social, and industrial obligations are arraigned with passion as a scheme of anti-Christ to deceive the elect, where it is affirmed with loud mouthed anti-Babylonianisms that the entire modern program of the church is an effort to furnish a substitute for devotion to a divine and personal Christ, a dark and insidious plot in which the universities, the seminaries, the Federal Council of Churches, and even the missionary boards and the forward movements of the churches are united to wean unsuspecting believers away from faith in a personal deity—these gatherings are amply financed with budgets that cover the traveling expenses and entertainment of a considerable number of speakers, free provision for visitors who attend from abroad, and other items in a rather imposing total.

Is any group of men more likely to be interested in such propaganda against the social program of the church than those who have gone to such lengths to discredit the recent inquiries into industrial conditions? And is there any significance in the frequent references made by these apostles of apocalypticism to editors of the capitalistic press, that is of journals whose policy is one of sustained opposition to all forms of trade unionism, and to leaders on the capitalistic side of the industrial struggle, as full of anxiety to have the churches "cut out the social Christianity stuff, and preach the old Jerusalem gospel." On this point there is more to be said at a later time. But the common interest of these two groups, so far apart on general principles, and yet so mutually appreciative, is not without significance. Is it another case of Herod and Pilate?

There is not the least danger that the preaching of a social gospel will ever divert the attention of the church from the great themes of the inspired Scriptures, the divine and transcendent life and ministry of our Lord, his atoning and redemptive work, and the personal and complete salvation which he has made possible for every man who desires to accept it. The two aspects of the good tidings are not contradictory or exclusive. And any evangel which sets them against each other or obscures one by undue stress of the other misses its chance to declare the whole counsel of God.

The Restaurant Feast

A Parable of Safed the Sage

I TOOK my little Grandson unto a Restaurant, and bought for him a Good Square Meal. And it was the lad's First Experience of the kind. And he watched eagerly that he might behold everything that occurred, and there was not much that he did not observe. And I read unto him the Bill of Fare, and whatsoever he desired, that did I buy for him.

Now when we had returned unto the house, he told his mother, even the daughter of Keturah, about his great experience. And of all that he had to relate, this was the most wonderful for him:

They gave unto him at the Restaurant a Glass of Milk, and also a Glass of Water.

Now this would not have seemed unto me the most important part of the feast; but at home there are certain limitations. For he liketh to play with his glass, and sometimes doth he upset it. And if he have two glasses, he dippeth from the one to the other with a teaspoon, and seeketh to maintain a level of liquids in the two by drinking and dipping. Wherefore, it was for him a Red Letter Day when he had both Water and Milk in two glasses at the same time; and in comparison the rest of the Bill of Fare was unimportant.

And I considered that this is very like unto Human Nature; and that men and women have their own arbitrary standards of Value that are quite as Comickal as those of Children.

For I know many men and women who go through life with its Feast of Fat Things, and what they are getting out of it is little more than a thin Milk-and-Water diet. But the table of our Heavenly Father is well loaded with a varied Feast.

Now my little lad, though he chiefly regarded the Milk and Water, really filled himself very full of the Substantial Stuff of the Meal. And therein he was more sensible than some Grown Folk.

Frank W. Gunsaulus

By Joseph Fort Newton

First Article in Series on "Some Living Masters of the Pulpit"

AS I sit down to write in appraisal of the genius of Dr. Gunsaulus as a preacher, the newspaper tells me that he has gone to his crowning. It is heavy tidings, and like thousands of young men to whom he was as much father as friend, I am lonely and forlorn. The words from the old Hebrew centuries flash into mind: "My father! my father! The chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" Alas, my appreciation becomes a memorial, and I can make no reader of mine understand with me, remembering almost twenty years of unbroken friendship, how a gracious presence—majestic, magnetic, commanding, enchanting—stands yet vividly and benignantly before me, refusing to say farewell. But his own words bring back the faith in which he lived:

From moonlight, night and wonder,
He stepped to sunlight wonder—
The poet's paradise.

His lyre with string unbroken,
Will ring like music spoken,
And tremble toward God's day.

No doubt there will be a biography of Dr. Gunsaulus, but one cannot be sure of it. Chicago is neglectful of its great personalities. Gentle, wise, meditative David Swing had to wait for more than twenty years—until it was almost too late—and even now there is no life-story of Dr. Harper who, alike in character and achievement, must be reckoned among the great Americans. A biography of Gunsaulus, if written, will show us a man of many manifestations, and it will tell a story more thrilling than any romance. Poet, artist, scholar, educator, author, orator, statesman, and, above all, a God-endowed preacher whose mysticism was at once the inspiration and illumination of his multifarious activity—it is a story of which America ought to be proud. He was the first citizen of his city, if not the most distinguished—the incarnation of its genius and the prophecy of its future. Uniting the fine, firm qualities of the Puritan with the glow, color and tropical richness of Spain, he also joined the skyey vision of the poet with the practical acumen of a man of affairs. Words are the daughters of earth, deeds are the sons of God, and both were wedded in his life. Fortunately I am to write of him only as a preacher, but even in that capacity one may well despair of describing a man whose personal and intellectual charm none could define and few resist.

THE MAGIC OF HIS ELOQUENCE

Already the early eloquence of Gunsaulus is a legend of magic and mystery. Only recently a man related how he sat with a friend on the floor in the aisle of Plymouth Church, during the Columbian Exposition, and heard the pastor preach. It was the enchantment of pure genius, an oratory more vivid than music in which every gesture seemed an event. He read his text from Exodus 4:4, "And the Lord said unto Moses, Put forth thine hand, and take it by the tail. And he put forth his hand, and it became a rod in his hand." Both men wondered what could be made out of such a text, but they did not have long to wait. The appetites and passions of a man, like snakes, coil and wriggle at his feet until, at the command of God, he grasps them firmly. Then they become scepters of sovereignty, wands of moral authority—forging passion into power. But no art can bring back the magic whereby the orator swept all before him, holding men as if their own souls spoke to them in his words, as he described the fight every man must wage with himself if he is to be a man. Standing back from the pulpit, brushing his long raven hair from his forehead, his eyes kindling with a dusty yet piercing light, "orb within orb," he swayed his audience as the wind sways the clouds. There was nothing artificial, no studied unnatural effect, but the fire and rapture of great eloquence dedicated to the service of the moral life. To this day, though twenty-seven years have come and gone, my friend can repeat not only the idea and outline of that sermon, but whole passages of its music.

THE ORIGIN OF ARMOUR INSTITUTE

As early as 1881—to go back for a time in my story—the young preacher saw, prophetically, that theology must be translated into sociology. When he came to Chicago, six years later, the Armour Mission lay ready to his hand, and he laid hold of it, lavishing upon it his love and labor. Some months later he preached a sermon in which he not only unburdened the passion of his heart for the young, but, as was equally characteristic, outlined a practical plan and remedy. At the conclusion of the sermon, Philip D. Armour came forward with a direct, searching question:

"Do you really believe in those ideas you have just expressed?" said the captain of industry.

"I certainly do," answered the preacher.

"Well, then, if you will give me five years of your time, I will furnish the money," was the reply; and that sermon became known as the two million dollar sermon.

Out of that sermon grew Armour Institute, the history and growth of which should make more than one chapter in the biography of the preacher. With that story I have not to do now, except to say that, while one does not see how Dr. Gunsaulus could have escaped the opportunity and burden of so prodigious an undertaking—and, manifestly, he did not desire to escape—it none the less divided the interests of his life, and diverted the full tide of his genius from the pulpit. Indeed, he was more than once ready—and actually tried—to resign the pulpit altogether and devote himself entirely to education, as he finally did two years ago. Yet there are fifty men who can conduct and develop a technical institute, for every one whom God has endowed with the rare and precious genius of a great preacher. A giant in strength, of fabulous mental and spiritual resource, he did the work of many men, adding labor to labor—the institute and the church being only two items in an incredible number of activities—though I have often wondered if it had not been better had he obeyed the example of St. Paul, "this one thing I do," in single-hearted devotion.

FIRES OF PAIN

At any rate, Dr. Gunsaulus made his decision, did his work—and paid the price! The call of a great growing city, and the pathos of its spiritual need, lured him on. As if his church and the institute were not enough, he began a great downtown Sunday evening service in Central Music Hall, which was packed to the doors. At length the inevitable happened. The man of iron broke. Physical collapse—complete and shattering—befell him in 1897, and for six months he lay motionless on a bed of agony. No sermons came from the preacher then, no books; only a poem. That poem revealed his intrepid and unconquerable spirit:

I care not that the furnace fire of pain
Laps round and round my life and burns away;
I only care to know that not in vain
The fierce heats touch me throughout night and day.

When he returned to Plymouth pulpit, a quivering sigh, not unmingled with horror, ran through the audience. A terrible thing had happened. Valiantly he had wrestled with the Angel of Pain in the twilight, and it had left him lame and misshapen of frame. Also, a glorious thing had happened. New windows of insight had been opened, new depths of experience fathomed, and new and haunting stops of music had been mastered!

It was on Sunday, November 30, 1902, that I first heard Gunsaulus preach, and the wonder of that day is still vivid in my heart. Such a voice cannot be made in one generation! Today its tones come back to me from behind the hills, now soft as a flute, now melodious as an orchestra, with never a note to jar. It was as variable as the moods of the man, as just as his character, as sweet as his spirit. It was the Sunday after the death of Joseph Parker, and the sermon was a vision of the Christian ministry as illustrated in the life of the first minister of the City Temple. They had been friends—the preacher and his subject—and some allowance had to be made for the beautiful bias of friendship in his estimate and portrayal of Parker. At times he seemed to place him above Beecher, and with that I could not agree. If Parker was a trumpet, Beecher was an orchestra. From the notes of that day I transcribe two passages, the more because the sermon was a revelation equally of the subject and of the preacher, and it will help to make clear what, to me at least, was the greatest quality in Dr. Gunsaulus as a preacher. Thus:

It is an awful risk God takes in creating a David or a Robert Burns. But they justify it, for they give a double significance to nature and life. Such men recreate the external world and its events into an internal order made richer by the language they learn. David, Burns, Augustine, with varying colors portray to us the cost and the peril of letting loose a great soul on the earth. Joseph Parker, by the grace of God, made gigantic mistakes; but also, by the grace of God, he avoided many pitfalls which such a genius digs for a man. I regard him as a wonderfully endowed and restrained man. He could never have been a little sinner; he was not a little saint. The stonemason's boy has not opened unto us the Scriptures, and Gladstone and the kitchen-maid, Sir Henry and the boot-black, have not listened to be pleased for so many years, without demonstrating that the mark of such a nature is capacity for pain.

A great man and a great theme—Joseph Parker with the Scriptures of God and man—how marvelously they reinforce and illustrate each other! He had so meditated upon the Scriptures and lived with kings, prophets, psalmists and captains of the Bible that he became a part of them and they of him. When he preached upon David, it was no small man attempting to measure the girth of the poet-king. Parker was David at the time. One instant it was the boy looking into the heights of manhood as he talked with Samuel; the next, it was the man looking down from physical safety and moral insecurity from his palace into the defenseless home of Uriah. When he preached on Isaiah, one saw how unobstructedly the prophet-statesman of Israel moved in the City Temple pulpit. Exegesis like this is a matter of complete personality; it is not a matter of learning in Greek or skill in analysis. The legend of his eloquence will be told by many generations!

THE SPELL OF THE PREACHER

Here is an example of the style of Dr. Gunsaulus—at times so curiously involved and lacking in lucidity—but the significant thing is that he seized upon that in Parker most akin to himself, his power of dramatic characterization. In this art Gunsaulus himself was at his best, and in the use he made of it we have had in America no one like him; no one near him. Such an art—depending so much upon gesture, facial expression, and the dramatic personality of the preacher—loses three-fourths of its spell and wonder on the printed page. No printed sermon by Dr. Gunsaulus shows us more than half the man. Much the same is true of every great preacher—his art dies with him, becoming a vacancy, even a vacancy that is vacated with the passing of the generation to whom he ministered—but it is doubly so with a preacher like Gunsaulus. The more reason, then, that we should hold him in grateful remembrance, and tell again and again the legend of his life, that as little as possible may be lost of the precious treasure of mankind. What though the picture of him be bathed somewhat in the rose-glow cast upon it by our own emotions—that is just his glory; that he evoked those emotions in us and made us, for a brief time, better than ourselves.

HIS UNIQUE GIFT

Howbeit, in such a sketch as this all one can do is to indicate, in some manner, not what Dr. Gunsaulus had in common with other preachers, but the gift which was uniquely and supremely his own. And that, as I have said, was his genius for dramatic characterization. Two of his sermons may serve as examples, two of the greatest sermons I have ever heard, and I doubt if anyone else could have preached either one of them. One dealt with the temptation of Jesus, and the vision of the Master, worn, weary, weak from hunger and long vigil, standing—a lone and quivering soul—face to face with ultimate Evil, feeling its fearful fascination, can never be forgotten! The other sermon—it has never been printed, I believe—might have been entitled, "Jesus at the Feet of His Disciples," and had to do with the scene in the Upper Room when the Master washed the feet of His apostles. "And he took a towel," was the text. "He might have taken a star," said the preacher, the better to show the august humility of the Servant in the House. Then the preacher became an artist, reproducing with painter-like sympathy and insight the scene in the room. All at once he began to re-enact the scene, from the point of view of each disciple, as the Master approached him. Only a master could have done it. A false note would have ruined the scene, but there was no false note. Each disciple stood out distinctly—his character, his temperament, his very soul—as if, by some magic, the man were there in the pulpit. The preacher forgot himself—the audience forgot the preacher—all were present again in the Upper Room long ago. One could have taken a photograph of Simon Peter. When he came to Judas, it was a solemnizing, terrifying moment—strong men sobbed like children, torn equally between the horror of evil obsession and the awful mercy of Christ. Never again on this earth do I expect to hear such a sermon, now that the great artist-preacher has vanished.

THE LAST OF HIS SCHOOL

Dr. Gunsaulus was an orator, not a theologian, nor yet a man of letters—though all of his books are rewarding, especially his poems, his Life of Jesus, his novel, "The Monk and the Knight," and his volumes of sermons. He was indeed almost the last of the old Websterian—or, rather, Gladstonian—school of the rounded period, using the full-throated Latin family of words. In early days his style—warm, exuberant, chromatic—often had all the lurid tropic coloring of Hugo; but in later years it had softened and chastened its hues. More often he struck a calmer key in which, with hardly a movement of the body, with the slightest employ of any dramatic suggestion, he held his hearers by the depth of his insight, the richness of his experience of things immortal, and the nameless grace of his spirit. He was not always triumphant, and if his successes were resplendent, his failures were equally gorgeous—like that awful day in the City Temple when he took Florence Nightingale for his theme. The sermon simply did not come off. Even at his worst he was never commonplace, never cheap, and the contagious quality of his personality—by its generosity, its amplitude, its winsomeness—redeemed many an ill-starred effort.

How inadequate, after all, is my analysis and estimate of a man so radiant and so radiating, so brotherly withal and lovable. To know Gunsaulus was to become, if not actually generous, like him, at least indisposed—partly indeed unable—to judge him calmly. He had a talent for living, and a genius for friendship. The deepest thing in him was his poet-soul and its experience of God in Christ. Before me lie letters telling, man to man, his faith in Jesus in words as simple as the prayer of a child—letters so lovely that they make the heart ache for sheer beauty. Anyone who knew him, and the rising and falling moods out of which his poems were born, can trace his real biography in his songs. They disclose a tender, beauty-loving spirit, sensitive to all divine persuasions, uniting a large and living culture with a heroic faith; a faith not held without a struggle, as of one who felt, always, the pathos of the soul in a world where life is woven of beauty, mystery, and sorrow. Had the poetic genius triumphed over the homiletic, he would still have been a preacher as well as a poet, just as, even to the end, he was poet as well as preacher.

What the Layman Expects of the Church

By Harold A. Hatch

THE church will render her greatest service in the industrial situation by rededicating herself to the task of laying the foundation of the Christian faith and of teaching how to build upon this foundation. In season and out of season the layman wants to hear emphasized the universal fatherhood of God, from which truth follows the brotherhood of all men and the supreme value of every personality good, bad or indifferent. In season and out of season he wants to hear proclaimed the sovereignty of Christ, from which follows the duty of using always and without compromise his method of construction.
